record discloses that the prosecution relied principally upon the testimony of the complainant to support the convictions as the negotiations between the parties were conducted without the presence of other witnesses.

Prior to the 21st day of January, 1932, the defendants were strangers to Mrs. Bushey, who resided with her invalid husband in Pasadena. They called at her home and falsely represented that they were ready to drill an oil well on the premises and had already spent several hundred thousands of dollars in the development of the property. The defendants suggested, among other things, their desire to have her as a partner in the venture so that she might receive the benefit of their previous expenditures. Being unsuccessful in consummating the deal, the defendants met the complainant on the following day, and after reiterating their desire for a partnership arrangement, they offered her "3000 in stock, in interest in the oil well, and three percent royalty" in exchange for the proceeds of her bank account in the sum of $300 and two Texas lots. Following her acceptance of the offer an agreement was executed between the parties by the terms of which defendants assigned to Mrs. Bushey their personally owned "two-sixths (2/6) interest of one-half (1/2)" of the lease in consideration for the money and the lots.

At a subsequent meeting of the parties by falsely representing that the driller employed on the leased premises refused to continue his operations without some assurance of their ability to compensate him, the defendants induced Mrs. Bushey to execute and deliver to them her promissory note in the sum of $300 for the avowed purpose of merely showing it to the driller. On the day mentioned in the second count of the information, the defendants, falsely representing that the note had been taken from them against their will and placed in a bank for collection and would require payment with interest within thirty days, persuaded the complainant to place in their possession the sum of $350 for the pretended purpose of securing the cancellation of the note. On this occasion the defendants returned the deeds to the Texas lots to Mrs. Bushey in consideration for her promissory note in the sum of $2,900, and they claim that the $300 above mentioned, together with the amounts set forth in counts III and IV of the information, were received in payment of this obligation.

On the occasion indicated by count III of the information, the defendants fraudulently representing that additional money was required for payment of the driller, induced Mrs. Bushey to part with the sum of $700 for this particular purpose. It likewise appears from the complainant's testimony that the defendants at the same time caused her to believe that she was receiving a larger share of their royalty interest for this additional sum of money. At the time specified in count IV of the information in response to defendants' representation that they could advantageously purchase some secondhand oil pipe for use on the lease, the complainant furnished them with the additional sum of $1,500. This was followed by an immediate assignment to her by defendants of their "1/3 personally owned interest of the whole lease" in consideration of the sum of $3,200, receipt of which was acknowledged. It can be clearly determined from the evidence that the complaining witness, due to her lack of sophistication, never possessed a satisfactory understanding of the exact nature of the property rights she expected to receive from defendants during the course of their several transactions. Apparently complainant contemplated that she was merely securing the right to share in defendants' royalty under the lease, which was valueless to her in the absence of their purported endeavor to produce oil on the premises. Upon becoming apprehensive of her position under the lease, Mrs. Bushey learned by an investigation that she had been misled as to the interest actually acquired by her and the purposes for which the money had been used. Notwithstanding her complaint in the matter, the defendants were able to obtain the complainant's authorization to sell her interest in the lease. Being unsuccessful in securing a purchaser, they persuaded Mrs. Bushey to reassign her interest in the lease to them in return for their unsecured note in the sum of $2,900. The defendants admit that an oil well was never drilled upon the leased premises, or a driller employed for such operations, or oil well pipe purchased by them for use in the enterprise.

[1] The defendants first claim, as previously stated, that the evidence in support of the several acts of grand theft charged in the information indicate them to be that species of grand theft known as obtaining money by false pretenses and urge, as a ground for reversal, that said false pretenses lack the corroboration "by the testimony of two witnesses, or that of one witness and corroborating circumstances" required by section 1110 of the Penal Code. In this connection, it should be observed that the amendment to section 484 of the Penal Code to include the offenses formerly charged as grand larceny, embezzlement, and false pretenses did not repeal, either directly or by implication, the quantum of evidence required by section 1110 of the Penal Code to sustain a conviction of that variety of grand theft denounced under section 532 of the Penal Code as obtaining money, labor, or property by false pretenses. People v. Carter (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 129.

The respondent maintains that the evidence is sufficient to sustain defendants' conviction under the classification of theft commonly known as larceny by trick and device, proof of which is not governed by the provisions of said section 1110 of the Penal Code. The requisites of this particular species of theft are stated in the recent case of People v. White, 124 Cal. App. 548, at page 553, 12 P.(2d) 1078, 1080, as follows: "Where a person obtains the money or other property of another by trick or device, as by falsely and fraudulently representing that such property when received is to be applied to a described purpose or object when in fact there exists no purpose or object corresponding to that described, and the owner, through such fraud, parts with the possession of his property without intent to part with the title thereto to the defendant or that it shall go toward any object or purpose other than the described purpose, and the person receiving the property receives it with the intent not of applying it to the purpose or object such as he has described, but of using it as he chooses, as if it were his own, the crime of larceny by trick and device, now included in the crime of theft under section 484 of the Penal Code, has been committed." (Citing cases.)

The offenses of larceny and of obtaining money by false pretenses are admirably distinguished in the case of People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, at page 736, 81 P. 131, where the court, in quoting from Harris on Criminal Law (3d Ed., p. 194), said: "The most intelligible distinction between false pretenses and larceny has been thus set forth: 'In larceny, the owner of the thing has no intention to part with his property therein to the person taking it, although he may intend to part with the possession. In false pretenses, the owner does intend to part with his property in the money or chattel, but it is obtained from him by fraud.'" (The italics are our own.)

[2] Turning our attention to an analysis of the testimony in support of count I of the information, it shows that the complaining witness, although induced to consummate the transaction by the false pretenses of the defendants, not only intended to but actually did receive a certain interest in an existing oil lease in exchange for her money and property. Obviously under these circumstances the inference is inevitable that she intended to transfer the title as well as the possession of the same to defendants. In view of the legal principles above discussed, it is apparent that the offense of false pretenses alone can be predicated upon such evidence, which is insufficient to warrant a conviction by reason of the lack of corroboration required by section 1110 of the Penal Code.

[3] A similar consideration of the evidence supporting count II of the information leads to the conclusion that it is sufficient to sustain the judgment upon the theory of larceny by trick and device. The particular money, which formed the basis of this cause of action, was obtained from this complainant for the pretended purpose of payment to a person, who was nonexistent, in order to secure the purported return of her promissory note. It is inconceivable, under the circumstances, that she contemplated other than a transfer of the mere possession of her money to defendants for the specific, though false, purpose represented by them.

[4, 5] The application of the legal principles involved herein to the evidence adduced in support of counts III and IV of the information creates a more difficult problem. It appears from her testimony that the complainant was moved to part with her money not only for the specific purposes of paying the wages of the driller and the purchase of pipe, but also with the intention of receiving from the defendants an increased share of royalty interest for each additional payment. While her testimony in this respect may appear conflicting, yet it was the province of the trial judge, as a trier of fact, to reconcile and adjust the apparent inconsistency to his own satisfaction. See People v. Jensen, 15 Cal. App. 220, 223, 114 P. 585. Moreover, under such circumstances, we are not authorized to disturb, on appeal, the result so reached. People v. Ah Gee, 37 Cal. App. 1, 174 P. 371. In our opinion the testimony of the complainant as viewed by the trial court was sufficient to warrant the defendants' conviction of theft by trick and device under counts III and IV of the information.

[6] It is further urged by defendants that the offense of theft by trick and device also requires the corroboration specified by section 1110 of the Penal Code before a conviction can be sustained. While this section expressly applies to the offense of false pretenses alone, yet defendants endeavor to construe certain language employed in the case of People v. Leach, 106 Cal. App. 442, at page 463, 290 P. 131, as supporting such a contention. This argument is without merit. There the court prefaced its discussion with the statement that the offense, if any, under consideration, constituted theft by false pretenses and not by trick and device.

[7] The defendants further claim that the court erred in permitting the prosecution to ask a question of the witness Joos, a co-owner of the lease, which raised the inference that defendants had by means of false pretenses similarly sold an interest in the lease to a Mrs. Warner for the purported purpose of obtaining money to drill on the premises. Conceding that the question was improper, it elicited an answer favorable to appellants, which constitutes a complete answer to the claim of impropriety in its asking. People v. Wynn, 133 Cal. 72, 65 P. 126; People v. Kelly, 146 Cal. 119, 79 P. 846.

Finally, appellants urge that the admission of the testimony of the witness Cameron, over their objection, that the land covered by the lease had a "speculative value on the basis of oil property," was error. Conceding that the testimony was inadmissible and the witness insufficiently qualified, the appellants fail to satisfactorily show that such evidence was either unfavorable or prejudicial. Be that as it may, after a review of the entire record, we are convinced that the conviction of defendants upon counts II, III and IV was just and has resulted in no miscarriage of justice.

The order denying appellants' motion for a new trial and the judgment under count I are reversed, and a new trial directed as to said count; and the order denying the motion for a new trial and the judgments under counts II, III and IV are affirmed.

ROW v. SAME.
Civ. 1042.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 13, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 11,

1. New trial ⇨114.

Where judge who presided at trial was absent from county, other judge who heard new trial motion could pass thereon (Code Civ. Proc. § 661).

2. Appeal and error ⇨979(1).

New trial ⇨70.

New trial motion for insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict is addressed to trial court's sound discretion, and its order may not be disturbed on appeal, except for manifest abuse of discretion.

3. New trial ⇨70.

To grant new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, judge must be clearly satisfied that verdict is wrong, and, in considering effect of evidence, must act on own judgment.

4. New trial ⇨72.

Granting new trial to defendant motorist, though written transcript of evidence was not before court, held not abuse of discretion, where there was sufficient undisputed evidence warranting conclusion that contributory negligence was established by greater weight of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 660).

5. New trial ⇨157.

Party not requesting that phonographic reporter attend hearing of new trial motion and read his notes waives right to object to proceedings on ground that no written transcript of evidence was presented, regardless of whether parties concede all evidence that was produced at trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 660).

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; Arthur L. Mundo, Judge.

Actions, consolidated for trial, by J. M. Row and wife, and by J. W. Row, also known as John W. Row, by his guardian ad litem, Jesse George, against John Biehl and another. Verdicts for plaintiffs, and, from orders granting a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Jesse George, of San Diego, for appellants.

Irving E. Read, of Los Angeles, and Wright & McKee and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, for respondents.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

These actions arise out of a collision between a motorcycle driven by plaintiff J. W. Row and an automobile driven by defendant John Biehl. Just prior to the collision, Biehl was driving east, and J. W. Row was driving west, on A street in San Diego. While Biehl was making a left turn onto Granada avenue, proceeding north, Row ran into the right-hand side of the automobile, striking about the center of the rear door of the car. Action was brought by Row (a minor) for damages for injuries sustained by him in the accident, and action was likewise brought by his parents, J. M. Row and Mattie Row, for expenses incurred. The causes were consolidated for trial, and were tried before a jury and before a judge from another county, which returned verdicts in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendants.

Notices of intention to move for a new trial were filed on behalf of both defendants in both cases, which motions were made upon the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdicts and errors of law, as well as other statutory grounds. These motions came on for hearing within thirty days after entry of judgments on the verdicts before a judge other than the one who presided at the trial, for the reason that the judge who presided at the trial was absent from the county where the trial was had. At that time the testimony taken at the trial had not been transcribed, but counsel for plaintiffs and defendants submitted the case on oral statements of the evidence produced at the trial, the exhibits which had been received in evidence and the arguments made. No objection was made by plaintiffs' counsel to hearing the motions before a different judge, nor was any objection made to the manner in which they were heard. No request was made by the court or either party to the reporter to attend the hearing and to read his notes or any part thereof. Upon the submission of the motions for new trial, the court made its order in each of said cases "that a new trial of the above-entitled action should be granted upon the ground and for the reason that the evidence introduced upon the trial of the above-entitled cause was insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that said motion be and the same is hereby granted and a new trial of the above-entitled causes ordered." From the orders granting the new trials the plaintiffs appeal.

[1] The judge who heard the motions had jurisdiction and power to pass upon the motions for new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 661.

[2] Appellants concede that a judge who did not try the case may hear and determine the motion for new trial without a written transcript of the evidence where the facts necessary to be considered are undisputed and conceded by counsel for both sides. The point raised is whether or not such judge can hear and determine such motion in the absence of a written transcript of the evidence where counsel for both sides do not agree upon all the facts presented in the trial of the case. The trial court has power and it is its duty to hear and determine a motion for new trial. Its duty and power on such a proceeding after a verdict of a jury has been returned is correctly stated as follows:

"Whatever may have been the conclusion of the jury, the rule is well settled that a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its order may not be disturbed on appeal, unless there is a manifest abuse of such discretion." Anderson v. Lum Show, 124 Cal. App. 490, 492, 12 P.(2d) 1045, 1047.

[3] "Of course, the judge should give due respect to the verdict of the jury, and may sometimes properly deny a new trial in cases where, if submitted to him without a jury, he might, upon the evidence, have made a different decision. He must be clearly satisfied that the verdict is wrong; otherwise he should let it stand. But in considering the question upon the motion he must act upon his own judgment as to the effect of the evidence. The parties are entitled to the judgment of the jury in rendering a verdict in the first instance, but upon a motion for a new trial they are equally entitled to the independent judgment of the judge as to whether such verdict is supported by the evidence." Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 103, 78 P. 337, 340.

[4] The record discloses that the judge who passed upon the motions for new trial had before him the undisputed physical facts of the accident and of the intersection where the accident occurred, and sufficient undisputed evidence from which he reasonably could have held that contributory negligence as a fact was established by the greater weight of the evidence. With this before him, there is therefore no showing of a "manifest abuse of discretion," because a written transcript of the evidence was not before the court.

[5] Another complete answer to appellants' contention is that they waived the right to object to the proceedings on account of the lack of the written transcript of the evidence. Section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Hearing of motion for new trial, reference to pleadings, etc. On the hearing of such motion, reference may be had in all cases to the pleadings and orders of the court on file, and when the motion is made on the minutes, reference may also be had to any depositions and documentary evidence offered at the trial and to the report of the proceedings on the trial taken by the phonographic reporter, or to any certified transcript of such report or if there be no such report or certified transcript, to such proceedings occurring at the trial as are within the recollection of the judge; when the proceedings at the trial have been phonographically reported, but the reporter's notes have not been transcribed, the reporter must upon request of the court or either party, attend the hearing of the motion and shall read his notes, or such parts thereof as the court, or either party, may require."

We thus see that said Code section provides: "When the proceedings at the trial have been phonographically reported, but the reporter's notes have not been transcribed, the reporter must upon request of the court or either party, attend the hearing of the motion and shall read his notes, or such parts thereof as the court, or either party, may require." It does affirmatively appear from the record that neither the court nor the appellants requested the reporter to attend the hearing of the motion or to read his notes or any part thereof. In view of this provision of the Code, it must be held that a party who does not make such request waives the right to object to the proceedings on the grounds that no written transcript of the evidence was presented at the time of making the motions for new trial, whether or not the parties admit and concede all the evidence that was produced at the trial of the case.

The record discloses no abuse of discretion in the present case. Inasmuch as we must sustain the order granting new trials, it is unnecessary to pass upon the other points urged by the parties, as we have full confidence that they will be properly disposed of by the trial court.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

Civ. 7889.District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.
June 30, 1933.1. Automobiles ⇨244(35).

6. Damages ⇨132(5).

$3,500 to woman held not excessive for injuries causing pain and suffering and disabling her from usual avocation and causing diseased condition requiring operation after birth of child and preventing further conception.

Evidence disclosed that injuries caused woman much pain and suffering, and weakened and disabled her from avocation; that at time of accident she was pregnant, and later was delivered of normal healthy child, but that after delivery it was found necessary to operate on her because of diseased condition directly traceable to injuries, and that injuries received directly contributed toward creating condition preventing further conception.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

Action by Joseph E. Merrill and wife against E. Bruce Finigan and another.

From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant the B. & H. Transportation Company and from an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Elber H. Tilson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Mulholland & Denny, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $4,892.70, against the defendant B. & H. Transportation Company and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The appellants' brief in reality is a duplicate of the reporter's transcript; the object being apparently to secure here what the court below denied, a trial de novo. This hardly fits into the scheme of appellate practice. However, we will discuss the case as it is presented.

The controversy arises out of an automobile accident in which three different automobiles are involved, and it happened in the intersection of two streets in Long Beach. Redondo avenue runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. Redondo avenue does not intersect Second street in the sense that is generally understood when we speak of intersecting streets. The situation is that Redondo avenue meets Second and stops; yet there is an area that might be classed as an intersection for our purposes.

Plaintiff Joseph E. Merrill was driving a Star automobile on a January night or evening, after dark. His lights were lit, and he was driving at a speed of some 10 miles per hour, hugging the northerly curb of Second street and driving in a westerly direction. Defendant Finigan was driving a Star automobile along Second street on the southerly side thereof and in an easterly direction. His lights were lit. Plaintiffs and defendant Finigan were both in the area which may be designated as the intersection. The defendant and appellant B. & H. Transportation Company owns and operates a line of busses in the city of Long Beach and particularly a bus which on the night in question was being operated by one Slaughter. When the cars noted were in the intersection, each in the act of crossing, appellant's bus came along and entered the intersection at a speed of from eighteen to 20 miles per hour. The area comprising the so-called intersection was 45 feet square. The bus was 28 feet long. This bus came thus into the intersection area and attempted a right turn. In accomplishing this, the bus went past the center of Second street, and practically monopolized the street. It obscured all view of plaintiffs' automobile and put defendant Fin-igan strictly on the defensive for his own safety. Finigan, in trying to negotiate the crossing, was forced north across the center line and the bus between him and plaintiffs' car. The bus missed plaintiffs' car by approximately a foot, and Finigan, maneuvering along behind the bus, crashed into the car of plaintiffs, causing the damage forming the basis of the recovery, injuring the car of plaintiffs and the passenger therein. The view of Slaughter, the driver of the bus, during the last 100 feet of his approach to the intersection, was obstructed by a building on the property at the southeast corner and palm trees in the parking abutting said property on the north and west, so that Slaughter did not have a clear and uninterrupted view of the traffic east on Second street for a distance of 200 feet east of said intersection.

[1] The court specifically found Slaughter to have violated the provisions of subdivision (b) (2), § 113, Act 5128, General Laws 1931, by entering the intersection at a speed in excess of 15 miles per hour under the conditions stated. There is one significant bit of evidence that may be noted. Slaughter, the driver, testified as a witness on behalf of defendants and appellants. His testimony was to the effect that he entered the intersection at about 8 or 10 miles per hour. The interesting part, however, is his statement that the bus could not be driven around the corner at a greater speed than 8 or 10 miles per hour. The reason is, not on account of the mechanical construction or the speed capacity of the car, but because at a greater speed the bus would sway and veer to an extent that would shift the passengers from one side to the other. The inference is obvious from the testimony that, if the bus was operated at a speed in excess of 15 miles per hour, it would sway all over the intersecting area, which seems to be exactly what it did on the night in question. The witness was carefully questioned and made cautious answers in this connection, inasmuch as there is no testimony on his part that the bus did not sway and careen through the turn.

[2, 3] We are content to accept the finding of the court, as the evidence amply supports the same. Appellant, however, argues further that, conceding the negligence of Slaughter, the negligent operation of the bus was not the proximate cause of plaintiffs' injuries; that the collision between the two Star cars was something entirely independent of the operation of the bus. Surely there can be little expected from this contention. We have the two smaller cars, each rolling peacefully along and each on its own side of the highway at a point where the only lights afforded were those of the cars, not a chance for an accident nor an iota of hazard, and into this peaceful scene comes hurling itself a 28-foot bus at a speed of twenty miles per hour, careening and twisting as a giant monster. Immediate confusion results, and all is chaos. And this chaos and the results must be chargeable to the one and only cause thereof, namely, the bus. The old squib case announced the doctrine centuries ago that one who negligently sets in motion a series of events stands as sponsor of the result and liable therefor. See, also, Sawdey v. Producers' Milk Co., 107 Cal. App. 467, 290 P. 684, and cases therein cited; Craig v. Boyes, 123 Cal. App. 594, 11 P.(2d) 673, and Herron v. Smith Bros., 116 Cal. App. 518, 2 P.(2d) 1012.

[4] We may take occasion to note that the record before us is not complete. It appears from the transcript that many witnesses illustrated their testimony by maps and diagrams which are not before us. The statement of a witness that the car of plaintiff was here (indicating), the bus came along in this course marked by a dotted line, means absolutely nothing in the absence of the diagram. If a diagram is necessary in the court below, it is more necessary for a complete review of the evidence. Often the position of automobiles after an accident may be a contributory factor in influencing and directing the trial court's finding. All we can do on review is guess, and, with the presumption in favor of the judgment, the guess must follow the presumption.

[5, 6] Appellants' next point concerns the amount of damages. The award of the court is as follows: To plaintiff Tennis Irene Merrill on account of her injuries, $3,500; to plaintiff Joseph E. Merrill on account of loss of services of his wife and expenses for her care, $1,334.20; for damages to auto, $58.50. The last amount was pursuant to stipulation.

We find no specification that the damages were excessive. Appellant subheads this branch of the case thus: "The injuries sustained by Mrs. Merrill were not serious," and then quotes the testimony of Mrs. Merrill and the doctors. We do not find any complaint as to the amount awarded the husband. While the point as to Mrs. Merrill is rather equivocally urged, we may consider it as being sufficiently presented. The sum awarded does not at first blush or at all suggest passion or prejudice. The lady did sustain injuries which caused her much pain and suffering and which have weakened and disabled her from her usual avocation. At the time of the accident she was pregnant, and in April of the same year she was delivered of a normal, healthy child. After the delivery, it was found necessary to operate on the patient by reason of a diseased condition discovered to exist in the organs going to constitute the regenerative processes. The testimony supports the conclusion that this diseased condition was directly traceable to the injuries received in the accident. Also there is testimony to the effect that the injuries received in the accident directly contributed toward creating a condition that will prevent Mrs. Merrill from further conception. These facts, combined with the undisputed fact of pain and suffering endured, show sufficient to uphold the judgment. Appellant criticizes the conclusions of the medical experts, and argues that the situation is one that can be determined as a matter of common knowledge without expert testimony. We decline to claim such a knowledge of the subject as would justify our launching off into any lay discussion. The field of medicine and surgery is highly specialized and beyond our ken. Should we assume a wisdom of curb acquirement, we would prefer to remain among the subjects less liable to debate, such as dandruff and psychiatry.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 4, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Sept. 11, 1933.

1. Judgment $\S$ 256(1).

Judgment should be entered in conformity to jury's verdict and should not enlarge its scope or change its effect (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 664).

2. Trial $\S$ 331.

Verdict, however informal, is good if court can understand it and determine jury's intention.

3. Trial $\S$ 333.

Verdict to be good must be definite as to amount awarded.

4. Trial $\S$ 333.

Verdict held too vague and uncertain as to whether jury intended to award $5,000 or $10,000 against defendant; hence verdict would not support judgment against such defendant.

Verdict provided, in part, that we, the jury, find in favor of plaintiff and against defendant H, and fix plaintiff's damages against said defendant in the sum of $5,000 and jointly in favor of plaintiff against defendant D, jointly with H, and fix plaintiff's damages against said defendant in the sum of $5,000.

5. Automobiles $\S$ 249.

Automobile owner's liability for injuries, based on owner's implied consent to driver's use of automobile, can equal but not exceed amount of recovery against driver (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1714 $\frac{1}{4}$).

6. Automobiles $\S$ 247.

Where verdict was too uncertain to support judgment against automobile driver, judgment against automobile owner whose liability depended on recovery against driver could not stand notwithstanding verdict was certain as to owner (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1714 $\frac{1}{4}$).

7. Appeal and error $\S$ 218(1).

Generally, party cannot attack verdict for first time on appeal if it is susceptible of construction, having lawful effect, but verdict may be so defective as to be subject to such attack.

Respondent instituted this action, alleging damages resulting from injuries which he sustained when he came into collision with an automobile owned by the defendant Dora B. Hand, and operated with her knowledge and consent by Henry W. Hand. The accident occurred on February 24, 1931.

The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury in the above entitled cause, find in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Henry W. Hand and fix plaintiff's damages against said defendant, in the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) and jointly in favor of plaintiff against defendant Dora B. Hand jointly with Henry W. Hand and fix plaintiff's damages against said defendant, in the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00). Dated July 30, 1931. Signed Geo. H. Millener, Foreman."

In the judgment a purported but incorrect copy of the verdict is set forth as follows: "We, the jury in the above entitled cause, find in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, Henry W. Hand, and fix plaintiff's damages in the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) Dollars, and jointly in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Dora B. Hand, jointly with Henry W. Hand, fix plaintiff's damages against said defendants in the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) Dollars."

In order that the inaccuracies in the verdict as incorrectly quoted in the judgment may be easily recognized, we italicize the letter and words which have been added in the judgment and which do not appear in the verdict, and inclose in parentheses the words contained in the verdict which have been omitted in the incorrect copy in the judgment. "We, the jury in the above entitled cause, find in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, Henry W. Hand, and fix plaintiff's damages (against said defendant) in the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) Dollars, and jointly in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Dora B. Hand, jointly with Henry W. Hand, (and) fix plaintiff's damages against said defendants in the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) Dollars."

The effective part of the judgment as entered is as follows: "It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that said plaintiff, Donald Snodgrass by Karl C. Snodgrass, guardian ad litem, do have and recover from the said defendant Henry W. Hand the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) Dollars, and that said plaintiff do have and recover the further sum of Five Thousand ($5,000) Dollars from the defendants Dora B. Hand and Henry W. Hand, jointly, and plaintiff's costs and disbursements incurred in this action amounting to the sum of $208.55."

[1] It will be noted that an additional change in the verdict is made in this portion of the judgment by inserting the word "further" to the recovery clause where judgment is given against both appellants. By the changes in the language of the judgment from that of the verdict an attempt was evidently made to cure the uncertainty of the verdict. When a trial by jury is had, the judgment should be entered "in conformity to the verdict" (section 664, Code Civ. Proc.) and should not enlarge its scope or change its effect.

The sole question presented is whether the verdict is so vague and uncertain that it cannot be determined whether the jury intended to award plaintiff the sum of $5,000 or the sum of $10,000 against Henry W. Hand. We have searched authorities of this and other states in the hope that a similar verdict might have been construed by some court. We have found none and counsel have cited us to none.

[2, 3] In considering this question we must start with the principle recognized in almost every jurisdiction that a verdict, however informal, is good if the court can understand it and determine the intention of the jury which returned it. It is equally true that a verdict to be good must be definite and certain as to the amount awarded so that the judgment entered upon it may conform to the intention of the jury returning it.

[4] It is useless to enter into any discussion of the verdict or to attempt an analysis of its conflicting terms. We have studied it carefully and cannot determine the amount that the jury intended to award against Henry W. Hand, whether $5,000 or $10,000. We have concluded that it is too vague and uncertain to support the judgment against this defendant.

[5, 6] The respondent bases his right to recover from Dora B. Hand on the provisions of section 1714½ of the Civil Code upon the theory that as the owner of the automobile she gave her implied consent to its use by her codefendant. Any liability on her part depends upon a recovery against him. It can equal but not exceed the amount of the recovery against him up to but not more than $5,000. While the verdict is certain as to Dora B. Hand, as any recovery against her depends upon a liability on the part of her codefendant, the judgment against her cannot stand independent of a recovery against him.

Respondent urges that as the record fails to show any objection in the trial court to the form of the verdict, the defect is waived and cannot be urged here for the first time. He cites the following authorities in support of this argument: Hicks v. Coleman, 25 Cal. 122, at page 146, 85 Am. Dec. 103; Van Damme v. McGilvray Stone Co., 22 Cal. App. 191, 133 P. 995; Benson v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 777, 171 P. 948; Asebez v. Bliss, 178 Cal. 137, 172 P. 595; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 P. 9, 18; Harker v. Southern California Edison Co., 83 Cal. App. 204, at page 210, 256 P. 848; People v. Chiappelone, 90 Cal. App. 472, 265 P. 976; People v. Caberera, 104 Cal. App. 414, 286 P. 176; County of Sonoma v. De Winton, 105 Cal. App. 166, at page 177, 287 P. 121; Joerger v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 207 Cal. 8, 276 P. 1017; Johnson v. Visser, 96 Cal. 310, at page 312, 31 P. 106; Keller v. Richbart (Cal. App.) 20 P.(2d) 55. An examination of these cases discloses that their facts are dissimilar from those of the instant case. For that reason they are of little assistance to us.

[7] Under the facts before us we believe the more appropriate rule to be announced in 24 California Jurisprudence 895, as follows: "As a general rule, a party will not be heard to object to a verdict for the first time on appeal if it is susceptible of a construction which may have a lawful and relevant effect. But the verdict may be so defective as to be subject to subsequent attack, although not objected to at the time of its rendition."

As the only question presented here is the form of the verdict it should not be necessary to retry the questions of negligence and contributory negligence which have been decided in favor of respondent.

The judgment is reversed as to the amount of damages recovered by the respondent, with directions to the trial court to retry the issue of damages only and thereafter enter an appropriate judgment in favor of plaintiff.

WARDEN et al. v. BAILEY et al.

Civ. 4732.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

July 21, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨743(2).

Respondent must refer to place in transcript where evidence respondent relies on can be found.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨383.

Irregularities in exercise of unquestionable jurisdiction will not invalidate probate sale nor administrator's deed to extent of making them vulnerable to collateral attack.

3. Evidence ⇨82.

As against collateral attack, conclusive presumption exists, to uphold court's order confirming probate sale, that courthouse "steps" and courthouse "door," recited in notice of sale and return of sale respectively as place of sale, are same public place (Code Civ. Proc. § 1547).

4. Quieting title ⇨44(1).

In quiet title action, defendants had burden of proving prescriptive title in themselves.

5. Adverse possession ⇨94.

Where tax sale is had and redemption made in good faith while party or successor in interest possessed property, redemption operates as payment of taxes, and is sufficient to bring occupant within statute requiring their payment as necessary element in establishing title by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

6. Adverse possession ⇨92.

As respects statutory requirement that claimant must have paid taxes for five years to establish title by adverse possession, redemption from sale for delinquent taxes made by grantors who purchased at tax sale cannot inure to benefit of grantees, adverse claimants, who paid taxes by themselves for four years, where grantors were never in possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

7. Adverse possession ⇨111.

Evidence of prescriptive title was inadmissible where defense was not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles L. Bogue, Judge.

Action by Grace P. Warden and another against Clarence R. Bailey and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Afue McDowell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This action was brought for the purpose of quieting title to lots 12 and 13 of Palm Island tract in Los Angeles county. Judgment went for defendants, and this appeal is prosecuted therefrom.

Neither party has attempted to state the facts of the case in his brief. Apparently they proceed upon the assumption that this court heard all the evidence. We are left to the expedient of picking up such facts as appear here and there throughout the discussion. The transcript is filled with discussions of legal points. The facts are interspersed. If section 2 of rule VIII governing the procedure in this court had been in effect when this appeal was perfected, a much clearer presentation of the issues would have been made.

The title of plaintiffs is predicated upon a deed from the administrator of the estate of Emma A. Stone, deceased. That estate was probated in San Bernardino county, and the deed was executed pursuant to an order confirming a probate sale. Defendants relied at the trial upon two sources of title, to wit, one from a tax sale and one based upon adverse possession.

[1, 2] Respondents contend that the record shows that appellants had no title whatever to the property, for the reason that the probate sale, upon which the latter's title is based, was void. It appears from the record that the notice of sale stated that the sale would be held "at the North steps of the old Court House Building, fronting on Temple Street, in the City of Los Angeles." The notice posted and published so provided. The return of sale recited that the property was sold "at the North door of the old Court House fronting on Temple Street in said City of Los Angeles." Affidavits of posting and publication are attached to this return, as exhibits, and it is stated that the posting and publication were done, "all of which will more fully appear by the affidavits marked respectively Exhibits A and B hereunto annexed and made a part of this return." The order confirming the sale recited that the facts contained in the return of sale were true. Respondents state their point in this language: "Thus, the probate court judicially determined that the sale took place at the Court house door, a place different from the Court House steps, mentioned in the notice of sale." It is stated that there is some evidence in the record indicating that these steps and door are vastly different and far apart, but there is no reference to any place in the transcript where such evidence can be found, and we do not feel that it is incumbent upon this court to discharge this duty which rests upon respondent. There is not even an attempt to quote the testimony upon this point, and we will therefore give it no consideration, assuming it was competent. The posting was done under the provisions of section 1547 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provided that, "when a sale is to be made at public auction, notice of the time and place of sale must be posted in three of the most public places in the county in which the land is situated." It is the rule in this state that irregularities or errors in the exercise of unquestionable jurisdiction will not invalidate such a sale nor the administrator's deed to the extent of making them vulnerable to a collateral attack. Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 P. 408; Estate of Devincenzi, 119 Cal. 498, 51 P. 845.

[3] It has also been held that a finding that a will authorized a sale without notice cannot be questioned under a collateral attack. Bagley v. Bloom, 19 Cal. App. 255, 125 P. 931. In the case of Richardson v. Butler, 82 Cal. 174, 23 P. 9, 11, 16 Am. St. Rep. 101, we find the following language: "The probate court, in its order confirming the sale, declared that the notice of sale was posted in three public places. Respondent introduced evidence, against the objection of appellants, with intent to show that one of the places was not a 'public' place within the meaning of the Code. But surely the court, having jurisdiction of the proceeding, could, within that jurisdiction, find the fact that the place was a public place; and such finding cannot be attacked collaterally." In the instant case the trial court found that the "sales were legally made" and that the "said administrator in all things proceeded with and managed such sale as required by law in such cases made and provided." This being a collateral attack, it will be conclusively presumed, if necessary to uphold the order, that the "North steps of the old Court House fronting on Temple Street" and the "North door of the old Court House fronting upon Temple Street" are one and the same public place, and testimony directed toward disputing such presumption was not admissible. "All intendments are in favor of the validity of judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction of such courts in rendering a particular judgment is conclusively presumed to have been acquired unless the record itself shows to the contrary." Morrissey v. Gray, 162 Cal. 638, 124 P. 246, 249.

Other points are raised in attacking the proceedings relating to the sale, but they are of the same nature and character, and cannot prevail under the rule stated.

[4] We therefore conclude that the probate proceedings relating to the sale of these lots was valid, and that the deed of the administrator conveyed the title of the decedent. This places the burden upon respondents of proving title in themselves. They concede in their brief that they rely entirely upon adverse possession. "Therefore (they state) the appellate court need not wade through the puzzling pages 74 to 199 of opening brief, where appellant incoherently argues the mysteries of the so-called 'illegal taxation.' We felt that the circumstances do not require our joining in that discussion, for, as herein-after shows, the upper court must (?) affirm the judgment on other grounds." Thus appellants abandon their source of title based upon tax deeds, and adhere exclusively to a prescriptive title.

Under the provisions of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the payment of taxes by the adverse holder, if any are assessed against the land, is a necessary element in the establishment of title by adverse possession.

This action was filed March 18, 1925. There is evidence to the effect that defendants went into possession of these lots in 1918. On July 6, 1920, one E. H. Smith purchased lot 12 at a tax sale, based upon the nonpayment of delinquent taxes. Also, on the same date, one Van Lee Hood made a similar purchase of the other lot, No. 13. It is the contention of defendants that the chain of title from Hood and Smith, the purchasers at the tax sale, is complete, and that they are the successors in interest of said purchasers. We will assume that the record supports this contention.

[5, 6] Defendants proved the payments of taxes by themselves for the years 1921, 1922, 1923, and 1924. Under section 325, Code of Civil Procedure, they would have to prove payment of taxes for a period of five years. To meet this requirement they rely upon the redemption from delinquent taxes made by their grantors who purchased at the tax sale. The grantors were never in possession of the property. They merely purchased at the tax sales, and then conveyed to defendants. De-defendants contend that the statutory requirement respecting payment of taxes for the years prior to 1921 is met by proof of the foregoing facts. It is true that, where taxes have been allowed to become delinquent and a sale has taken place, and, so far as appears, a redemption has been made therefor, while the party or his successor in interest was in the undisturbed possession, and all this is done in good faith, such redemption operates as a payment, and is sufficient to bring the occupant within the terms of the statute requiring the payment of taxes as one of the necessary elements in establishing a title by adverse possession. 1 Cal. Jur. p. 568, par. 49. In the instant case, however, the party seeking to prove adverse possession did not personally purchase at the tax sale or effect a redemption. That was all done by his grantors, who never were in possession, and who subsequently conveyed the property to him by deed. The payment of the taxes by his grantors cannot inure to his benefit, for the reason that such grantors were never in possession of the property. The rule which we have stated has never been extended so that it applies to a redemption made by the grantor of the adverse claimant, where such grantors never had possession of the real property. Our conclusion is that the evidence of adverse possession is insufficient, for the reason that the defendants failed to prove the payment of taxes for the statutory period.

[7] The answer of defendants merely denied the allegations of the complaint, which was in the ordinary form of a quiet title action. The statute of limitations was not pleaded. Early in the trial plaintiffs moved to strike out all the evidence of defendants bearing upon the defense of adverse possession, for the reason that such defense was not set up in the answer. It is a well-settled rule of pleading in this state that, "where a claim is made to a prescriptive title, in order to be taken advantage of, and be in issue, it must be pleaded." 1 Cal. Jur. p. 622, par. 88. Upon the objection being made, the trial court suggested that an amendment to the answer would be allowed if requested. Counsel for defendants, however, insisted that it was not necessary to plead the defense and offered no amendment to his answer. The objection was overruled, and therein we conclude that the court erred. Under the pleadings as they stood at and during the trial and as they now stand, evidence of this defense was clearly inadmissible.

For the reason that plaintiffs established a record title to the property and the defendants failed to prove any title in themselves, the judgment is reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, Justice.

By an amended information defendant was accused not only of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, but as well of theretofore having been convicted of a felony. On arraignment, he admitted the truth of the latter charge, but pleaded not guilty as to the former. Following his conviction of the charge of assault with a deadly weapon, he has appealed from the ensuing judgment and from an order by which his motion for a new trial was denied.

Appellant presents two points for reversal of the judgment: First, that the verdict of the jury was not sustained by the evidence; and secondly, that the trial court committed prejudicial error in that, on cross-examination of defendant as a witness in his own behalf, the trial court permitted the prosecution to inquire of defendant whether he had ever been convicted of a felony.

With reference to the first point, an examination of the transcript on appeal reveals the situation that the evidence offered by the prosecution, although contradicted in many essential particulars by defendant, was ample to sustain the verdict. It would serve no useful purpose to set it forth herein. In accord with a host of authorities, the appellant's position in that regard cannot be sustained.

As to appellant's second contention, although it is presented from an unusual standpoint, by an unbroken line of decisions by the appellate tribunals of this state, the point has been ruled that, notwithstanding an admission by defendant on his arraignment that therefore he was convicted of a felony, and in consequence of such admission, that ordinarily the fact of his former conviction should "not be alluded to on the trial" (section 1025, Pen. Code)—should he become a general witness in his own behalf, his credibility as such witness may be tested in the same manner as the credibility of any other witness may be tested. People v. Rogers, 94 Cal. App. 470, 271 P. 351; People v. Fontes, 110 Cal. App. 141, 293 P. 835; People v. Knoth, 111 Cal. App. 250, 295 P. 577; 8 Cal. The judgment and the order by which the motion for a new trial was denied are affirmed.

HOUSER, Justice.

Plaintiffs were the owners of certain real property. Defendants Tatum and La Gasse were agents who represented plaintiffs in the sale of the property to a man named Hess. In order to assist Hess in his plan to improve the property, in consideration for their deed therefor to Hess, instead of receiving cash or its equivalent, at the suggestion and solicitation of defendants Tatum and La Gasse, plaintiffs received from Hess a promissory note secured by a deed of trust of the property, which was made subject to each of two prior mortgages with which Hess had incumbered the property in order to obtain funds with which to make the proposed improvements thereon. Thereafter, on the failure of Hess to pay the indebtedness secured by one of such prior mortgages, as the result of a sale on the execution of a judgment recovered in a suit to foreclose such mortgage, the plaintiffs lost the amount of money represented by the value of the property formerly owned by them and which, as hereinbefore set forth, had been conveyed by them to Hess. Thereupon plaintiffs commenced the instant action against defendants Tatum and La Gasse to recover from them a judgment for the damages suffered by plaintiffs in the transaction. In form, the action was for fraud and deceit alleged to have been practiced by defendants upon plaintiffs in inducing them to sell the property to Hess on the terms hereinbefore indicated. According to the allegations of the amended complaint filed by plaintiffs, in substance, the fraudulent conduct of defendants consisted in the making of intentionally false oral representations by them to plaintiffs concerning the financial responsibility of Hess. In particular, by the amended complaint it was alleged that, "with intent to cheat and defraud plaintiffs," the defendants made the following representations to plaintiffs:

"(a) That the said William B. Hess was a responsible business man;

"(b) That the said C. C. C. Tatum and Simon LaGasse had 'looked up' Mr. Hess and had found that he was rated 'A-1';

"(c) That defendants' investigations showed that said William B. Hess was a very responsible New York business man;

"(d) That said William B. Hess was then building a large apartment house here in Los Angeles, which said apartment house was to be erected in accordance with a sketch then and there shown to plaintiffs;

"(e) That said Simon LaGasse stated that C. C. C. Tatum was a reliable and honest person and that said C. C. C. Tatum would not stand for any 'crooked work';

"(f) That said Simon LaGasse further stated that said William B. Hess was 'financially responsible', and was a man with plenty of money;

"(g) That said C. C. C. Tatum was a responsible person, and that said defendants would not let plaintiffs lose money in the deal; that said defendants would protect plaintiffs against loss;

"(h) That certain property located in Madera county, California, and owned by the said William B. Hess, had been investigated by defendants and found to be owned by Hess, and worth twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00);

"(i) That said defendants stated to plaintiffs as follows: 'That we would not take you into this deal, if we did not know what we were doing.'"

To the amended complaint defendants demurred both generally and specifically; which demurrer was by the trial court sustained, with plaintiffs "given ten days to amend." On the failure of plaintiffs to amend their amended complaint, a judgment of dismissal of the action was entered. It is from such judgment that the instant appeal is prosecuted.

Although certain minor questions of law are raised by the parties to the appeal, it is largely, if not entirely, upon the construction which should be placed upon the provisions of section 1974 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the rights of the respective litigants herein depend. That statute is as follows: "No evidence is admissible to charge a person upon a representation as to the credit of a third person, unless such representation, or some memorandum thereof, be in writing, and either subscribed by or in the handwriting of the party to be charged."

The contention by defendants on the hearing of the demurrer to the amended complaint, and as maintained by them as respondents herein was and is respectively that the provisions of the statute are applicable to the alleged representation made to plaintiffs as hereinbefore set forth, and consequently that the amended complaint failed to state a cause of action against defendants. With reference to that situation, on behalf of appellants, the point is met with the implied admission and assertion respectively that "the authorities are quite well settled that where the representation is strictly as to credit of a third person and no other considerations are involved the statute applies, and the representations must be in writing. The difficulty comes, however, when we consider the relationship existing between the person making the representation and the person to whom representations are made."

[1] In such circumstances, this court is relieved from the necessity of establishing the applicability of the provisions of the statute to a general situation wherein it appears that the representations of which complaint is made concededly embrace facts "as to the credit of a third person." Nor does this court experience any hesitation in declaring that, as tested by the allegations of the amended complaint and weighed by the authorities, the representations in question fall squarely within the requisite precedent conditions demanded by the terms of the statute for its operation. That statements made by one person to a second individual to the effect that a third person with whom the second individual was negotiating with reference to a business transaction was "a responsible business man"; that the first person had "looked up" the third person and found that "he was rated A-1"; that the third person "was a very responsible New York business man"; that he was "financially responsible and was a man with plenty of money"—constituted representations "as to the credit" of such third person is so clear that it would seem a useless task to attempt to establish the correctness of such a conclusion (Nevada Bank v. Portland National Bank [C. C.] 59 F. 338; Cook v. Churchman, 104 Ind. 141, 3 N. E. 759), and that the remaining allegations of the complaint regarding business activities of such "third person" in the matter of the contemplated construction by him of "a large apartment house," together with his ownership of "certain property * * * worth $25,000," also constituted representations "as to the credit of a third person," is attested by the language that occurs in the opinion in the case of McKee v. Rudd, 222 Mo. 344, 121 S. W. 312, 319, 133 Am. St. Rep. 529. It is there said that: "Massachusetts has a similar statute, and in Hunnevell v. Duxbury, 157 Mass. loc. cit. 6, 31 N. E. 700, upon a record appeal of that case, the court said: 'It is well settled that representations made by officers of a corporation with reference to its financial standing or means are made with reference to the credit or ability of another person within the meaning of Pub. St. 1882, c. 78, § 4. Kimball v. Comstock, 14 Gray (Mass.) 508; Wells v. Prince, 15 Gray (Mass.) 562; Mann v. Blanchard, 2 Allen (Mass.) 386; McKinney v. Whiting, 8 Allen (Mass.) 207. The plaintiff does not deny the correctness of this proposition, but contends that a statement that another person is possessed of certain specific property does not come within the provisions of the section, and need not be in writing in order to be actionable. We cannot accede to this proposition. The statute is a general one, purposely broad in its terms, and intended to prevent an understood mischief. It is to be so construed as to make it effectual to prevent the fraud at which it was aimed. To exclude from its operation statements as to the ownership of specific property, if made concerning the "credit, ability, trade, or dealings" of another who is said to be the owner of the specific property would deprive it of force. * * * See, also, Walker v. Russell, 186 Mass. 69, 71 N. E. 86, 88, 1 Ann. Cas. 688, in which other authorities are cited.

[2, 3] But as to some extent hereinbefore has been indicated, the crucial point of law herein involved is whether in view, firstly, of the alleged fiduciary relationship which existed between the plaintiffs and the defendants; or, secondly, because of the further alleged fact that the representations in question were fraudulently made with the intention thereby to deceive and to defraud plaintiffs, an exception was thus created regarding the express provisions of the statute.

Beginning in 1789, with the English case of Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, 1 Rev. Rep. 634, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 235, 100 Eng. Repts. (Full Reprint) 450, and thereafter generally followed not only in English jurisprudence (see headnote annotations in last-cited report), but as well in the United States, as indicated in Patten v. Gurney, 17 Mass. 182, 9 Am. Dec. 141, and Upton v. Vail, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 181, 5 Am. Dec. 210, and note, the principle was recognized and made effective that at common law an action for damages resulting from fraud and deceit would lie when it arose from oral false representations made by one person to another regarding the financial standing or credit of a third person, which to his damage was relied upon by the person to whom such false representations were made. As far as England was concerned, it was not until 1828 that any limitation or restriction was placed upon such common-law right; at which time, by the Act of George IV, c. 14, § 6 (generally known as Lord Tenterden's Act), a statute was passed by which in effect it was provided that "no action shall be brought after the first of January, 1829, to charge any person, upon or by reason of any representation or assurance made or given, concerning or relating to the conduct, credit, ability, trade or dealings of any other person, to the intent or purpose that such other person may obtain credit, money or goods (there) upon unless such representation or assurance be made in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith."

In each of many of the several states of the United States similar statutes, varying somewhat in their respective scopes, have since been enacted. That in this state already has been set forth herein. In Idaho, a statute identical with that in California has been enacted; and it is upon the construction of that statute by the Supreme Court of that state in the case of W. G. Jenkins & Co. v.

Standrod, 46 Idaho, 614, 269 P. 586, 587, that appellants place principal reliance for a reversal of the judgment in the instant case on the ground that, where a fiduciary relationship exists as between the immediate parties to the representation, the provisions of the statute have no application. That was an action brought by a banking corporation to recover a judgment for damages from two of its directors on the ground that, by reason of certain false representations made by the defendants to the remaining directors thereof, the plaintiff corporation had been induced to purchase certain promissory notes from another banking corporation, of which latter corporation the defendants were also directors; the false representations being "that all of said notes were good and were worth face value, and would be paid and liquidated in the ordinary course of banking." It is there very definitely ruled that the statute in question "was not intended to cover oral representations made in violation of a fiduciary relationship." However, at the outset of its discussion of the issue there presented, the court made it plain that it was not considered necessary to discuss the applicability of the statute to the representations made by the defendants, but that "the question here is to be viewed rather as the breach by defendants of their duties as fiduciaries, and does not necessarily depend upon the actual representations alleged."

Another case in point for the appellants is that of Vertrees v. Head & Matthews, 138 Ky. 83, 127 S. W. 523, wherein it is held that the statute does not embrace representations that are deceitfully made, but only such as are made in good faith respecting the credit or standing of another.

In a note contained in 9 A. L. R. pages 536, 540, the broad statement appears that "by the weight of authority a statute requiring a writing to make effective a representation as to the credit of another does not apply to representations made with the intention to defraud"; and several authorities emanating from each of the appellate tribunals of the states of Indiana, Kentucky, and Michigan are cited in support thereof. So that it may be not doubted that eminent authority exists for the position assumed by appellants herein and for the establishment whereof in this state they so stoutly contend.

On the other hand, in the same note of volume 9, A. L. R. at page 542 thereof, immediately following the citation of the authorities to which reference just has been had, occurs the statement that "in other jurisdictions the view seems to obtain that since the Statute of Frauds contains no exception with respect to fraudulent representations as to the credit of a third person no such exception can be introduced by the courts"—citing authorities from each of the several states of Alabama, Indiana (Cook v. Churchman, 104 Ind.

141, 3 N. E. 759), Maine, Massachusetts, Missouri, as well as several from England. In that connection, and dealing with each of appellants' asserted exceptions to the apparent expressed intent of the statute, is the well-considered case of Knight v. Rawlings, 205 Mo. 412, 104 S. W. 38, 44, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 212, 12 Ann. Cas. 325, wherein many authorities are exhaustively reviewed. In substance and effect, it is there emphatically and positively declared that the statutory provision is a complete bar to an action for damages for false oral representations made with respect to the credit of a third person, regardless of whether such representations were made either in good faith or with knowledge of their falsity, in order to deceive and defraud the plaintiff, or in pursuance of a conspiracy with the person in regard to whose credit the representations were made. In that regard, in part, the language of the court is as follows: "Now it is a familiar doctrine that, when the statute of another state or country is adopted by the Legislature of this state, the construction placed upon that statute prior to its adoption in this state will be presumed to have met the approval of our Legislature when adopting it. We have seen that Lord Tenterden's act was enacted in 1828, and the courts of England had, prior to 1845, expressly ruled that a false representation as to the credit of another would not take the case out of that act. And considering the purpose of that act and the causes which led to its adoption, particularly the case of Pasley v. Freeman, and the great weight of authority in this country, we are inclined to the opinion expressed by Browne in his work on the Statute of Frauds, and hold that the plain meaning of this statute is that it requires a writing to charge a defendant upon any representation made in regard to the credit, etc., of a third party whether such representation is made in good faith, or is known to be false and made in order to deceive and defraud the plaintiff, because the presence of this very element of intention to deceive and defraud was the very point upon which the court, in Pasley v. Freeman, held that the statute of frauds of 29 Car. II did not apply. The plain purpose of Lord Tenterden's act was to require a writing in a case for which St. 29 Car. II had failed to provide, and to sustain the contention of the plaintiff in this case we must go to Pasley v. Freeman and ignore the statute (section 3422, Rev. St. 1899 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 1965]) which was enacted to remedy the ruling in that case. To do that we must import an exception into the statute, a restriction and exception which its language does not justify."

Appraising the authorities generally which have a direct bearing upon the construction which should be placed upon statutes of similar force and effect as the California statute, it is said in 25 Ruling Case Law, p. 445: "The view is taken in some cases that the statute does not apply where representations are made with actual fraudulent intent, but should be restricted to cases of unintentional misrepresentations. The better opinion, however, is to the contrary, for there is no such restriction in the statute. And the fact that the complaint contains averments charging a conspiracy cannot affect the question. The purpose of the statute cannot be disappointed by the form of the complaint. The necessity that the representations should have been made in writing is the same, where a conspiracy is set up as where it is not." Likewise, in volume 14, A. & E. Encyclopedia of Law, page 33, occurs the statement: "Some courts have held that the statute does not apply to cases of actual fraud; that is, to cases in which the representation is not only false, but is made with fraudulent intent. The better opinion, however, is to the contrary, for there is no such restriction in the statute."

No useful purpose would be subserved by a review herein of the many cases in which opinions of the courts have been expressed either respectively in accord or in disagreement with the views of the court in the case of Knight v. Rawlings, 205 Mo. 412, 104 S. W. 38, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 212, 12 Ann. Cas. 325, to which reference hereinbefore has been had. As a matter of course, the principle of construction is recognized that a statute of the nature of that here under consideration, if practicable, should be so construed as to prevent it from operating as a protection to or as a shield of fraudulent practices. Nevada Bank v. Portland Nat. Bank (C. C.) 59 F. 338; Stauffer v. Hulwick, 176 Ind. 410, 96 N. E. 154, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 951. On the other hand, it must be apparent, as is stated in each of many of the authorities, that the statute is but a supplement to the statute of frauds; and, although it may not infrequently happen that by the strict operation of the statute a palpable fraud may result in a financial loss to some unfortunate individual, in the vast majority of cases the rule announced by the statute effectively operates to prevent the perpetration of fraud. The language of section 1974 of the Code of Civil Procedure is all-inclusive. Apparently, its provisions embrace any person who may make representations "as to the credit of a third person." No express exception is made as to a person who stands in a confidential relation to the person to whom such representation is made. Nor is any such exception made regarding the intention of the person who may make the representation, whether made honestly or in "bad faith." Not only the history of the statute, but as well the decisions to which reference hereinbefore has been had, indicate that the purpose of the original English statute was to extend or to supplement the statute of frauds, as far as its provisions related to promises "to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another." At least the later statute is analogous to the former. If, generally speaking, neither of appellants' asserted exceptions finds recognition in the law as it may affect the statute of frauds, it would seem improbable that either of the claimed implied exceptions to section 1974 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for which the appellants here contend, could have application. In circumstances similar to those present in the instant action, the weight of authority fails to sustain the position assumed by the appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEWIS et al.*
Cr. 2319.

July 24, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨660(2).

On motion for diminution of record, presumption is that movant's uncontradicted affidavit is true.

2. Appeal and error ⇨659(3).

Appellant was entitled to diminution of record to show that written notice of appeal was reformed by insertion of appellant's name therein after due notice (Pen. Code, § 1239).

3. Appeal and error ⇨801(1).

On motion to dismiss appeal, presumption is in favor of judgment reforming notice of appeal on motion, where record is otherwise silent as to procedure and evidence heard by trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 16; Pen. Code, § 1239).

4. Appeal and error ⇨799.

Burden rests on appellee to establish by clear and convincing evidence lack of jurisdiction of appeal.

5. Appeal and error ⇨782.

Appellee held not entitled to dismissal of appeal because lack of jurisdiction did not clearly appear by record.

Proceeding by the People against C. K. Lewis and others. From an adverse judgment, C. K. Lewis and A. B. Crist appeal. On appellee's motion to dismiss appeal of appellant C. K. Lewis and on motion of such appellant for diminution of the record.

Motion to dismiss appeal denied, and motion for diminution of record granted.

Robert H. Patton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Belford, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, Justice.

The questions which are submitted at this time in relation to the instant appeal affect, first, a motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal of defendant Lewis, and, secondly, a motion by said defendant for diminution of the record.

The grounds of the motion to dismiss said appeal are that it was not perfected as required by section 1239 of the Penal Code, in that neither an oral nor a written notice of any appeal from the judgment in the action was either given or filed by said defendant in accordance with the provisions of said statute. In neither of such respects is it asserted by said defendant that, as far as the face of the record herein disclosed at the time when said motion was filed, the facts were other than that no oral notice of appeal from the judgment was ever given by him, or that his written notice of appeal was not filed until after the time prescribed by the statute had expired. However, by his motion for diminution of the record, said defendant has proposed to show that in legal effect his written notice of appeal from the judgment was actually filed within the time limited by the terms of section 1239, Penal Code, and hence that the motion to dismiss his appeal should be denied. To that end, he has produced, and has requested from this court leave to file, a duly certified "supplement to clerk's transcript," which in substance shows that "good cause appearing therefor," by order of a judge of the superior court the original notice of appeal from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial which purportedly was given and filed in behalf of his codefendant Crist only, be amended by inserting the words "C. K. Lewis" in the notice of appeal herein filed on December 2, 1932, after the words "A. B. Crist where the same appear." The said supplement to the clerk's transcript also contains a new notice of appeal, which is in accord with said order, to which is appended the notation (apparently made by a deputy clerk of the court) "amended by order of court by inserting the words 'C. K. Lewis,' this 20" day of April, 1933."

The motion for diminution of the record was accompanied by an affidavit made by the attorney who represents said defendant on his appeal, a part of which being as follows: " * * * That the original Clerk's Transcript submitted on this appeal shows the original Notice of Appeal filed on December 2, 1932 (Cl. Tr., pp. 94-5); that the name of appellant, C. K. Lewis was improperly omitted from said Notice of Appeal; that on March 23, 1933, upon motion of attorney for appellant C. K. Lewis, after due notice to the District Attorney of Los Angeles County, the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles duly made its order, a true copy of which is attached hereto reforming said Notice of Appeal by the insertion therein of the name of C. K. Lewis. That it is necessary for the proper presentation of this appeal on behalf of the appellant, C. K. Lewis that the said order of reformation and Notice of Appeal reformed in accordance therewith be included in the records of this appeal."

[1-5] Since no counter affidavit was filed herein, the statement of facts set forth in the affidavit of counsel is presumed to be true. Nor has the respondent filed any objection to said motion. From such situation, it appearing to the court that the said defendant is entitled to have the record herein corrected as hereinbefore has been indicated, it follows that his motion for diminution of the record in accordance with the notice of his motion therefor should be granted. The record thus amended and corrected so as to show, as it now does, that the said defendant gave due and timely notice of his appeal from the judgment, the consequence should be that the motion to dismiss said appeal on the ground stated in the notice therefor should fail. However, with regard thereto, the point is now urged by respondent that the trial court was without jurisdiction to make the order by which defendant Crist's notice of appeal from the judgment was amended. Other than the affidavit of the attorney for said defendant (a part of which having been hereinbefore quoted), the record herein is silent either as to the procedure (other than by "motion") adopted by said defendant in the lower court in presenting his request thereto for the order in question, or as to what, if any, evidence was introduced to the trial court on the hearing of such "motion." In such circumstances, the presumption is not only in favor of the jurisdiction and authority of the trial court to make the order of which respondent complains, but as well that in all respects the order is valid. Subdivision 16, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.; 7 Cal. Jur. 583; 1928 Supp. to Cal. Jur. 554; 1932 Supp. to Cal. Jur. 293; and authorities respectively there cited. The burden of establishing by clear and convincing evidence the facts upon which an asserted lack of jurisdiction depended rested upon the respondent. In re Estate of Wiechers, 199 Cal. 523, 527, 250 P. 397. If for no other reason, in the absence of any record of the facts upon which to base a conclusion of lack of jurisdiction, the motion of respondent in that regard should not prevail.

It is ordered that the motion for diminution of the record be and it is granted; and that the motion to dismiss the appeal of defendant Lewis be, and it is, denied.

ANDREWS, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from a judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury. The plaintiffs sued as the widow and children of the deceased husband, who was killed in the automobile collision involved in this action. The road at the point of the impact was paved to the width of 24 feet, and had oiled shoulders on each side to the width of 8 feet. The time of the occurrence of the accident was about 8:30 o'clock at night. The deceased was driving a Buick passenger automobile in an easterly direction, and defendant F. Cocola was driving a heavy truck loaded with about four tons of grapes in a westerly direction. As a result of the impact, the left front of the truck was damaged, the left front wheel broken off, and the front bumper badly twisted. The truck swerved down across its left side of the highway and landed against a bank adjoining the road. The Buick automobile was wrecked completely from the driver's position to the rear part; the front fenders and bumper not showing serious damage.

The contention of defendants is that the evidence shows conclusively and as a matter of law that the driver of the Buick car was guilty of contributory negligence, and defendant Mastro makes the further claim that the evidence does not establish liability on his part because the only deduction which can be drawn would be that he was not interested in the truck in question or the grapes which were being transported, that he was not a partner of the driver of the truck, and that no basis for liability as against him is established.

1. The claim of contributory negligence is predicated upon two grounds: (a) That the driver of the Buick automobile was not driving as closely as practicable to the right-hand edge of the highway as required by section 122 of the California Vehicle Act, and (b) that the driver of the Buick automobile was not observing where he was driving and was driving at an excessive and unlawful rate of speed. The section referred to reads as follows: " * * * In driving upon the right half of a highway the driver shall drive as closely as practicable to the right hand edge or curb of the highway except when overtaking or passing another vehicle, or when placing a vehicle in position to make a left turn."

The contention of defendant upon this branch of the subject is that the testimony of the driver of the truck and the witness John Mastro who was riding with him, the only eyewitnesses of the occurrence, shows that, while the truck was being driven on its own side of the road at a speed of about 25 miles per hour, the Buick, which they had observed approaching at a rate of speed which they estimated at 45 or 50 miles per hour, suddenly swerved to the left and ran into the front of the truck, deflecting it from its course and leaving it out of control, whereby it swung down to the left across the highway, landing on a dirt embankment about 50 feet from the point of impact; that the Buick automobile, after the accident, and after the driver was thrown out at the point of contact, proceeded more than 100 feet along its course and landed against an embankment on the side of the highway upon which it was traveling; that the marks and indications of the accident left upon the pavement were all at or near the center of the highway, indicating that the collision took place on the center line of the road, and demonstrating by these physical facts that the Buick was driven, not close to the right-hand edge of the highway, but close to or across the center of the highway.

[1] In weighing the testimony of the driver of the truck and the witness who was riding with him, the jury were entitled to take into account the interest which these witnesses had in the result of the suit and their natural bias in favor of defense, and were also required to determine the effect of other testimony tending to impeach the credibility of these witnesses. They also may have weighed the testimony in the light of its inherent probable truthfulness, considering its reasonableness and the controlling force of the physical evidence shown to exist on the cars and pavement.

The witness W. A. Heimann, a hardware merchant who was driving along the highway, came upon the scene almost immediately after the accident. He took the driver of the truck and the witness Mastro with him to the next town, where they asked to be taken to see a doctor. This witness testified that Cocola told him he did not know how the accident happened, it was so sudden, and that Mastro was asleep and did not see the accident. He also testified that Mastro said he was asleep and did not see what occurred.

In their testimony several witnesses described the debris remaining after the accident as being strewn along the outside portion of the highway on the side which the Buick machine was traveling with very little of such evidence at or near the center of the highway. The physical marks demonstrating whatever deduction could be properly made from them were testified to by many witness and were the principal issues of the case. Photographs illustrating the various claims of the parties form a part of the transcript.

One of the contentions of the plaintiffs, which there was evidence tending to support, was that the truck, at the time of the accident, had veered from its own side over several feet from the center, onto the side of the road upon which the Buick car was traveling, and in so doing ran into the side of the Buick car; the theory being that the driver had lapsed into sleep momentarily. No interpretation of the evidence left upon the pavement can amount to demonstration, as a matter of law, of what did actually take place. If the truck did cross the center line and run into the Buick, it is impossible to say where the Buick was traveling with reference to the center or the outside edge of the road. It was peculiarly an issue for the jury to determine.

[2] It is also the province of the jury to determine, from all the evidence in the case and the condition of the highway, whether or not the driver of a vehicle drove "as closely as practicable to the right-hand edge or curb of the highway" at the time of the accident as required by section 122 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2124, § 41). A jury, called upon to apply the statute to a particular case, must be guided by the well-settled rule that what a man of ordinary prudence would have done under the circumstances would be considered a practicable compliance with the law.

[3] It will therefore be impossible to find as a matter of law, either from the direct testimony of the witnesses or from the surrounding circumstances and evidence of physical facts, just where the Buick car must have been traveling or whether such position would be in violation of the statutory requirement.

[4] Upon the question of contributory negligence arising from want of attention and excessive speed, the presumption is that a deceased person killed in the operation of a car, whose conduct in its management is involved in litigation, has exercised those instincts of self-preservation which are inherent in human nature and did the acts which he was required to do in a careful and prudent manner. So far as affirmative evidence as to the speed of the Buick automobile is concerned, there is none to indicate a rate beyond that permitted by law, except the testimony of the driver of the truck, who made an estimate of from 45 to 50 miles per hour. One witness, who was driving a car in the same direction at the rate of about 35 miles an hour and whose car the Buick automobile passed not long before the accident, estimated the speed of the Buick at 40 to 45 miles per hour.

The real contention of the defendants in this connection is that the evidence of what took place at the time of the collision, the way in which the truck was thrown out of its line of travel, and the distance the Buick ran after the impact, indicates a much greater speed than the legal rate. This sort of reasoning gets us into the region of pure speculation, and leaves the question one for the jury and not for this or any other court. Upon the entire survey of the evidence, the jury found the driver of the Buick car not guilty of contributory negligence, and that finding cannot be disturbed.

2. Defendant Mastro contended at the trial, and here contends, and after the verdict made a motion which involves the contention, that the evidence of his relationship with the truck driver involved in the accident does not justify any judgment against him. The apparent reason why the question of his liability was submitted to the jury arose out of the testimony given by Mr. Cocola, driver of the truck, in a deposition taken before the trial and introduced in evidence at the trial, in which the witness testified that defendant Mastro was his partner "in the grapes." He was not cross-examined in the taking of the deposition and did not undertake to explain the nature of their relations which he concluded was a partnership, or what their interests in the grapes in fact were.

On the trial of the case the other defendant Cocola and the defendant Mastro, as well as the defendant who had given the deposition, went at length into the business relationship between them, and it developed that the arrangement under which the grapes were being handled did not amount to a partnership or any joint interest in common in the grapes being hauled at the time of the accident. This testimony which was elicited under prolonged examination and cross-examination was apparently so conclusive and uncontradicted that other evidence to rebut or in corroboration, which would have been possible, was not used, and was a complete and harmonious explanation of the testimony given by the defendant truck driver in the deposition. Notwithstanding this, and doubtless because of the testimony in the deposition, the question was submitted to the jury, and the jury by its general verdict found against this evidence and that defendant Mastro was liable.

In the instructions given by the trial court to the jury there appears one reading as follows: "You are instructed that it is admitted by the pleadings in this case that all the defendants were operating the G. M. C. truck, which was being driven by F. Cocola, and if, under the instructions herein given you, you find F. Cocola liable, you shall likewise find the other defendants liable."

This instruction, relating to a condition of the record about which the jury would have no other knowledge, required a finding on their part of a fact not justified by the reference to the pleadings, and left no alternative but to find against defendant Mastro if the other defendants were found liable. The case was originally brought by plaintiffs against the two defendants, Cocola, and Frank Mastro was not made a party, but there were some John Does included in the title. Defendant Mastro was served long after the other defendants as a John Doe defendant, and doubtless because of the evidence in the deposition above referred to. The two defendants Cocola filed their answer December 18, 1931, in which, by not denying the fact that they were the owners of the truck in question, they admitted that fact. Defendant Mastro filed his answer February 29, 1932, more than two months subsequent and after the case had been set for trial, and in his answer he denied all the allegations of that part of the complaint which related to the ownership of the truck by defendants.

Apparently the trial court gave the instruction without attention to the history of the pleadings. Upon the state of the evidence, it might be a matter of some hesitation to say that this court would reverse the judgment as to Mastro upon the ground that no substantial evidence supported it, but, with the error which was introduced into the case by this instruction, it becomes mandatory that, as to him, the judgment must be reversed, and in so doing it may be that substantial justice will be worked out.

The judgment of the trial court is sustained as to the defendants F. Cocola and M. Cocola and reversed as to defendant Frank Mastro.

We concur: BARNARD, P. J.; MARKS, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

Respondents have filed a petition for a rehearing for the purpose and to the end that the judgment against Frank Mastro should also be affirmed.

[5] It is contended that the court properly instructed the jury that it was admitted by the pleadings that all of the defendants were operating the truck in question, for the reason that an allegation in the complaint to that effect was denied by the defendant Mastro upon information or belief, and that such a denial was not sufficient to raise an issue since the facts with respect thereto were within his personal knowledge.

Conceding such to be the general rule, a situation somewhat out of the ordinary here appears. The complaint, which alleged that "the defendants were operating and driving a G. M. C. truck" on the occasion in question, named F. Cocola, M. Cocola, John Doe, and three other fictitious names, as defendants. Frank Mastro, sued as John Doe, later appeared by answer, in which the allegation referred to was denied on information or belief. At the trial, after introducing evidence to the effect that F. Cocola and M. Cocola owned the G. M. C. truck involved, the plaintiff introduced evidence to the effect that Mastro was a partner of F. Cocola in the business in which the truck was being used at the time of the accident, and that he had an interest in the grapes being hauled. Later, the defendant Mastro introduced evidence to the contrary, the record of which, with the extensive cross-examination, is quite voluminous.

While the answer is technically lacking in the respect noted, it fully appears from the record that the parties acted upon the same as a denial of the allegation and as creating an issue, and that throughout the trial this was treated as a controversial issue of fact. Under such circumstances we think it was prejudicial error to give the instruction to which we have referred.

[6] A further consideration is that the court gave conflicting instructions on this very issue. After instructing the jury that if they found F. Cocola guilty of negligence, which was the proximate cause of the collision, the court added: "Then you shall find that such of the defendants as were responsible for the operation of said truck are liable," etc. Again, after giving the instruction as to the purported admission made by the pleadings, the court gave the following: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that F. Cocola and Frank Mastro were jointly interested in the grapes which were being transported in the Cocola truck, and that the same were being handled with Mastro's knowledge and approval, then said Frank Mastro is chargeable with and responsible for the acts and conduct of F. Cocola." All of these instructions were given at the request of the plaintiffs, and not only are they conflicting, but the plaintiffs, by presenting evidence and asking for instructions upon the issue of fact concerning the liability of defendant Mastro, waived any technical objection as to the failure of the answer to raise such an issue.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to recover money. Said judgment was against plaintiff and in favor of all defendants, adjudging that plaintiff recover nothing and awarding costs to each defendant.

Without further preliminary we launch off into the facts. Some argument is raised as to what were the real issues in the case and inasmuch as the findings are somewhat general there does seem room for argument. However, we may take appellant's contention in this connection as being sufficient for present purposes. The defendants were jointly engaged in the procurement of leases and in the development of certain unproven oil lands of the class generally designated as "wild cat." A certain oil company known as Neame Oil Company had leased some 295 acres of land in Tulare county to parties named Haas and Jones. These lessees had entered upon the lands and undertook the development thereof through sinking a well in the hope of discovering oil. After the well had been sunk some distance, the defendants came upon the scene. They purchased the Haas-Jones interests and the Neame lease was transferred and assigned to defendants and a new deal inaugurated which embraced not only the original 295 acres but took in some 13,000 acres of leasehold. The specific plan seemed to be to proceed with the well then being bored and acquire sufficient other lease interests so that if the field proved a producer greater benefits might result to all concerned. In the original Neame lease and as it was assigned and re-executed there was provision for diligent development and a forfeiture clause. The latter, however, was not self-executing but required declaration of forfeiture with specifications and continuing default for thirty days after notice. As hereinbefore stated, when Haas and Jones sold and assigned to defendants there was a well being bored on the Neame Oil Company's property. The agreement between Haas-Jones and defendants provided for the continuation of this well and among other things the defendants agreed as follows: To pay Haas-Jones $1,000 each month until oil or gas in paying quantities shall be discovered by them in their drilling operations carried on pursuant to the drilling requirements of the Neame Oil Company lease or until such drilling operations shall be abandoned by reason of the encountering of formations, recognized by geologic experience as unfavorable to the production of oil and gas in paying quantities. Shortly after defendants took over the property the plaintiff and appellant herein presented to defendants an order in writing signed by Haas-Jones and reading as follows:

"Messrs. B. P. Glenn, V. Hitchcock and George H. Puntenney, copartners, doing business under the fictitious name of Lincoln Finance Company.

"Gentlemen: You will please pay to Mrs. Georgia A. Rea of Kingsburg, California, the sum of Six Thousand Six Hundred ($6600.00) Dollars out of any and all moneys to become due and payable to us from you pursuant to and in accordance with that certain agreement, bearing date the 23rd day of July, 1926, made by and between yourselves as parties of the first part, and the undersigned as parties of the second part, which agreement relates to matters pertaining to the development of the Neame Oil Company lease, and other oil and gas leases. This order is made subject to a prior order from us in favor of the Neame Oil Company bearing date the 23rd day of July, 1926. Upon the making of payments pursuant to this order you will charge the same to our account under said contract. Dated and signed this 11th day of August, 1926.

"Robert C. Hass,
"C. C. Jones."

The defendants accepted the order as indicated by the following indorsement thereon:

"The foregoing order is hereby accepted this 30th day of August, 1926.

"Lincoln Finance Company,

"A. G. Wessling, Pres.

"By B. P. Glenn, Sec'y."

Incidentally it may be noted that defendants were doing business under the style of Lincoln Finance Company and no question is presented on this.

It is conceded that payments were made for the month of October, 1926, namely $1,000. The action is to recover from defendants the balance of $5,600. The court below found nothing was owing by defendants and their liability under the acceptance had been fully discharged. The main point urged by appellant is that the evidence does not support this finding. The theory of the case at the trial was that there was an abandonment of operations owing to the geological formation having become such as to render futile further boring. Appellant assumes that the court below did so find and that this was the basis of the ultimate finding of nonliability. Inasmuch as appellant seems to concede that if there was an abandonment of operations the judgment must be affirmed, we will decline to go into the technique of procedure relative to implied findings and go direct to this one question. It is conceded that there is sufficient evidence to establish the fact that in October of 1926 the defendants did encounter in the well formations recognized by geological experience as unfavorable to the production of oil and gas in paying quantities. The fact is thus established that defendants did reach a point where further boring could, within the terms of the contract, be abandoned. Whatever the effect of this may be it was a fact to be considered in determining whether the operations were abandoned.

There is in the record positive testimony that on October 25, 1926, all operations at the well ceased; that the defendants were without funds; and that the only thing thereafter done was the cleaning out of the well and removing the tools and such matter as may have accumulated or been lost in the hole. The positive testimony of defendants is that at the time named, October 25, 1926, the operations were entirely abandoned and the record fails to disclose anything by way of overt act in or about the premises to controvert this testimony. However, argues appellant, there were certain acts of the defendants that negative any notion of abandonment. This contention might be summarily disposed of by holding that this latter evidence simply created a conflict in the evidence. Yet we prefer to dispose of the point on its merits.

[1, 2] The sum total of the claim of appellant is that after the date of the claimed abandonment the defendants did attempt to interest third parties in the venture and to dispose of their holdings not only in the lands which included the well but also in the 13,000 acres that went to embrace their holdings in the field. It was manifestly an attempt to salvage what they could or to reimburse themselves in the adventure. Such conduct would not completely negative the claim of abandonment. And here we may consider the essentials of an abandonment under the facts of the instant case. The question of abandoning operations is somewhat different from the question of an abandonment of property in its most general sense. All of the law on the general subject of abandonment has reference to a complete abandonment rather than the cessation of any particular line of endeavor. Here it is fair to construe the phrase of the contract "abandon operations" as simply meaning to cease operations with no intention of renewing the same. It did not mean that defendants should abandon the entire project or that they should withdraw entirely from the field. All of the drilling operations specified were in this one well started by Haas and Jones. Their operations could be abandoned and the interests of defendants in the field remain otherwise unaffected. There was evidence that in January of 1927 the defendants negotiated with Haas and Jones, looking toward a forbearance of forfeiture and extension of privilege to resume boring. These negotiations were conditioned upon defendants' securing new parties to take the well. This was evidence as much in favor of an abandonment of operations by defendants as it was to the contrary. Taken in its entirety, the evidence supports the finding of an abandonment of operations on the well in question. The original obligees, Haas and Jones, recognized the abandonment or at least the record bears that construction of the situation. Haas and Jones, Neame Oil Company, and defendants by and through various agreements were co-operating in the lease interests acquired on the larger acreage and working together toward the proving of the entire field. The negotiations and agreements of the parties after the cessation of operations were general and affected the entire holdings rather than indicating retention of the well and intent to continue the boring.

[3, 4] The court, as indicated, found against appellant on every issue and while the only evidence attacked as insufficient involves the abandonment, so termed, there would be other findings ample to sustain the judgment. The question of abandonment, whether it be a complete abandonment or a cessation of operations with intention of never resuming, is always one of act and intent. Every fact and circumstance is to be considered and given its proper weight. And we think this is exactly what the trial court did and in our opinion it reached a conclusion finding ample support in the evidence. Findings of ultimate facts are binding upon appeal, not only when there is a direct conflict regarding the probative facts, but when those facts are fairly susceptible to opposing inferences. Northwestern P. C. Co. v. Atlantic P. C. Co., 174 Cal. 312, 163 P. 47.

This being the only point urged, the judgment is affirmed.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs filed this action seeking to quiet title to three placer mining claims. Defendant answered denying plaintiffs' title and asserted title in himself. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant quieting his title as against plaintiffs except as hereinafter noted. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

On March 25, 1911, A. R. Lendner and his associates, all citizens of the United States, went in and upon unoccupied and unappropriated mineral lands of the United States and located ten contiguous placer mining claims under the claim names of Sheep Creek Placer Mining Claims numbered 1 to 10, inclusive, constituting a consolidated group. The land at the time of entry had been duly surveyed by the United States government and the sections and legal subdivisions thereof were distinctly marked by said United States public survey so that the exterior boundaries of the sections and subdivisions thereof could be readily traced and the quarter section corners thereof could be easily ascertained. All locations were according to and coincided with the legal subdivisions of the property, according to the United States public survey. Mineral in place, to wit, certain lime deposits of commercial quantity and value, were found on each of the claims, monuments were erected, and location notices were posted in a conspicuous place on the monuments on the date of location. Copies thereof were recorded in the office of the county recorder where the land is situated within thirty days. Whatever title the original locators had, now vests in defendant, a citizen of the United States. That defendant and his predecessors in interest performed the necessary annual labor on said claims is unchallenged except for the year 1916. The trial court found that the annual labor was performed by defendant on all of the claims for the year 1916. Appellants challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding and this matter will be discussed hereafter. The defendant and his predecessors in interest at no time actually marked the boundaries of the claims on the land. On March 9, 1930, plaintiffs located three placer mining claims named Monarch (Claims Nos. 1, 2, and 3, respectively, on portions of Sheep Creek Claims Nos. 5, 6, and 8, and all of Sheep Creek Claim No. 7. In 1920, a stranger to this action obtained a patent from the United States government covering portions of Sheep Creek Claims Nos. 5 and 6, called the Jersey Bull patent. The judgment in this case does not purport to affect the property covered thereby. Subsequent to the issue of said patent, the defendant and his predecessors in interest did not relocate the portions of Sheep Creek Claims Nos. 5 and 7, which were excluded from the Jersey Bull patent. The final judgment in this action will determine the title to those portions of the property embraced within Sheep Creek Claims Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 8, which are also covered by plaintiffs' claims designated as Monarch No. 1, Monarch No. 2, and Monarch No. 3. Other facts necessary to the determination of the issues will be set forth in connection with the points of law applicable thereto.

[1] Appellants contend that defendant has no title to the mining claims for the reason that no notice of location was posted at the point of discovery and the boundaries of the claims were not marked. Respondent's reply to this contention is that it is unnecessary to post the notice of location at the point of discovery or to mark the boundaries when a placer claim is located where the United States survey has been extended over the land embraced in the location. We are convinced that respondent's contention is correct. Civil Code, § 1426, provides that when a lode claim is located, notice of location shall be posted "at the point of discovery," and further that the notice shall show "the number of linear feet claimed in length along the course of the vein, each way from the point of discovery, with the width on each side of the center of the claim, and the general course of the vein or lode, as near as may be." United States Revised Statutes, § 2324 (30 USCA § 28), provides: "The location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced." It is thus seen, as to a lode claim, all measurements start from the point of discovery and that there is a specific requirement to post the notice at the point of discovery. It is the starting point from which all measurements must be made. The boundaries of the claim must be marked, Civ. Code, § 1426a; U. S. Rev. St. § 2324 (30 USCA § 28).

A different procedure is provided for the location of placer mining claims. Section 1426c of the Civil Code provides in part: "The location of a placer claim shall be made in the following manner: By posting thereon * * * a notice of location. * * " It will be noted that it does not require the notice to be posted at the point of discovery. The same Code section then provides: " * * provided, that where the United States survey has been extended over the land embraced in the location, the claim may be taken by legal subdivisions and no other reference than those of said survey shall be required and the boundaries of a claim so located and described need not be staked or monumented. The description by legal subdivisions shall be deemed the equivalent of marking." United States Revised Statutes § 2329 (30 USCA § 35), contains a similar provision. It is thus seen that the purpose of distinctly marking the location is to provide a means of readily tracing the boundaries. However, the United States government, by its public survey, has already provided the markings by which the boundaries can be traced and no other monuments or markings can be used with which to trace the boundaries. Section 2329, Revised Statutes of the United States (30 USCA § 35), provides: "Where the lands have been previously surveyed by the United States, the entry in its exterior limits shall conform to the legal subdivisions of the public lands." The provisions of law above referred to would seem to make it clear that it is unnecessary to post the notice of location at the point of discovery or to mark the exterior boundaries when a placer claim is located where the United States survey has been extended over the land embraced in the location. Our conclusions in this regard are supported by the case of Kern Oil Co. v. Crawford, 143 Cal.

298, 76 P. 1111, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 993. The evidence supports the finding of the trial court that a notice of location was posted on each of the Sheep Creek claims at the time of discovery.

[2, 3] Plaintiffs' next contention is that defendant or his predecessors forfeited any rights they may have had for failing to perform the annual assessment work in 1916. A copy of the affidavit of proof of annual labor, duly certified by the county recorder, was put in evidence, which is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that the annual assessment work for the year 1916 was done on said claims in the time and manner and to the extent required by law (Civ. Code, § 1426m). The trial court could have rested its finding that the annual labor for 1916 was done on the oral testimony in the record without considering the affidavit of proof of annual labor. Musser v. Fitting, 26 Cal. App. 746, 148 P. 536. This observation is made for the reason that the affidavit was filed thirty-one days after the time limited for performing the labor or making the improvements. In any event, a forfeiture for failure to do the annual labor can only be claimed by one who makes a valid location on the claim before the resumption of labor. U. S. Rev. St. § 2324; Madison v. Octave Oil Co., 154 Cal. 768, on page 773, 99 P. 176. It is conceded that defendant performed the required annual labor since 1916, and plaintiffs did not initiate its location until 1930. Hence, plaintiffs could not claim any rights by reason of the alleged forfeiture for failure to do assessment work in 1916 if that fact be conceded.

[4-6] Appellants contend that the patent of the Jersey Bull claim of 1920, covering portions of Sheep Creek Claims Nos. 5 and 6, forfeited defendant's title to those portions of 5 and 6 not covered by the Jersey Bull patent, relying on the principle laid down in Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 5 S. Ct. 1110, 29 L. Ed. 348, to the effect that where a locator permits another to obtain a patent to a portion of the claim which he has located, on which portion is located the discovery shaft, he thereby loses title to his entire claim. It is undoubtedly true that if the places of discovery of minerals in the original claims 5 and 6 were within the limits of the Jersey Bull patent, that they would forfeit title to all of said claims of which the Jersey Bull patent formed a part. However, the trial court found that defendant was the owner of the portions of Sheep Creek Claims 5 and 6 not embraced within the limits of the Jersey Bull patent, which is an implied finding that the points of discovery were each outside of the limits of the Jersey Bull patent. We think such a finding is justified from the evidence of Frank T. Roberts, United States deputy mineral surveyor, who testified: "While upon this property I caused to be made open cuts upon all of the claims excepting No. 10, for the purpose of determining that there was a continuous body of limestone up through claims No. 9, 8, 7, 5 and 6, which said claims could be reached by working through claim No. 10." As before stated, there is no evidence in the record that the points of discovery of the Sheep Creek Claims 5 and 6 were embraced within the limits of the Jersey Bull patent. The theory on which defendant would lose title to all of Sheep Creek Claims 5 and 6, by virtue of allowing a patent to issue to a stranger on a part thereof, is that they were abandoned. "Abandonment" is a voluntary act which must be proven by competent evidence before the fact can be found to exist (Lakin v. Sierra Buttes Gold Mining Co., [C. C.] 25 F. 337), and the burden to prove abandonment is upon him asserting it. Gear v. Ford, 4 Cal. App. 556, 88 P. 600. Applying these principles, the trial court was fully justified in finding that defendant had title to those portions of Sheep Creek Claims 5 and 6 not covered by the Jersey Bull patent.

The other points urged by appellants do not impress us as of sufficient importance to merit discussion and an examination of the entire record convinces us that the trial court made a proper disposition of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

This is a companion case to Pidgeon v. Lamb, 24 P.(2d) 206, this day decided, and the facts are very similar. Plaintiffs sued defendant to quiet title to certain mining claims. Defendant denies plaintiffs' title and asserts title in himself and the trial court gave judgment quieting title to the claims in defendant. Plaintiffs appeal.

In 1911 defendant's predecessors located Sheep Creek Claims 1 to 10, inclusive, as placer mining claims where the United States survey had been extended over the land embraced in the locations by the legal subdivisions thereof. In 1929, plaintiffs located placer mining claims on Sheep Creek Claims 3 and 4. Plaintiffs claim that their junior location is paramount, asserting that defendant's location was never lawfully made because the location notice was not posted at the point of discovery and that the boundaries were not marked upon the land. We have this day decided this question adversely to the claim of appellants in the case of Pidgeon v. Lamb (Cal. App.) 24 P.(2d) 206. The transcript does not purport to contain all the evidence or record of proceedings in the trial.

[1,2] Appellants urge that defendant has lost title to his mining claims by estoppel, fraud, laches, and negligence for the reason that he did not preserve and restore monuments, keep the boundaries well marked, and that he did not notify plaintiffs of his claim. He was under no duty to keep the monuments in place and location notices posted so long as they were not obliterated or destroyed by his fault while he continued to perform the necessary work upon the claims. Jupiter v. Bodie, etc., 11 F. 666 (C. C. Cal.). It is conceded that the necessary work was done upon the claims and there is no evidence that any monuments or notices were destroyed or obliterated through the fault of defendant. The recorded notices of location gave constructive notice of defendant's possession and of the boundaries. We feel that such contentions on the part of appellants are without merit.

Plaintiffs and appellants stipulated that they would not claim that the evidence is insufficient to support finding 4, which reads as follows: "That on and since the 25th day of March, 1911, the said defendant Theodore P. Lamb, with his predecessors and grantors, was ever since, has been and now is the owner (subject only to the paramount title of the United States) and in possession and entitled to the possession by virtue of a discovery of mineral thereon and a valid location thereof according to law made on or about the 25th day of March, 1911, and of performing during each and every year since said time not less than one hundred dollars ($100.00) worth of labor and improvements on each of said mining claims, which said work tended to develop each of said claims and have been in the exclusive and uninterrupted possession of said mining claims ever since the location of the same, and now is in actual possession."

We are therefore satisfied that the judgment of the trial court is correct and that all matters were properly disposed of by the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

CRAIG, Justice.

Two causes emanating from the same transaction and asserted against the same defendant were tried together before the superior court sitting with a jury. Verdicts and judgments in favor of said defendant were rendered, and the plaintiffs appealed upon a single transcript.

While crossing in a northerly direction an easterly and westerly thoroughfare, at an intersection, the plaintiffs were struck by a westbound automobile which was under the management and control of the respondent. The complaints alleged that the defendant carelessly, negligently, and unlawfully drove and operated his said automobile in excess of fifteen miles per hour, toward the south side of said thoroughfare, across the intersection and crosswalk in which the plaintiffs were walking, and in violation of certain pleaded municipal ordinances, without due regard to the traffic, surface or width of said street. The plaintiffs, walking together, were preceded by two friends who first saw the approaching vehicle and hastened toward the northerly curbing, but admitted at the trial that they did not look backward. The plaintiff Hess at first testified that she saw the automobile about one-half block toward the eastward, but thereafter stated that she was on the left side of plaintiff Wagy, and that her view was obstructed. To the following questions the latter testified:

"Q. I understand you got past the center line of the street, got north of it at the time you were struck? A. Yes.

"Q. You got north of it before you looked to your right, didn't you? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, the next time you looked towards the right was when you were north of the center line of the street, wasn't it? A. Yes"

One of the witnesses first mentioned testified:

"I don't know, because I was looking the other way, whether it swerved any or whether it went straight ahead.

"Q. You don't know whether it swerved one way or the other? A. No."

Miss Hess swore on cross-examination that she did not see the machine at any time before she was struck. The defendant testified that the accident occurred at about 12:30 or 1 o'clock a. m.; that some of the street lights were out, but that the top globe of a cluster was lighted; that as he was proceeding at a speed between 15 and 20 miles per hour he saw two people running across the street at an angle, "then I saw some more, and then I put my brakes on," "I know they were not in the crosswalk."

[1-3] The first ground assigned for reversal urges negligence per se on the part of the respondent in driving more than 15 miles per hour, and attempts to refute any contention that the appellants were guilty of contributory negligence. But the appellants correctly state that under all of the facts presented and circumstances disclosed this latter question remained for the jury to determine. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125; Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 683, 140 P. 586, 587. "It is the duty of a foot passenger to look both ways before starting to cross a street, particularly when, as in this instance, the street over which he intends to pass is a busy thoroughfare in the heart of the business district of a great city. * * * The mere fact that defendant Hollenbeck was violating an ordinance and was therefore, as matter of law, guilty of negligence did not preclude the court from finding that the plaintiff's negligence was the efficient and proximate cause of the injuries suffered by him." Davis v. Breuner Co., supra. It is also insisted that objections to certain questions as to whether the defendant did not in fact flee from the scene were erroneously sustained. Prejudice from such rulings may only be inferred, and is not claimed, nor does the record warrant such inference. The defendant testified positively: "I stopped my automobile * * * right next to him. * * * I picked the man up and the lady. * * * Helped Mr. Wagy." Having previously testified that he was driving at 12:30 or 1 o'clock at about fifteen or twenty miles per hour, objection was sustained to the question, "Was that your speed all the way?" It is contended that testimony by one of the plaintiffs that the car was traveling between 35 and 45 miles per hour at the time of the impact rendered this evidence admissible as to its speed upon entering the crosswalk. "The question of the remoteness of evidence which is offered with relation to the actions and conduct of a party, particularly as to the rate of speed and method of driving an automobile just before a collision occurs, is one which rests so largely within the discretion of the trial court that no positive rule upon the subject can be laid down, and for that reason the ruling of the trial judge as to the admission or rejection of that sort of evidence will not be disturbed except upon a clear showing of an abuse of such discretion." Traynor v. McGilvray, 54 Cal. App. 31, 200 P. 1056, 1057. The rule was likewise stated in Ritchey v. Watson, 204 Cal. 387, 268 P. 345.

[4] It is objected that an instruction given to the jury at the defendant's request constituted prejudicial error, in that it must be implied therefrom that the burden of proof rests with the plaintiff in such cases to establish a want of contributory negligence. The plaintiff Wagy had testified that he had passed the center line of the thoroughfare to the north before looking to the right, when he was injured. His coplaintiff also testified that she "didn't look because he was there to look." The jury were instructed in part as follows: "In order to find a verdict for the plaintiffs you must not only find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was negligent, but also that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries to plaintiffs, and you must further find that the evidence fails to show by a preponderance thereof that plaintiffs were guilty of negligence, however slight, contributing proximately thereto, otherwise your verdict must be for the defendant." While it is the rule that one who without negligence on his part is suddenly confronted with immediate danger is required to act only as a reasonably prudent person would act under the same circumstances, it can be invoked only by those whose position of peril is not caused by their own want of due care. Where there is some evidence from which the jury may reasonably deem their perilous position due to their want of the exercise of due care, such question should not be omitted from the instruction. Brooks v. City of Monterey, 106 Cal. App. 649, 290 P. 540. It cannot be said that the charge required evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs, but rather that it properly required an absence of proof to the contrary. If the jury did conclude that a failure of the plaintiffs to look toward the approaching car amounted to the proximate negligent cause of their injuries, it may not be said upon appeal that it was error to consider such evidence.

[5] Error asserted on account of a multiplicity of instructions upon the question of contributory negligence and the repetition or similarity of certain expressions used therein, though criticized, is not held a ground for reversal in authorities cited by the appellants or by others examined. No objection is made to their form or substance, and in such case the error, if any there be, is not sufficient to cause a disturbance of the judgments. Ritchey v. Watson, 204 Cal. 387, 268 P. 345; Metcalfe v. Pacific Electric Railroad Co., 63 Cal. App. 331, 218 P. 486.

There being no appeal from an order denying a new trial, the appeal from said order in civil case No. 7946 is dismissed. The judgments are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Paul F. Chapman, administrator of the estate of Charles Jesse Chapman, deceased, against L. E. Edwards and another, copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of Edwards Bros., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Mulroney, Murphy & Doherty, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This was an action to recover damages as a result of the death of one Charles Jesse Chapman. The action was against L. E. Edwards and C. A. Edwards as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Edwards Bros. and against one John Klein as an individual. The cause of action was based upon the theory that the death of Chapman was caused by the negligence of the defendants. This brief statement will suffice as a general statement, inasmuch as the sole point to be considered does not require further detail.

After trial by jury, a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff and against all defendants in the sum of $15,000. A new trial having been denied, judgment followed pursuant to the verdict. Defendants Edwards, who will hereinafter be referred to as Edwards Bros., or Brothers, appeal. No question is presented on the question of the negligence of defendant Klein, nor is there any point made as to the amount of damages awarded. It is not contended that the court erred in any respect, whether in rulings on the admission of evidence or in instructing the jury. It is apparently conceded that defendant Klein was guilty of negligence proximately causing the death of Chapman. The sole point urged is that Edwards Brothers are in no wise responsible for the negligence of Klein for the urged reason that at all of the times surrounding the happening of the unfortunate event Klein was an independent contractor. We may here narrate the facts as to the relationship of Klein and Edwards Brothers. The last named were contractors engaged under contract to do the excavating preparatory to the construction of a large building in the city of Los Angeles. The excavating contract involved the performance of much work and labor, calling for the use of much equipment and many men and trucks. Klein, as far as the record indicates, was an individual owning a truck. We phrase thusly to negative the idea that Klein was engaged in the trucking business, with men and equipment. As far as indicated, Klein owned a truck and obtained employment for himself and this one truck whenever and wherever work was available. After Edwards Bros. entered upon the excavation, it became desirable to move the dirt faster. Thereupon the office girl of Edwards Bros. telephoned to Klein and inquired if he was then working. When informed that he was not working, she told him he could go to work on the job of Edwards Bros. That was all of the conversation, and forms the basis of the arrangement between Edwards Bros. and Klein. The girl had authority to thus phone Klein, but had no authority further than to tell him to report for work. The excavation was being done by means of a shovel, steam or gas, which lifted the dirt and dropped the same into trucks, which trucks thereafter removed the dirt from the premises. Accordingly, Klein reported with his truck. He had worked for or been engaged by Edwards Bros. before, and, being familiar with the work, required no general instructions. He just pulled his truck in under the shovel, obtained his load, and drove away. The foreman told him his compensation would be $1.75 per load. Within a few days thereafter Edwards Bros. voluntarily and arbitrarily raised the price per load to $2. The reason given for the raising of the price per load appears as follows: "If I remember rightly we could see that they were not going to make their wages; and so, rather than have them dissatisfied, I think, we raised it to $2.00." As stated, there were a number of trucks used on the job. All but one or two, out of a possible dozen, were operated by Edwards Bros. Klein reported for work at the same time as the other trucks each day and all trucking ceased when the shovel stopped; the obvious reason for this being that, when the shovel was idle, there was no dirt to haul. The shovel and its operation was under the control of Edwards Bros., whose foreman directed its movements as far as placement was concerned. The one person on the job who directed the work of the trucks was a foreman called Adolph. It was stipulated that Adolph was in charge; that he directed where he wanted the steam shovel to work and moved it from place to place and directed the trucks to come under it when they were ready to load—in other words, the trucks were acting, in the loading, under his direction. Adolph had control over all of the trucks, hired, rented, or owned, to the extent of telling them when he wanted to have them loaded. He would tell them to get in their place; but most of the time they just ran automatically. As the testimony went, "they had sense enough to see for themselves what to do." Adolph, the foreman, would always tell Klein when it was his last load at night. Klein was paid each month for his work, computed according to the loads hauled. According to the testimony of Edwards, he was hired for the job, if he wanted it; it was up to himself whether he wanted to stay or not—that is, his truck was hired.

There is no further need of detailing the situation. In the discussion of appellants' claim there may be from time to time statements of fact which will, in each instance, be deemed to reflect the record, unless otherwise noted.

[1-3] An independent contractor is one who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods and without being subject to the control of his employer except as to the result of the work. 14 R. C. L. p. 67. Like many other definitions, this statement serves as a generality. However, as a working definition, this has been generally accepted, with occasional additions. The books abound in applications of the term, and it will be found that, as in many other instances, the question whether or not one is an independent contractor is to be determined largely from the facts of the particular case under observation. Throughout the body of the law we find a careful selection of words in describing a situation. Rarely, if ever, do we find words used which do not upon first contact reveal the general idea sought to be conveyed. And so here. The term "independent" is descriptive of a contractor. A contractor, obviously, is one party to a contract or one who has contracted to do or perform certain work. And it becomes perhaps a commonplace to assume that every contract contains within itself everything that is to be done or performed by each party thereto and the consideration underlying or supporting the obligation. And so, at the outset, where it is claimed that a party was an independent contractor, we may first inquire the nature of the contract or whether there was any contract. Turning then to the instant case, we inquire as to Klein's contract. He had no written contract and there is in the record nothing to indicate the terms, if any, upon which he undertook the work. The job was one entire job, not subdivided into definite or any portions; it consisted of one entire excavation of defined area. Every one employed in the said excavation worked together to a common end. There were no means of distinguishing the work of a hired truck or an owned truck. There was no definite scale of compensation. And all of the work was to be done upon the premises of the employer, or the premises occupied by the employer in the discharge of the main contract of excavation. There was no work that Klein could do independent of the employer, inasmuch as, the latter being in exclusive control and management of the shovel, there would be no dirt to remove until the shovel furnished the load. There was no discretion vested in Klein other than to get under the shovel in his turn with the other trucks of the employer and get his load. There was no obligation upon him to take any dirt, nor was there any liability imposed upon or assumed by him if he chose not to haul. Likewise there was no obligation upon Edwards Bros. to furnish sufficient dirt to load the truck, nor was there any obligation on Edwards Bros. to continue the employment for any period. It seems generally conceded that a test in determining whether a person employed to do certain work is an independent contractor or a mere servant is the control over the work which is reserved by the employer. The power of the employer to terminate the employment at any time is a strong circumstance tending to show the subserviency of the employee, since it is incompatible with the full control of the work usually enjoyed by an independent contractor. Perhaps no single circumstance is more conclusive to show the relationship of an employee than the right of the employer to end the service whenever he sees fit to do so. Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820.

[4-6] The real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as the servant of another is to ascertain whether, at the time when the injury was inflicted, he was subject to such person's orders and control and was liable to be discharged for disobedience or misconduct. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407-417, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390. Other factors which may be considered are the hours of labor, terms of compensation, place where work is done, and manner and nature of work to be performed. These factors are discussed in an exhaustive note in 75 A. L. R. 725, to which reference is made. In the case before us the hours of labor for Klein were exactly those of the admitted employees and servants. He could work at no other time. His compensation was arbitrarily fixed by the employer for the purpose, as stated by the employer, of assuring him a fair wage. All of the work was done upon the premises under the control of his employer. Whatever argument may be made, we must eventually come back to one undenied and undeniable fact that the entire work in hand was the excavation of the lot upon which a building was to be erected. Some person must have been in control of this work as an entirety. It would seem absurd to hold that Edwards Bros. were in control of the work in as far as affected all of the trucks and men except Klein and his truck. The method and manner of removing the dirt was one entire plan. Klein had no right to remove the dirt from the truck in his own way. He had to await his turn. As an example, at or about the exact time of the accident it was Klein's desire to load up before lunch and get out. His orders from the foreman were to wait and get his load after lunch for the reason that the shovel was to be moved. We fail to find one independent act that Klein could perform upon the premises. The record does not disclose where, at any time while on the premises, Klein was beyond the immediate control of Edwards Bros. Where some fifteen trucks and drivers are engaged in the same labor to a common purpose and working together at all times it would tend to disorganization rather than toward system to deem that one was an independent contractor merely because he owned the truck he drove. If this particular one were independent, there surely must be some way through which he could manifest his independence. After all, a truck remains but an appliance, regardless of its size, a super wheelbarrow as it were. If a person should furnish his own wheelbarrow and go down into a pit to work, with a compensation based upon what the boss thought would allow him fair wages, it would seem a far stretch of principle to accord to his employment the dignity of an independent contractor. Hillen v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570, affords an illustration of the principle. The case involved a shingler whose employment was to lay shingles under a mutual understanding that when he came on the job it would be $1.25 per thousand, and there was nothing further said about the agreement to shingle and when each job was done the bill would be made per thousand and after the bill was approved it would be paid. Everything was used in the actual shingling, namely hatchet, snips, and apron. Further, when necessity required, the shingler hired other men to assist him, none of whom were carried upon the employer's pay roll. There was no specified period of labor per day. The shingler was held to be an employee rather than an independent contractor. We note again this significant language: "Coincident with the right of control is the right of either employer or employee to terminate the relation without liability. This is but another way of stating the rule, for the right to immediately discharge involves the right of control." See, also, Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 P. 163. Without further discussion, we may conclude by stating that it must be conceded that appellants' strongest showing is met with a showing by respondent which leaves the question debatable. In other words, conceding that there may be certain features of the employment from which an inference supporting the relationship of an independent contractor may be drawn, yet it is equally true that there are present many facts and circumstances from which it might be reasonably inferred that the relationship was that of master and servant. It is only where the evidence is reasonably susceptible of but a single inference that the question of whether one is an employee or an independent contractor becomes one of law for the court. Nelson v. Stukeley, 89 Mont. 277, 300 P. 287, 78 A. L. R. p. 491, with cases therein cited. Whether or not the relation of employer and employee exists under the contract in this case is a mixed question of law and fact to be determined in the court below like any other question, and the finding in the court below is binding upon this court, provided there be any competent evidence to support the finding. Hillen v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 580, 250 P. 570; Johnson v. Department of Industrial Relations, 101 Cal. App. 1, 281 P. 440; May v. Farrell, 94 Cal. App. 703, 271 P. 789; Western Pac. R. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754; Case of Murray, 130 Me. 181, 154 A. 352, 75 A. L. R. 720 (with annotation), and Lownmiller v. Monroe, Lyon & Miller, Inc., 101 Cal. App. 147, at page 150, 281 P. 433, 282 P. 537.

The jury was fully and correctly instructed as to the law and its application to the facts of the case, with particular reference to the question of independent contractors and employees. Not a suggestion of criticism is presented as to these instructions. We think it was correctly determined that the relationship of employer and employee existed between Klein and Edwards Bros. at the time of the accident.

6. Guaranty ⇨77(1).

Bondholder's assignee suing on contract guaranteeing against loss on corporation bonds bondholder deposited with guarantor, and which guarantor exchanged for stock in new corporation, held not required to resort to property of new corporation.

7. Guaranty ⇨81.

Action on contract guaranteeing against loss on bonds deposited with guarantor held not prematurely brought, where principal debtor was insolvent before default on bonds, and action against makers, other than foreclosure, would have been of no avail (Civ. Code, §§ 2800, 2801).

1. Guaranty ⇨16(1).

Written guaranty to hold bondholder harmless from loss on bonds, executed in consideration of bondholder's deposit of corporate bonds with guarantor, held supported by consideration where bondholder would have received specified cash proceeds from foreclosure sale if she had kept bonds (Civ. Code, § 1605).

"Detriment" as respects consideration means giving up something which the promisee had a right to keep, or doing something which he had a right not to do, and "benefit" means the receiving as the exchange for his promise of something which the promisor was not previously entitled to receive.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Benefit" and "Detriment," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Guaranty ⇨34.

Whether written guaranty to hold bondholder harmless from loss on bonds deposited with guarantor was absolute or guaranty of collectibility held immaterial as regards guarantor's liability, where principal debtor failed to pay debt when due and bondholder used reasonable diligence to collect debt (Civ. Code, § 2800).

3. Guaranty ⇨70.

Finding in action on guaranty, that bondholder depositing bonds under contract guaranteeing against loss used reasonable diligence to collect from principal debtor held sustained by stipulation that principal debtor was insolvent prior to its default on bonds and that action against makers thereof, other than foreclosure, would have been of no avail (Civ. Code, § 2801).

4. Guaranty ⇨77(2).

Bondholder depositing bonds under guaranty contract to hold bondholder harmless from loss thereon need not take action against principal debtor before taking action against guarantor, where debt could not have been collected (Civ. Code, §§ 2800, 2801).

5. Guaranty ⇨77(1).

Assignee of bondholder depositing bonds with guarantor guaranteeing against loss need not sue guarantor to secure corporate stock which guarantor secured for bonds before bringing suit on guaranty contract, where principal debtor on bonds was insolvent and guarantor converted bonds to his own use (Civ. Code, §§ 2800, 2801).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Clarence Harden, Judge.

Action by M. J. Irving against I. I. Irwin, also known as Isaac Irwin, also known as Isaac I. Irwin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Ray M. Harris, of San Diego, for appellant.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll, of San Diego, for respondent.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

For many years I. I. Irwin, the defendant, was in the banking business in San Diego, and since 1915 had been the confidential advisor of Mrs. Maria L. Connell in all her business transactions. During the year 1925 Mrs. Connell purchased from defendant certain bearer bonds of the Utah-Nevada Land & Livestock Company, a corporation, paying therefor the par value of $5,000, plus accrued interest. The payment of the bonds was secured by a mortgage or trust deed upon certain ranch property in Utah and Nevada. Prior to July 14, 1927, default in the payment of the interest on the bonds was made. Subsequent to the default the defendant, together with other bondholders, organized the United Securities Corporation for the purpose of buying the assets of the Utah-Nevada Land & Livestock Company at a proposed foreclosure sale. Defendant called Mrs. Connell by telephone a few days prior to the 14th day of July, 1927, and asked her to call at his bank. She went to the bank that same day where he requested her to deliver her bonds to him, orally agreeing to "guarantee" that she would lose neither principal nor interest thereon. She delivered the bonds pursuant to this request. On July 14, 1927, Mrs. Connell called on defendant and requested a writing embodying the agreement. At this second visit, and pursuant to this request, defendant executed and delivered to Mrs. Connell the following document:

"California Savings & Commercial Bank of San Diego

"San Diego, California, July 14, 1927. Received from Mrs. Maria L. Connell for deposit in foreclosure: Five Thousand Dollars par value 7% Utah-Nevada Land & Livestock Co., due 1936. And I guarantee to hold said Maria L. Connell harmless from any loss of principal and interest accrued. I. I. Irwin."

On conflicting evidence the trial court found, and was justified in finding, that defendant at no time informed Mrs. Connell of what he proposed to do with her bonds; of the default in the payment of interest; or of the organization of the United Securities Corporation.

Early in July, 1927, the mortgage or trust deed securing the payment of the bonds was foreclosed, and the assets of the Utah-Nevada Land & Livestock Company were purchased at the foreclosure sale by the United Securities Corporation. Payment therefor was made with the bonds delivered to the bondholders' committee, including Mrs. Connell's bonds, which had been delivered to the committee by defendant. The capital stock of the United Securities Corporation was then issued to the members of the pool in the proportion which the bonds furnished by them bore to the total used at the foreclosure sale. A certificate for 2,725 shares of this capital stock was issued to defendant; Mrs. Connell's bonds being included in the computation fixing this number of shares. In December, 1927, and semiannually thereafter, to and including June, 1930, defendant, from his personal funds, paid to Mrs. Connell the interest on her bonds at the rate therein provided.

On conflicting evidence, the trial court found, and was justified in finding, that Mrs. Connell was not informed of the foreclosure; of what use was made of her bonds; of the issuance of the stock to defendant; or even of the existence of the United Securities Corporation.

On or about the 25th day of July, 1930, defendant assigned the 2,725 shares of the capital stock of the United Securities Corporation, together with his other assets, to one Howard Throckmorton, as trustee for the benefit of his creditors. On November 20, 1930, Mrs. Connell assigned to plaintiff herein, for the purpose of collection, her cause of action against defendant. The present action was instituted on November 24, 1930.

The sale price under the foreclosure proceedings adverted to was such that, if Mrs. Connell had not turned in her bonds to be used in such foreclosure matter, she would have received $1,690. At the time this suit was instituted, the total net market value of the assets of the United Securities Corporation was such that, had Mrs. Connell received stock for her bonds in the regular ratio in which the stock was issued, it would have amounted to $2,800, based on the total net value of the assets of the corporation.

It was stipulated that, prior to the date of the delivery of the bonds by Maria L. Connell to defendant, the Utah-Nevada Land & Livestock Company defaulted in the payment of the bonds and the interest thereon, and became and was insolvent from that date on, and that legal action against the company other than the foreclosure proceedings referred to would have been of no avail. There was no evidence that the stock of the United Securities Corporation ever had a market, or a market value, although it was not a closed corporation. From these facts the trial court entered its judgment for plaintiff for $5,000, together with interest from June 14, 1930.

Defendant appeals, and states the questions involved as follows: "1. That there is no consideration for the guaranty which is the basis of plaintiff's action. 2. That the guaranty sued on is not an unconditional guaranty but only a guaranty of collectibility. 3. That the action was prematurely brought. 4. That a number of the findings of the trial court are not supported by substantial evidence; that a number of the findings of the trial court are not supported by any evidence; that a number of the findings of the trial court are contrary to the evidence. 5. That plaintiff's amended complaint and amendment thereto do not state a cause of action."

[1] Defendant's contention that there is no consideration for the guaranty must fail. One reason is that, if Mrs. Connell had kept the bonds, she would have received about $1,690 cash from the foreclosure sale, whereas she has in fact received nothing except the agreement sued on. When she delivered the bonds to defendant, she parted with all dominion and control thereover, and accepted in lieu thereof the contract of defendant. Mrs. Connell, having given up a valuable right in exchange for defendant's promise, suffered detriment which constitutes consideration. Civ. Code, § 1605. Conversely, the defendant obtained the right to use the bonds in a manner which he had no right prior to the delivery to him. It was thus a benefit to him which constituted a sufficient consideration. Civ. Code, § 1605; Chrisman v. Southern California Edison Co., 83 Cal. App. 249-254, 256 P. 618. The rule is thus expressed in 1 Williston on Contracts, § 102a: "Detriment * * * means giving up something which the promisee had a right to keep, or doing something which he had a right not to do. Any benefit correspondingly must mean the receiving as the exchange for his promise of something which the promisor was not previously entitled to receive. That the promisor desired it for his own advantage and had no previous right to it is enough to show that it was beneficial."

[2-4] Defendant contends that the contract is that of a guaranty of collectibility only, while plaintiff contends that it is one of absolute guaranty. Viewed as either the result is the same. If an absolute guaranty, the liability of the defendant was fixed by the failure of the principal debtor to pay when due. This was not done. If a guaranty of collectibility, the liability was incurred after the plaintiff used due and reasonable diligence to collect the debt from the principal debtor. Ohio Electric Car Co. v. Le Sage, 182 Cal. 450, 188 P. 982; Civ. Code, § 2800. The finding of the trial court that due and reasonable diligence was used by plaintiff is sustained by the stipulation that the principal debtor was insolvent prior to its default on the bonds and at all times thereafter and that any legal action against the makers thereof, other than the foreclosure, would have been of no avail. Defendant's contention that plaintiff was required to take action against the principal debtor is thus answered: "A guaranty, such as is mentioned in the last section [Civ. Code, § 2800], is not discharged by an omission to take proceedings upon the principal debt, or upon any collateral security for its payment, if no part of the debt could have been collected thereby." Civ. Code, § 2801.

[5] To defendant's contention that it was the duty of plaintiff to sue defendant to recover the stock received by him for the transfer of her bonds, we would say that the law only requires an exhaustion of remedies against the principal debtor. Civ. Code, §§ 2800, 2801, 2802; Pierce v. Merrill, 129 Cal. 464, 471, 61 P. 64, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56. In addition to receiving the stock, defendant converted the same, and plaintiff should not be required to pursue property which defendant has himself converted to his own use.

[6] Defendant urges that plaintiff was required to resort to the property of the United Securities Corporation. This she could not do, even were she the owner of stock in the corporation. "The stockholders of a corporation have no estate in the land or other property of the corporation, and the transfer by a stockholder of the stock owned by him does not transfer any of the property of the corporation, or affect any right or obligation of the corporation in reference to the property held by it." Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 398, 403, 81 P. 542, 544. See, also, Sanchez v. East Contra Costa Irr. Co., 205 Cal. 515, 518, 271 P. 1060; 6a Cal. Jur. 748 et seq.

[7] It follows from what we have said that the action was not prematurely brought. A careful consideration of the entire transcript leaves no doubt in our minds that the amended complaint, and amendment to the amended complaint, state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that all material findings of facts challenged by defendant find abundant support in the evidence before the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Defendant appeals from a judgment whereby he was found guilty of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. When arraigned, he had entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity to that charge as also to another count in the information charging him with attempted robbery. The judge who tried the case without a jury found the defendant not guilty of attempted robbery, and largely upon that fact defendant bases his appeal, contending "that the finding by the trial court on count one of said information, charging the defendant with the crime of attempted robbery is in effect, in view of all the evidence, a finding that no assault was made by appellant upon the complaining witness." Appellant also contends that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to sustain the judgment of conviction which was entered, arguing that "in the crime of assault with intent to commit murder the guilty person must specifically contemplate the taking of life and commit the assault with such intent," citing the case of People v. Weston, 32 Cal. App. 571, 163 P. 691, to the effect that "if in truth he does not intend to kill he is not guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder."

In the instant case the defendant had gone to the office of the complaining witness, a physician who had treated him some years previously, and against whom, according to the evidence, he held a grudge for the double reason that in the opinion of the defendant the doctor had overcharged him and also had made an erroneous diagnosis of his ailment, and in treating him had injected poison into his system. The defendant telephoned the doctor's office for an appointment, and, on being admitted from the waiting room to the physician's private office, pulled a revolver from his left-hand overcoat pocket, aimed it with his left hand at the doctor, saying, "Give me all you have," then, as the doctor arose from his chair commanded him to get down on the floor. Instead, the doctor jumped through an open door into an adjoining treatment room. Defendant followed, and, as he came through the doorway, the doctor grappled with him trying to hold defendant's left arm, the one holding the gun, up in the air. The doctor testified that he noticed in the struggle that he was being hit on the back of the head; that "the pain was terrific and I bled profusely"; that the defendant "put his right arm up on his left hand, that I was holding up in the air and then two shots were fired." Finally the doctor knocked the defendant down, falling upon him, all the time holding the hand of the defendant that grasped the gun in position where it did not actually aim at the physician's body, although, when discharged, the bullets, according to the testimony, came as near to him as they possibly could and not hit him. Not until defendant was prone upon the floor with his pistol-bearing arm outstretched did the doctor succeed in taking that weapon from him. Shortly thereafter, while police officers were looking about the premises, the physician saw upon the floor of the treatment room, where he had suffered blows upon the back of his head while struggling with defendant, a hammer which he had never seen before; this hammer being wrapped "over the driving surface" with cloth. A Mr. Cochran, who was in the waiting room of the physician's office at the time this disturbance started, testified that he kicked open a door and saw the doctor and defendant scuffling on the floor; that the doctor was bleeding badly and had injuries on his head; that "there was so much blood on the head that I could not see the extent of the injuries." Introduced in evidence was a smock which the physician stated he was wearing at the time of his struggle with the defendant and which was stained with blood which, according to the doctor's testimony, came from the wounds upon his head. The doctor testified that he did not see a hammer in either of defendant's hands, but "from the violence of the concussion and the injury produced it would have to be something of an object of that description," and from the evidence it appears that in the early part of the altercation while the left hand of the defendant grasped the gun his right hand was free. Defendant took the witness stand, but gave no testimony about the hammer that was introduced in evidence. He did not disclaim ownership of it, but said that on December 11, 1932, the date of the offense charged, "I was not myself; I don't know just what I did."

[1, 2] Disregarding the revolver as a weapon, was there sufficient evidence before the court to justify a finding that the defendant rained blows upon the head of the physician with this hammer? We believe there was. Since a deadly weapon is one likely to produce death or great bodily injury (3 Cal. Jur. 206), it will not be contended seriously that in such a case as this a hammer is not within that class. This brings us to the question of intent. The Weston Case, supra, says: "What that intent was must be determined from all the circumstances—among them the character of the weapon and the consequences likely to follow the use made of the weapon." Applying this rule to the present case, if the learned trial judge ignored altogether the testimony directed toward proof of attempted robbery by means of a revolver and considered only what happened in the treatment room, he would have been warranted in finding that an assault with intent to murder had been committed with a deadly weapon, to wit, a hammer. Further, it may be said that in our opinion the court would have been justified in finding from the evidence that any attempt at robbery was concluded the instant the doctor jumped through the open door of the treatment room, and that thereafter the purpose of the defendant became one of assault with intent to murder by means of a loaded revolver. Under this view of the case, we feel that it is unnecessary to give further consideration to the claim of appellant that the finding of not guilty on count 1 "is in effect a finding that no assault was made by the appellant upon the complaining witness."

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. STRONG et al. v. CITY OF WHITTIER et al.

Civ. 8613.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 15, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 11, 1933.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨34.

Whole of proposed city addition, divided into seven parcels joined together, held single inhabited body of land, subject to annexation through one general election, though two parcels were uninhabited (St. 1913, p. 587).

2. Municipal corporations ⇨33(9).

Evidence that lines of city addition included property subject to uses inconsistent with urban development, excluded property on one side of included street, included only portion of orchard along street line, and passed between two houses served by same driveway, held immaterial on any issue except fraud in quo warranto proceeding to annul annexation (St. 1913, p. 587).

3. Municipal corporations ⇨33(9).

Evidence that annexation of territory to city was oppressive on some relators in quo warranto proceeding to annul it because of use of some land therein held incompetent and immaterial; subject-matter being legislative, not judicial (St. 1913, p. 587).

4. Municipal corporations ⇨33(9).

Evidence that former attempts to annex part of territory added to city failed, that annexation petition was drawn and filed by city officer living in addition, that lines thereof included property of those favoring annexation, and excluded lands of those opposed, and that relators in quo warranto proceeding to annul annexation were not informed of proceedings, held immaterial and incompetent on any issue except fraud (St. 1913, p. 587).

5. Municipal corporations ⇨33(1).

Drawing of lines of area annexed to city to include lands of persons favorable and exclude those of persons opposed to annexation and failure to inform objectors of proceedings held not to constitute fraud, though line deviated from boundary of fairly symmetrical area to include city pumping plant and workers (St. 1913, p. 587).

6. Municipal corporations ⇨34.

Annexation of territory to city held not invalid because council determined certain facts without taking evidence, where determination thereof was left exclusively with council by law (St. 1913, p. 587).

7. Municipal corporations ⇨34.

Inducement paragraphs in city ordinance calling annexation election held sufficient to show that council took evidence as to jurisdictional requirements (St. 1913, p. 587).

Inducement paragraphs of ordinance referred to reception of petition by council, and stated that petition described territory annexed as single body of land contiguous to city was signed by not less than fourth of qualified electors residing in such territory, and showed that territory formed no part of any other municipal corporation and was inhabited.

8. Evidence ⇨83(2).

Court cannot assume that city council found jurisdictional facts in proceeding for annexation of territory to city without evidentiary basis; presumption being that officials performed duties in accordance with legal requirements (St. 1913, p. 587).

9. Municipal corporations ⇨33(10).

Whether city councilmen knew territory annexed to city or viewed it between filing of annexation petition and passage of ordinance calling election cannot be considered on collateral attack in quo warranto proceeding to annul annexation (St. 1913, p. 587).

10. Quo warranto ⇨1.

Quo warranto lies only to right existing wrong, not to try moot questions.

11. Quo warranto ⇨49.

Complaint in quo warranto to annul annexation of territory to city should allege that jurisdictional facts, alleged to have been determined by city council without taking evidence, did not exist to present issue as to council's fact findings (St. 1913, p. 587).

12. Municipal corporations ⇨33(5).

Petition for annexation of territory to city need not be dated (St. 1913, p. 587).

13. Municipal corporations ⇨33(5).

Failure to affix dates after names of signers of petition for annexation of territory to city does not affect validity of petition (St. 1913, p. 587).

14. Municipal corporations ⇨33(10).

Motive of petitioners for annexation of territory to city in fixing boundary line of one parcel one foot beyond ownership property line or their intention to fix it on latter line cannot be considered after completion of proceedings (St. 1913, p. 587).

15. Municipal corporations ☞34.

Publication of notice of election to annex territory to city, with reference to city's existing indebtedness, payable by levy of taxes over whole territory after annexation, for four weeks before hearing, held sufficient (Const. art. 11, § 8½; St. 1913, p. 587).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Isaac Pacht, Judge.

Quo warranto proceeding by the People, on the relation of Harriet R. Strong and others, executors of the last will and testament of H. W. R. Strong, deceased, and another, against the City of Whittier and others. From a judgment declaring annexation of certain territory to the City of Whittier invalid, defendants appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

Arthur G. Wray, of Whittier, Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, Vincent Morgan, and Kenneth K. Wright, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Kemp, Partridge & Kemp, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in quo warranto, declaring invalid an attempted annexation of certain territory in the city of Whittier, Los Angeles county.

There are three separate acts prescribing the procedure for the annexation of territory to an existing city. These acts are the same basically. The act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 358) provides for annexation of inhabited territory upon petition of electors of an existing city. The act of 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 37) provides for the annexation of uninhabited territory to an existing city. The act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 587) provides for annexation of inhabited territory to an existing city upon petition of electors residing in territory proposed to be annexed. This latter act also provides in effect that two or more noncontiguous bodies of land cannot be annexed under a general election in the territory proposed to be added to the city. It was this latter act that was used in the instant proceeding. Throughout this opinion we shall designate the area proposed to be annexed as the "addition" and the city of Whittier as it existed territorially before this annexation proceeding as the "city."

The complaint in this action follows the opinion in the case of People v. City of Lemoore, 37 Cal. App. 79, 174 P. 93. As may be seen by the drawing reproduced in the printed report, that case concerned an attempt to annex territory almost completely surrounding the original city of Lemoore. The opinion proceeds to divide the proposed annexation area into nine parcels. All of these parcels are contiguous to the old city. The boundaries of parcel 1 do not touch the boundary of any of the other parcels, but this parcel is connected with one of the other parcels by a 20-foot road 1600 feet long. The court found these two parcels to be noncontiguous, and held the annexation void as the proceedings sought to effect the annexation through a general election within the proposed annexation area. Just what rule the court used in dividing the whole area into parcels is not divulged, but it is clear that ownership, a railroad right of way, county roads, and subdivisions were considered in such division exactly as in the case now before us for decision. There is language in the opinion seeming to hold that, notwithstanding each of these parcels was contiguous to the old city area, each of these parcels had to touch each of the other parcels, else the whole annexation area could not be said to constitute a single body of land and thus be the subject of annexation through one general election in the area. But this opinion does not constitute any authority whatever upon this point, for upon petition for hearing before the Supreme Court that court specifically withheld its assent to such a holding. (See Supreme Court opinion following Lemoore opinion, supra.)

[1, 2] The complaint in the instant case divides the area of the "addition" into seven parcels. As in the Lemoore Case, ownership, subdivisions, roads, and a railway right of way are considered in the division of the annexation area into parcels. But, unlike the Lemoore Case, there is no area of the proposed addition lying away from the main area and connected only by a narrow strip of land. The legal description of the "addition" shows the property to be one single body of land lying southwesterly of the old city lines and contiguous thereto. However, counsel for the people urge in their briefs that these so-called parcels are, or some of them constitute, separate and distinct bodies of land, and claim therefore that the whole area could not be annexed under one general election. As authority, the Lemoore Case and People v. City of Monterey Park, 40 Cal. App. 715, 181 P. 825, are cited. As we have already pointed out, we think the Lemoore Case does not assist respondents. The holding in the Monterey Park Case that two bodies of land, one without inhabitants and one with inhabitants, but connected only by a street running through other lands, are noncontiguous, is certainly not inconsistent with the Supreme Court's limited approval of the Lemoore Case.

Almost every annexation case reported in appellate decisions of this state shows the annexed area to be traversed by streets, and in no case except the Lemoore Case can there be found a word of support for the proposition that a street traversing a body of land divides the portion lying on one side from the portion lying on the other side so as to constitute separate bodies of land under the annexation acts. People v. City of South Gate, 118 Cal. App. 428, 5 P.(2d) 482, holds that a flood control right of way, a water course, a line of railway, or a public highway does not so operate. In the arbitrary division of the annexation area of the instant case into separate parcels, there are two parcels upon which there are no residents. Parcel 2, about the size of a city lot, is the site of Whittier city wells and pumping plants. Adjacent thereto on two other lots, parcel 3, families of three employees in the water plant live. Parcel 2 is uninhabited. Parcel 6, being a very small piece of ground occupied entirely by the railroad right of way, is uninhabited. All other parcels are inhabited. In People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 P. 205, 212, where there were vacant lots and areas, it is said the annexation area was territory, "which, taken as a whole, may fairly be said to be inhabited territory." This is authority for holding, and we do so hold, that the whole proposed "addition" to the city of Whittier is in fact and in law one single inhabited body of land. As all of the facts hereinabove related were alleged in the complaint and not denied or covered by a written stipulation, no additional evidence was required to establish the same. Respondents claim, however, that the lines of the "addition" were drawn so as to include property subject to uses inconsistent with urban development and introduced testimony to show the use to which the land within the "addition" is put and the use and development to which adjacent land outside of the area is put. They also show that one boundary line of considerable length includes a street, but not the properties fronting on one side of such street, and in another instance drops below this street line into a subdivided tract, including only a small portion thereof (referring herein to "parcels" 2 and 3). They also showed by evidence that a portion only of an orchard along a street line is included. Also that one short boundary line passes between two houses, both of which are served by the same driveway. Conceding (but reserving doubt) that the court was right in permitting the testimony to come in as an inquiry upon an issue of fraud or oppression, this evidence was wholly immaterial as to any other issue before the court. We base this ruling particularly on People ex rel. Peck v. City of Los Angeles, 154 Cal. 220, quoting from page 223, 97 P. 311, 312, "We are satisfied that whether the territory in question, and of the shape, extent, and character fixed, should be annexed to the city of Los Angeles, was purely a political question, which, under the act, was left to the exclusive determination of the voters of the municipality and the territory sought to be annexed." People v. Loyaltan, 147 Cal. 774, 82 P. 620; People v. City of Riverside, 70 Cal. 461, 9 P. 662, 11 P. 759.

[3] Respondents contend that, by reason of the use to which some of the land in the addition is put, the annexation is oppressive upon some of the relators. Evidence upon this point was incompetent and immaterial, as the subject-matter is legislative and not judicial. Allen v. Board of Trustees, 157 Cal. 720, 109 P. 486.

[4] The complaint also alleged that there had been former attempts to annex a part of this territory with a greater area, and that these attempts had either failed or had been abandoned because of opposition. It also alleges that the petition for the annexation election was drawn and instituted by a deputy city engineer of the city of Whittier, living in the proposed annexation area, and that the lines were drawn so as to include those favorable to the annexation project and exclude those unfavorable thereto. Also that those favorable to the project did not inform relators of the projected proceedings. We think all of this is immaterial to any issue before the court unless proper under a fraud inquiry as heretofore stated in regard to other evidence, and that all such testimony was immaterial and incompetent on any other issue.

[5] There is an indefinite allegation of fraud in the complaint, and during the course of the trial it was stated by counsel for the people in effect that the fraud intended was constituted by the facts that would go to establish the allegations just referred to—that is, the drawing of the lines to indicate those favorable and exclude those unfavorable, and the noncommunication as to initiation of the proceedings. We think the authorities above cited are authority for holding that the facts pleaded as constituting fraud were merely political questions as to which the courts have nothing to do. Every court in the land knows that the lines of few cities and few annexation areas are drawn on any fixed plan of form or shape. It is probable that lines are drawn to include those favoring the project and to exclude those opposed, but we know of no inhibition thereof. There is but one circumstance in the case where the line seems to deviate from a boundary of a fairly symmetrical area. The one is parcel 2 and 3 to include the city pumping plant and workers. Fraud cannot be decreed upon this fact or upon all of the facts herein claimed to constitute fraud, and the trial court did not find fraud existent in the case.

[6-9] The complaint alleges that the city council of Whittier ordered the election after the presentation of the petition, and determined certain facts stated in the petition without taking any evidence thereon. There are two conclusive answers to this allegation. The first one is that the determination of the referred to facts is left exclusively with the council without the right of appeal to any tribunal. It was said in People v. City of Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 P. 749, 750, an action in quo warranto (Code Civ. Proc. § 803 et seq.), that "whenever any board, tribunal, or person is by law vested with authority to decide a question, such decision, when made, is res judicata, and as conclusive of the issues involved in the decision as though the adjudication had been made by a court of general jurisdiction." In People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 635, 84 P. 205, 210, another and leading annexation quo warranto case, the court said: "Whatever may be the rule applicable in certiorari [Swanson v. City of Orange, 97 Cal. App. 344, 275 P. 889, our citation], which is a direct attack upon the particular order alleged to have been in excess of jurisdiction, * * * the decisions in this state compel us to hold that even an implied finding is conclusive in a quo warranto proceeding, or in any case where the order is collaterally attacked." And again, in the same opinion: "Under the decisions, the order of the board calling the election must here be taken as conclusive evidence that the petition presented, sufficient on its face, was, in effect, sufficiently signed by electors to confer the requisite power, and that the finding of the board to that effect, be it express or implied, was sustained by satisfactory proof." See Wolfskill v. Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 610, 174 P. 45, and People v. San Diego, 71 Cal. App. 422, 236 P. 377. The other answer is that this allegation is not sustained by the evidence. The ordinance calling the election (Exhibit C) includes a number of inducement paragraphs or "whereases." The first one refers to the reception of the petition by the council; the second one states that the petition contains a description of the territory in words and figures which would show it to be in one single body and contiguous to the city; the next one states that the petition was signed by not less than one-fourth of the qualified electors residing in the territory described; and the next one, that the territory described does not form a part of any other municipal corporation, and that it appears that the territory is inhabited. We think it sufficiently appears from these paragraphs that the council "took evidence" upon the jurisdictional requirements. In the petition for annexation the council had evidence before it. This petition was signed by a number of persons whose statements the council was evidently willing to take. One of the inducement paragraphs states as a finding of fact that the registration of voters of the county (when compared with the petition) shows that one-fourth of the qualified electors residing in the territory described had signed the petition. Certainly we cannot assume that the council decreed these facts without any basis therefor. Rather the presumption is the other way, that officials in performing their duties performed them with all legal requirements. The petition also showed that the property was inhabited (as did the said register of voters), and that the territory constituted one body of land. For all we know (and this collateral attack cannot inquire), each councilman himself knew the territory well, or each and/or all of them went to view the property between the third of the month, the filing date, and the tenth of the month, the date of the ordinance.

[10, 11] It may also be added, if more were needed, that the proceeding known as quo warranto is to be exercised only to right an existing wrong and not to try moot questions. It therefore would seem necessary before any issue is presented in the case, as to findings of fact by the council, that there should be allegations that such facts were actually not true. See interesting comment in Imperial Water Co. v. Board of Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, at pages 24 and 25, 120 P. 780, where the same point is treated in certiorari. Not only is this allegation not to be found in the complaint, except as to the territory constituting one or more bodies of land, but the stipulation of facts completely covers all of the facts necessary to be found by the council before it could act upon the petition.

[12, 13] The complaint alleges, and the stipulation of facts is to the same effect, that the petition was not dated; but the statute does not require that it be dated. Likewise, it is alleged and admitted that no dates were affixed after the names of any of the signers of the petition; but under the authority of People v. City of Belmont, 100 Cal. App. 537, 280 P. 540, we hold that this does not affect the validity of the petition.

[14] A remaining point concerns an alleged error in the description of the "addition." The stipulation referred to is that the petitioners intended to fix the boundary line between the most northerly line of parcel 7 on the ownership property line, but through some error it was described to fall one foot beyond this line. All of the proceedings carry this error. We think it is too late after the annexation proceedings have all been had to go back and inquire into the motive or the intention of the petitioners, and that the lands described remain the lands within the proposed "addition." The logic of this statement would seem to support it, but the Supreme Court passed upon a question of somewhat the same character in the same way, in People v. Town of Loyalton, 147 Cal. 774, 82 P. 620. The only materiality of the stipulation regarding this fact is that it absolves the petitioners from any ulterior motive in drawing the line one foot off the property line.

[15] Respondents raise a very interesting constitutional question. The annexation statute of 1913 requires that the election notice, including appropriate reference to any existing indebtedness of the city which is to be paid by the levy of taxes over the whole territory after annexation, shall be published, if published at all, for 4 weeks preceding the hearing thereof. Section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution generally covers the matter of consolidating territory into one organization known as a "city and county." In the various steps toward that end the consent of incorporated territory must be had by separate vote before it can be included in a district with other territory in which a vote is to be taken upon the acceptance or rejection of consolidation into a city and county. Thus two elections are provided for, and both of these elections are proceedings relating to the consolidation of territory into or with a "city and county" government. In both of these elections, notice, if published, is required to be published for 5 successive weeks, the last thereof to be not less than 20 days prior to the date of election. It would seem clear thus far that the notice of elections as here just referred to would have no application to a simple annexation to a city. However, further on in this subdivision of the Constitution we find the following paragraph: "No property in any territory hereafter consolidated with or annexed to any city or city and county shall be taxed for * * * any indebtedness of such city or city and county outstanding at the date of such consolidation or annexation * * * unless there shall have been [successfully] submitted to the qualified electors * * * the proposition regarding the assumption of indebtedness as hereinbefore set forth. * * *" The question presents itself as to whether, under this provision, the election procedure prescribing for steps in city and county formation or enlargement applies as well to an annexation proceeding to a city as in the instant case. It will be seen that this question could not have arisen had the expression which is above italicized by us, "as herein-before set forth," not been in the provision, for then any appropriate election would have answered the requirement. It is then most important to ascertain the antecedent, as it were, of this phrase. The immediate subject before this phrase treats of the submission to electors of "the proposition regarding the assumption of indebtedness." This, of course, needs explanation as to what indebtedness is meant, and the question is answered by referring back in the same paragraph to "any indebtedness * * * outstanding at the date of * * * annexation." We conclude that the questioned phrase refers to the indebtedness intended as expressed in the paragraph with such phrase, and not to the procedure for city and county enlargement occurring in the Constitution several paragraphs earlier, and that the notice of election which was published in this instance was effective for all purposes. The question does not seem to be raised in Fostler v. Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 263, 176 P. 438, but the opinion and decision therein could not have been reached had the court followed the theory contended for by respondents herein.

Appellants respond to this question in another manner. The point is not raised in the complaint, but before decision in the superior court plaintiffs requested the privilege of amending, to add it. The court denied the application, and appellants here assert that this ruling has become res adjudicata, since no appeal was taken thereon. Respondents answer that jurisdictional questions can be raised at any time, and appellants counter with the proposition that it comes too late, as it amounts to a new cause of action, and section 349½, Code of Civil Procedure, is a binding statute of limitation against questioning the legality of an annexation later than 3 months after completion of the proceedings. We do not think it is necessary to pass upon the point.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to make its findings of fact and conclusions of law in accord with this opinion, and to enter judgment for defendants and against plaintiffs, together with costs.

SCHLENKER v. EGLOFF et al.

Civ. 7977.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 22, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1933.

1. Trial ☞127.

Where one charged with negligence acknowledges responsibility, and as part of statement refers to fact that he carries insurance, declaration is admissible.

2. Appeal and error ☞1170(6).

Misconduct of counsel in injection of fact of insurance into case is not cause for reversal unless it prevented complaining party from having fair trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1).

3. Appeal and error ☞978(2).

Ordinarily, misconduct of counsel is question for trial court, whose determination thereof, made on motion for new trial, is conclusive unless plainly wrong.

4. Appeal and error ☞933(4).

Absent contrary showing, District Court of Appeal must conclude that motion for new trial was denied as matter of law (Code Civ. Proc. § 660).

5. Appeal and error ☞1170(6).

Injection into automobile accident case of fact of defendant's indemnity insurance held to warrant reversal of judgment for plaintiff, where evidence of defendant's negligence was conflicting and evidence of plaintiff's intestate's negligence was almost conclusive (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1).

Action by John Schlenker, as administrator of the estate of Georgia May Schlenker, for the death of the latter, his wife, through the alleged negligence of defendant Egloff. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff that defendant has appealed, the action having been dismissed as to all others.

On November 9, 1929, defendant Egloff was driving her Buick coupe on Eagle Rock boulevard in Los Angeles, when at or near the intersection of Avenue 42 with said thoroughfare decedent came in contact with her car. At the place where the accident occurred Eagle Rock boulevard does not run north and south but lies nearer east and west. For convenience, however, it will be treated here, as in the trial of the case, as if it ran northerly and southerly. Defendant was traveling toward Hollywood, or, as we will say, south on Eagle Rock boulevard. Cuts of two maps of the location are attached to the reporter's transcript, each marked as though drawn to a scale. The scale of 1" to 10" shown on the cut marked Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 is clearly erroneous, as that would make the entire width of the boulevard but approximately 32.5 feet, an impossible figure considering its physical features as hereinafter shown. Defendant's Exhibit A shows it to be approximately 65 feet wide. In establishing the fixed distances we use the scale on the latter cut, as it seems to give distances more in accord with the space required and more in consonance with some of the figures given by the witnesses. The boulevard is apparently paved on each side of a dirt strip which, according to Exhibit A, is 17½ feet wide. The strip is higher than the pavement and on it are double tracks of the Los Angeles Railway, with a space wide enough for an unloading platform between the outer rails and the inner edge of the pavement. Each of the paved strips is approximately 23 feet in width. Avenue 42 comes into the boulevard from the west and extends across the tracks, the right of way being cut down and paved through the strip to the east roadway of the boulevard, with a width of approximately 45 feet. There is a pole about 60 feet south of Avenue 42, on the south side of the boulevard, which plays a prominent part in the evidence. Decedent having alighted from a northbound street car, waited for it to pass and then proceeded from the unloading platform on the east side of the right of way to the west side thereof, on a walk across the strip parallel with Avenue 42 and about opposite from the sidewalk along the south side of the avenue. She was seen by one of plaintiff's witnesses to step down from the right of way into the paved roadway over which defendant was traveling. None of plaintiff's witnesses saw her thereafter until after or about the time of the accident.

The case came on for trial before a jury on March 8, 1931. Plaintiff's attorney in his opening statement to the jury said in part: "We will show by the officer who made the investigation immediately after the accident that Mrs. Egloff told him that she had to appear at KNX station; she was broadcasting over the radio at 8 o'clock that evening and she was in a hurry to get to work * * * and further said: 'I am fully covered by insurance and the insurance company will pay all damages.'" On defendant's motion a mistrial was declared and the jury excused, the judge remarking: "I have always maintained that insurance has absolutely no business before the jury. * * * I don't want to put you out again and I don't want to try it, if you can make the same motion before another judge who will allow you to do it." The case was then sent back to the master calendar department and two days later was assigned to another jury department for trial. In this department the attorney for plaintiff stated that there was a question of law to decide before making the opening statement, and in the absence of the jury it was explained to the court what had happened previously and permission was asked to include the matter referred to above in the opening statement and to introduce evidence thereof on the trial as an admission against interest. The objection of defendant thereto was overruled and counsel for plaintiff said, in making such statement: "When the officer arrived on the scene to investigate the accident he asked the lady who was driving the car how the accident happened. She told him she had to appear at KNX to broadcast that night and was in a hurry, but she said, 'I am fully insured, and the insurance company will pay all the damages.'" At this point the attorney for defendant objected to such statement as improper, no insurance company being involved, as prejudicial error and misconduct on the part of attorney for plaintiff in attempting to get before the jurors a matter not for their consideration and solely for the purpose and in the hope of influencing them, and asked the court to declare a mistrial. This motion was denied, the court however instructing the jury to disregard any statement of counsel or testimony "in reference to the insurance company, except in so far as any conversation may relate to the question of negligence, if any, on the part of defendant." Attorney for plaintiff, continuing his statement to the jury, then said: "There is no use in picking my thread or line of thought to repeat that statement. That statement is made to you only as showing the state of the defendant's mind on the evening there immediately after the accident. I don't expect you to go up to the jury room and reason that this is against an insurance company. It is not. You decide this case the same as if no insurance or nothing was ever mentioned, and I know this jury can do that."

Defendant was called as a witness by plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and among other questions and answers are the following:

"Q. Didn't the police officer Roddenberry ask you how the accident happened? A. Yes, I believe he did.

"Q. Didn't you reply in substance that you were going to appear at KNX and were in a hurry that night, but if you injured anyone your company would pay all the damages? A. Absolutely untrue."

Here counsel for defendant objected to the asking of the question upon the same grounds as were urged in objection to the opening statement and also that it could not be an admission of any responsibility for the accident, assigning it as prejudicial error to bring the matter of insurance before the jury. The court overruled the objection with the announcement that it would consider the same objection made as to any similar question whenever the matter appeared in the record and the same ruling given.

Officer Roddenberry, called as a witness for the plaintiff, was asked several leading questions relative to the conversation had with defendant after the accident, to which no objection was made until he was asked, "Did she state to you in substance that ——" at which time an objection was interposed by counsel for defendant on the ground that it was very apparent that the question was leading. Attorney for plaintiff, however, contended that it was impeaching and that he had a right to ask it in the same words he had previously used in interrogating defendant. The court ruled that the witness could relate the conversation. Counsel for plaintiff then continued:

"Q. Did she say anything to you about where she was going? A. She did.

"Q. What did she state about that? A. She said she was going to KNX broadcasting station.

"Q. Did she say anything about whether she was wanting to get there soon or— A. She said she was in a hurry."

Here the court stated that the witness should relate the conversation had with defendant, and the officer then said:

"I asked the defendant if—where she was going, and she said she was going to KNX broadcasting station and that she was in a hurry to get there. She was afraid she was going to be late. She stated—wanted to know if the lady was hurt very bad, hurt in the accident, and I told her I didn't know, and she said—"

"Mr. Betts [counsel for defendant]: Just a moment, that is—I think that fully answers the question.

"The Court: You may relate the conversation you had. Mr. Blackwood [counsel for plaintiff]: Go right ahead. A. * * * She stated she had full coverage on the automobile." Counsel for defendant at this point renewed his objection and asked the court to declare a mistrial. This motion was denied and the court stated in substance that after the witness had "related all the conversation which he had with the defendant" he would permit counsel for plaintiff to ask the impeaching question which he desired to ask. After this interruption the examination proceeded:

"Q. Will you relate any further conversation, if you had not completed the statement? A. The defendant also stated she wanted the lady who was hurt to receive the very best of care, and so forth, and I told her I would have to take her to the Highland Park police station for further investigation. She then got in her car and drove to the Highland Park station and I followed."

The witness was then asked the so-called impeaching question:

"Q. Did she state to you, Mr. Roddenberry, there at the scene of the accident, in substance as follows: 'I am in a hurry to get to KNX, I had to broadcast there, at KNX tonight, but I am fully covered, and the insurance company will pay all of the damage?' A. She did."

"Q. Did she further state in substance that same thing, in effect, at the station, at the Highland Park station after you got her down there? A. She did."

On cross-examination the officer stated that he asked defendant "approximately a dozen questions" and that "she made all of those statements on the evening of the accident," but that "there was no relationship of one to the other, so far as I know of." He admitted that he knew there was no cause for a felony charge at that time and that he made no charge against defendant, and although he made a report of the case he could not remember whether he "stated there was no traffic violation or not"; that at the police station he did not ask any questions but "turned her over to the detectives, and they were handling the case from then on."

The sole contention of appellant is that the injection into the case of the fact of her indemnity insurance, considering the manner in which it was done and in view of the condition of the evidence under which the jury could well have found in her favor, was prejudicial error.

Certain significant facts are undisputed. It clearly appears that appellant was not due to go on the air at KNX until 8 o'clock p. m., and that she was only required to be there in time to do so; that she did not telephone the broadcasting studio that she might not be there until she called from the police station at about 20 minutes of 8; that she actually arrived at KNX at 8:01 p. m., from the police station, which is a greater distance from the broadcasting station than is the scene of the accident. There is evidence from which the jury might conclude that decedent collided with appellant's car in crossing from the sidewalk on the right of way to that directly across the roadway on the south side of Avenue 42, as there is from which it might have concluded that she was not going at right angles but diagonally away from Avenue 42 and was hit at a point from 25 to 50 feet south of the sidewalk line. A city ordinance was introduced in evidence which makes it unlawful to cross a roadway except by the shortest route to the opposite curb and which applied to the roadway wherein the accident occurred. There is also evidence from which the jury might have concluded that appellant's car was traveling between 25 and 30 miles per hour, and other evidence—estimated by experts from skid marks measured by some of the witnesses the day after the inquest or about six days after the accident—which fixed the rate of speed at from 50 to 60 miles per hour. The investigating officer, F. M. Stay, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he found skid marks starting 10 feet north of Avenue 42 and going straight down the boulevard for a distance of 70 feet, where "they sort of swerved into the west curb line."

What we have said of the evidence shows, in our opinion, that the jury might well have decided the question of appellant's negligence either way.

[1, 2] Considerable doubt exists in the decisions as to just what is involved in the error urged here. Undoubtedly where one charged with negligence makes a statement which may be fairly construed as an acknowledgment of responsibility, "and as part of such statement makes reference to the fact that he carries insurance," the declaration is properly admissible. Harju v. Market Street Railway Co., 114 Cal. App. 138, 299 P. 788. As one court has said in regard to the cases involving statements referring to insurance: "A fair conclusion, from a résumé of the cases, would be to class such a reference under the head of misconduct of counsel. It might be conceded that where it is obvious or fairly deducible that the sole purpose was to impress that fact of insurance on the minds of the jury, for no other reason than to create a prejudice, then a reversal will follow. But where the reference, as indicated in the cited cases, is merely incidental, misconduct will not be found." Noble v. Bacon (Cal. App.) 18 P.(2d) 699, 702. We think it is equally true that even where the record points unerringly to misconduct in the injection of the fact of insurance into the case, such misconduct would not be cause for reversal unless it had the effect of preventing the complaining party from having a fair trial. Robinson v. Western States Gas, etc., Co., 184 Cal. 401, 194 P. 39. In other words, in order to justify a reversal, such misconduct, in our opinion, must constitute such an irregularity in the proceedings or conduct of the court, jury, or adverse party as to materially affect the substantial rights of the party aggrieved. Section 657, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc.

[3-5] Ordinarily the question of misconduct is one for the trial court, and its determination thereof, made on motion for a new trial, will not be disturbed unless under all the circumstances it is plainly wrong. Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538. The record here shows that appellant made such a motion at the time the notice of appeal was filed. The record is silent as to any further proceedings thereon. The merits of the motion were apparently not brought to the attention of the trial court, and we must conclude in the absence of a contrary showing that such motion was denied as a matter of law under section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the condition of the evidence as to the negligence of defendant alone, it would seem that the injection into the case of the very disconcerting idea of insurance might well have turned the scale in the minds of the jurors on that question, resulting in preventing her from having a fair trial of that issue.

With regard to the negligence of decedent the evidence is undisputed. Appellant's testimony is to the effect that decedent walked or ran into the side of her car. Respondent's witness Stay, the investigating officer, in describing the marks on appellant's car, said: "The left front fender was dented. There were marks on it as if being brushed by a cloth of some kind * * * just once." That there was a dent "in the cowl, * * * the portion between the hood and the windshield * * * as from some blunt object * * *; it was a dent that I would say, with reference to a ball, about the size of a ten pin ball, a bowling ball." That the left front cowl light was "dented and twisted around from facing the front of the car so that the light would shine off at the side of the car," and was "bent back a little," and that "the left windwing was broken." That the damage just described, excepting the small dent in the front of the left fender, which may have touched the telephone pole as the car reversed itself, was made by contact with decedent is admitted by counsel for respondent during the course of his argument to the jury, in answer to the question of a juror as to what the "cowl" was. After describing what was meant by the cowl of the automobile and the cowl light, he said: "She [decedent] was thrown over and she hit the cowl and made a dent in it." That she was not thrown over from the front is evident from the physical fact that the dust was brushed off "a little to the side and on top of the fender." There obviously would have been more evidence of contact than that if the car had hit decedent with the front of the fender. Appellant thought she had averted the accident when she turned the front wheels "at almost right angles," and the physical facts are more in accord with the theory that decedent walked or ran into the car, brushing the fender and falling onto the cowl head first, the head and shoulders twisting the headlight and breaking the windwing as she was thrown off the machine. In other words, the evidence seems to establish decedent's negligence almost as a matter of law.

It is to be observed that the only statement relative to insurance testified to by Officer Roddenberry, when relating the conversation had with appellant, was that "she stated she had full coverage on the automobile," and that so far as the individual statements were concerned, while made on the evening of the accident, "there was no relationship of one to the other, so far as I know of." In other words, the statement that she had full coverage was not made in connection with the statement that she was going to the broadcasting station, was late and in a hurry to get there, from which an admission of responsibility for the accident might be implied; and no such implication can be made from the mere statement that she had full coverage, made possibly in answer to a question propounded or possibly from mere thankfulness that she had the foresight to carry insurance, regardless of whether she was negligent or not—a feeling that one might well have in view of the uncertainty of the verdict in a negligence case. Nowhere did the officer testify that appellant said "the insurance company will pay all the damage," until the words were put into his mouth by the so-called impeaching question, which was combined with other statements concerning which the witness actually testified and to which he answered "she did." That is a conclusion from the statement that appellant had full coverage which respondent and the witness might make, but it should not be permitted to be given before a jury as it was here, in our opinion. "The natural tendency of a line of examination that suggests to the jury that the defendant is indemnified against any judgment for damages against him is highly prejudicial to his rights, especially in a closely balanced case where the evidence otherwise would be easily sufficient on appeal to support a verdict either for the plaintiff or for the defendant." Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 139, 266 P. 954, 955.

The trial court could only conclude from the opening statement to the jury that the statement as to insurance would be shown by the evidence to be inextricably connected with an admission against interest; but when the fact appeared that it was only so connected by counsel in his effort to get before the jury the question of insurance, then the court should, without hesitation, having granted the motion of appellant and declared a mistrial. Advising the jurors to disregard the question of insurance except as connected with an admission of liability, and instructions to that effect did not repair the damage, as is shown by the fact that the jury gave no heed to almost conclusive evidence of decedent's negligence in failing to notice an oncoming lighted car and in walking into the side of it.

FLORMAN v. PATZER.

Civ. 7656.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 19, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨931(7).

In pedestrian's action for injuries, motorist could not complain that court should have considered particular intersection in determining negligence, where record did not show that court failed to consider such fact; presumption being that manner in which intersection of street was formed was considered by court.

2. Appeal and error ⇨996.

On appeal from judgment, where it appears that evidence was such that inference either of negligence or of contributory negligence might have been drawn fairly by jury or trial court, conclusion reached thereon may not be disturbed by reviewing court.

3. Automobiles ⇨244(35).

Evidence that motorist drove automobile across intersection at speed greater than 15 miles per hour, striking crippled pedestrian, supported finding of motorist's negligence.

4. Automobiles ⇨244(50).

Evidence supported finding that crippled pedestrian struck by motorist at intersection was not contributorily negligent.

Evidence disclosed that before crossing intersection, pedestrian looked to his left and to his right and saw automobile at distance which he considered sufficiently far away to permit his crossing without being struck, that pedestrian could be seen by others at distance of sixty feet away, though it was raining and visibility was bad, and that, if motorist were looking where he was going, he could have avoided accident.

5. Damages ⇨163(1).

Plaintiff seeking damages must prove extent of damages alleged to have been suffered by him.

6. Damages ⇨163(1).

Crippled pedestrian struck by automobile held not entitled to special damages, though he introduced evidence that his artificial leg was rendered practically useless and that his clothes were torn, where there was no evidence of value of damaged articles.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by B. M. Florman against Gus C. Patzer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed, with modification.

H. M. Lineman and Mab Copeland Lineman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dempster & Dempster, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice.

[1] While walking west, across the south side of Thirty-Seventh street, in the city of Los Angeles, at a point where Thirty-Seventh street intersects Hill street, plaintiff was struck by an automobile which at that time was being driven by defendant south on Hill street. Thirty-Seventh street ends at the west line of Hill street. In an action brought by plaintiff against defendant for damages which resulted from such accident, plaintiff was awarded a judgment therein for the gross sum of $2,625, of which amount the sum of $2,500 was for general damages, and the sum of $125 was for special damages. From such judgment defendant has appealed to this court.

Although it is admitted by appellant that within the contemplation of the law the accident occurred at an intersection of two streets, and consequently with reference thereto that the law finds its application, nevertheless it is within the contention of appellant that, in reaching a conclusion as to whether either defendant was guilty of negligence, or plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, the situation with reference to the particular intersection should have been taken into consideration by the trial court. But, conceding that the position assumed by appellant in that regard is correct, it nowhere appears in the record herein that, in reaching its final decision, the trial court failed to give consideration to such fact; and, since the facts to which reference has been had were in evidence, it must be presumed that the manner in which the intersection of the streets was formed was among the several facts of which the trial court took notice in reaching its conclusion.

Specifically, the trial court found that defendant was guilty of negligence, and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. Among the several findings of fact made by the trial court may be noted the following:

"That, at the time and place of the said accident, defendant was driving the said automobile in a street intersection at a rate of speed in excess of fifteen miles an hour.

"That the defendant, at the time and place of the said accident, was not looking where he was going; that if the defendant had been looking where he was going, he would have seen the plaintiff in time to avoid a collision with the plaintiff.

"That the defendant, at the time and place of the accident, was driving his automobile at such a rate of speed that he could not stop in time to avoid hitting the plaintiff, after the plaintiff came within the area lighted by the lamps of the defendant's automobile.

"That it is not true that the plaintiff endeavored to cross the street at a place not intended for pedestrians.

"That, at the time and place of the accident, the street was wet and slippery from rain, which was at that time falling.

"That the accident happened in the evening, but it was not difficult to see; that, at the time and place of the accident, the visibility was such, that the plaintiff was visible to other persons at a distance of sixty (60) feet.

"That the plaintiff was crippled and using crutches, but that neither his crippled condition nor the use of crutches caused or contributed to the accident.

"That the plaintiff did not negligently proceed from a place of safety in the path of defendant's automobile, but, on the contrary, plaintiff was crossing the street, and had nearly reached the far side of the street when he was struck by the defendant's automobile.

"That the accident could have been avoided by the defendant, if the defendant had been using ordinary care."

Appellant does not complain either that such findings are not supported by the evidence, or that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court, either in receiving evidence offered by plaintiff, or in rejecting evidence offered by defendant. However, for a reversal of the judgment appellant principally relies upon each of two specifications of error: First, that defendant was not guilty of negligence; and, secondly, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Within the evidence adduced on the trial of the action may be noted the following testimony: The accident occurred on a rainy night. With the assistance afforded him by two crutches, plaintiff was walking across the street in which he was injured in a position which would be within lines marked by a prolongation of the sidewalk lines of the intersecting street. On each of its "four corners" the intersection was illuminated by two electric lights. There was no "pedestrian lane." Before attempting to make the crossing, plaintiff looked both to his right and to his left. After reaching the center of the street which he had essayed to cross, he again looked to his right and, at a distance of "three or four blocks," saw the automobile which defendant was driving approaching plaintiff from that direction. In the words of plaintiff: "I walked down then because I thought I would have time * * * watching that car * * * all the time * * * held up my crutch * * * I did keep looking north, and held up my crutch instantly, and I kept it up nearly all the way until he struck me. * * * He (defendant) was coming not slowly at all; * * * I considered it fast." Another witness testified that at the time the accident occurred defendant's auto was traveling at a rate of twenty miles per hour. Plaintiff also testified that he stopped just before he was struck by defendant's auto, which was at a point about eight feet from the curb. According to the testimony given by defendant, he was traveling at the rate of sixteen to eighteen miles an hour. His car was equipped with large two-wheel brakes which were in proper working order; also equipped with automatic windshield wiper which was in operation at the time, and with proper headlights, which were "on at the time." He first observed plaintiff at a point twelve feet from the west curb line, at which time plaintiff was from four to eight feet from defendant. As soon as he observed plaintiff he "swerved," turning his automobile to the left to avoid striking plaintiff, but the right fender of his automobile struck plaintiff and knocked him to the pavement. Several automobiles were traveling in a southerly direction and several were traveling in a northerly direction, at about the same rate of speed at which the automobile of defendant was traveling. The street lights cast shadows on the street so that the visibility was poor, and headlights of automobiles approaching from the south reflected in the windshield of defendant's automobile at the time of the accident; and defendant's automobile did not skid at the time he turned to avoid striking plaintiff.

[2] In substance and effect, repeatedly the law has been declared by the appellate courts of this state that on appeal from a judgment, where it appears that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was such that an inference either of negligence of the defendant, or of contributory negligence of the plaintiff, fairly might have been drawn either by the jury, or by the trial court, a conclusion reached thereon by either of such triers of fact may not be disturbed. 19 Cal. Jur. 723 et seq., and authorities there cited.

[3, 4] Reverting to the established facts, it is clear that at and immediately preceding the time of the accident plaintiff not only had a lawful right to occupy the position in the street which he did, but that during all such time he was in the exercise of at least ordinary care for his safety and protection. Before attempting to cross the intersection of the two streets, he not only stopped, but he looked both to his left and to his right, and from such action he ascertained that in the latter direction the automobile driven by defendant at that time was at an estimated distance from plaintiff of "three or four blocks"; and, notwithstanding his crippled condition, even handicapped by the enforced use of crutches, he advanced so far in crossing the intersection before he was struck by the automobile as to be within about eight feet of the curb of the sidewalk.

On the other hand, if for no other reason, defendant's negligence in the premises, which was the proximate cause of the accident, is established by the fact that, at the time when and at the place where the accident occurred, he was driving his automobile in a street intersection at a rate of speed greater than that permitted by law, and that in the circumstances, "he could not stop in time to avoid hitting plaintiff." But, in addition thereto, the established facts present the situation, as found by the trial court, "that at the time and place of the accident, the visibility was such that plaintiff was visible to other persons at a distance of sixty feet; * * * that the defendant * * * was not looking where he was going; that if the defendant had been looking where he was going, he would have seen the plaintiff in time to avoid a collision with the plaintiff."

It becomes manifest that neither of the principal points presented by appellant is tenable.

[5, 6] However, appellant complains of the lack of evidence to support the finding of the trial court to the effect that plaintiff suffered special damages in the sum of $125. It is admitted by appellant that, as a foundation for such award, testimony was adduced to the effect that plaintiff's artificial leg was bent and rendered practically useless, and that "his clothes were torn," etc. Respondent does not deny that no evidence regarding the value of any of such damaged articles was either offered to or received by the trial court. The general rule is that the burden of proving the extent of the damage alleged to have been suffered by him is on the plaintiff. 8 Cal. Jur. 895, and authorities there cited; Hahn v. Wilde, 211 Cal. 52, 293 P. 30. The case of Smith v. Calley, 103 Cal. App. 735, 284 P. 974, 975, was for damages to an automobile which resulted from a collision between it and a motortruck. Although it appeared in evidence that plaintiff's automobile had been driven several thousand miles, what was its original cost, and that after the collision it was "a complete wreck," it was held that because "there is no evidence of the amount of money required to repair the injuries, if they could be repaired, nor the value of the car after the accident," the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment.

It follows that the judgment herein should be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $125. As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed; appellant to recover costs.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The defendant was charged with driving an automobile on a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor and, after a trial before the court without a jury, was found guilty. On his application the court made an order granting him probation upon certain named conditions. The defendant made no motion for a new trial, but gave notice of an appeal from the order granting probation.

[1, 2] Judgment has not been pronounced, the defendant having waived the same by application for probation, People v. De Voe, 123 Cal. App. 233, 11 P.(2d) 26, and the order granting probation, not being an order made after judgment, is not an appealable order, People v. Patello, 125 Cal. App. 480, 13 P.(2d) 1068; People v. Noone (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 284; People v. Von Eckartsberg (Cal. App.) 23 P.(2d) 819.

We may add, however, that the sole point raised on this purported appeal is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction in that, aside from the admissions and confessions of the appellant, the corpus delicti was not proven. We have examined the record, which is very brief, and are satisfied that the corpus delicti was sufficiently established by facts and circumstances other than the admissions and confessions of the defendant, and these admissions leave no doubt as to the guilt of the defendant.

The appeal is dismissed.

CRAIG, Justice.

An action having for its basis a promissory note of the defendant, payable to the plaintiff's assignor, resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which said defendant appealed.

[1] Following proof of the note and indebtedness, which were not denied, an instrument was offered in support of the allegation that "prior to the commencement of this action the claim sued upon was duly and regularly assigned to the plaintiff herein." Objections were interposed by the defendant that the written assignment had not been pleaded as required by section 447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, "if the plaintiff relies upon a written instrument, in whole or in part, that fact shall be pleaded." It is argued that to permit the introduction in evidence of a written instrument without allegation according to said section would constitute reversible error. However, since it is not contended that the fact of assignment was not pleaded, nor that the offered document was incompetent evidence thereof, such objection was untenable in the instant case. Meyer v. Foster, 147 Cal. 166, 81 P. 402.

MILLER v. HENNING.

Civ. 7864.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 24, 1933.

1. Bills and notes ⇨489(2).

Written instrument showing that note sued on was assigned to plaintiff held not inadmissible on ground instrument was not pleaded as required by statute, in absence of contention that fact of assignment was not pleaded or that such instrument was incompetent evidence of assignment (Code Civ. Proc. § 447).

2. Bills and notes ⇨489(2).

In action on note wherein defendant raised question of consideration, defendant's letters to payee amounting to admissions and guaranty of payment, and offered in corroboration of plaintiff's pleaded consideration, held not "written instruments" within statute requiring such instruments to be pleaded (Code Civ. Proc. § 447).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Written Instrument," see Words & Phrases.]

3. Appeal and error ⇨1056(1).

Where defendant sued on note testified that he agreed in writing to guarantee indebtedness and executed note to fulfill agreement, tion of consideration, it appears that said letters were offered in corroboration of the plaintiff's evidence in support of his pleaded consideration. This being true, they were not written instruments within the domain of the quoted section, but constituted evidence in connection with the documentary basis of the action, which was pleaded in hæc verba. Hence objection upon the ground stated by the appellant was properly overruled.

[3] The defendant having testified that he entered into the agreement evidenced by said letter above mentioned and gave his promissory note accordingly, he was asked by his counsel to relate conversations asserted to have transpired, tending to show that said note had been given for another and different purpose. The exclusion of this evidence is assigned as error. In support of such contention is cited Richardson v. Lamp, 209 Cal. 668, 290 P. 14, which was an action upon a promissory note in the principal sum of $1,500. However, it there appeared that the plaintiff as agent of another had attempted to sell certain property to a corporation in which the defendants were interested; that the plaintiff induced the defendants to execute their said note for an aggregate of charges for trips and expenses upon the representation that he would not collect the same unless it could be obtained from other persons against whom the defendants had claims for money and damages. It was definitely agreed that the plaintiff would not hold the defendants liable and would collect, if at all, from others "as additional damages which he alleged he could collect from the said [other persons]." Since said note represented nothing more than damages which the plaintiff proposed to collect from other persons, consideration flowing to the defendants was found wanting. In the instant case the defendant testified that he had agreed in writing to guarantee an indebtedness; that he executed said note in the proper amount; that "the reason for giving his note was the acceptance of this letter," and "it was the only thing I could do at the time in fulfillment of this letter." It does not appear that the ruling assigned as error was prejudicial.

[4] The only remaining question arises from exclusion of testimony offered by the defendant in response to questions as to whether or not he did "obtain anything of value" or "receive any consideration" for said note. The evidence tendered could have constituted no more than conclusions of the witness in denial of his prior testimony, and the objections were properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

HANSEN v. FRESNO JERSEY FARM DAIRY CO.*

Civ. 826.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 20, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 14, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Sept. 18, 1933.

1. Account stated ⇨1.

Application of "account stated" to case having written contract should be confined to such elements as have been left unsettled by contract, or to things left subject to later determination, and should not ordinarily be applied to establish a lesser price for goods bought than that fixed in prior written contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Account Stated," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Account stated ⇨4.

Under contract for sale of milk providing for fixed price until changed in accordance with provisions, buyer's payment with checks for lesser amount than provided for held not "account stated," where contract was not changed.

3. Accord and satisfaction ⇨25(4).

One relying on accord and satisfaction must plead and prove both.

4. Accord and satisfaction ⇨8(1).

Without honest dispute, agreement to take lesser amount in payment for liquidated claim is without consideration, and void as "accord and satisfaction."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Accord and Satisfaction," see Words & Phrases.]

5. Accord and satisfaction ⇨11(1).

Compromise and settlement ⇨5(2).

To constitute "accord and satisfaction" there must be not only bona fide dispute, but circumstances must show that lesser amount tendered was given and accepted on condition that acceptance would fully discharge obligation.

6. Accord and satisfaction ⇨11(1).

Compromise and settlement ⇨5(2).

Under contract for sale of milk, seller's acceptance of checks for less than contract price held not "accord and satisfaction," where evidence showed that seller did not accept checks in full payment.

Evidence disclosed that there was no real dispute as to amount due under terms of contract, and that attempted reduction was arbitrarily made. When first told of reduction, seller protested and stated he would look into his legal rights. Seller cashed checks, but did nothing to indicate that he accepted them in full payment.

*For subsequent opinion see 31 P.2d 359.

7. Contracts ⇨170(1).

In determining meaning of written contract, consideration must be given interpretation which parties themselves placed on it as evidence of their acts.

8. Sales ⇨77(1).

Where seller under contract for sale of milk agreed to assume one-half of reduction in buyer's price to "customers," seller held not bound by buyer's reduction of price to wholesalers, where parties intended retail customers only and contract referred to price in singular.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Customer," see Words & Phrases.]

9. Sales ⇨382.

In seller's breach of contract action against buyer, excluding evidence of buyer's oral notice 45 days before expiration of year of intention to terminate contract held not error, where contract provided for written notice 30 days before expiration of year, and written notice given was not received within such time.

10. Sales ⇨181(11).

In seller's action against buyer for breach of contract for sale of milk, evidence sustained finding that seller complied with contract, and that buyer continued to accept milk, though he claimed milk to be below standard.

Evidence disclosed that complaints as to quality were made many months before expiration of the year at which time the contract was to terminate, that buyer rejected the milk on those occasions, but went on receiving milk for long periods after each rejection, and that seller was able to deliver same quality of milk for second year.

Appeals from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Jacob Hansen against the Fresno Jersey Farm Dairy Company. From the judgment, plaintiff and defendant appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

Irvine P. Aten, of Fresno, for plaintiff.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, of Fresno, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco (Dan F. Conway, of Fresno, and Eugene D. Bennett, of San Francisco, of counsel), for defendant.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The defendant, engaged in distributing dairy products in the city of Fresno, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff, a dairy farmer, providing for the purchase and sale of approximately eighty gallons of milk daily for the period of one year from April 1, 1930, with the provision that the same should be extended for another year unless written notice of termination was given thirty days prior to the expiration date. The contract, after allowing for a deduction for hauling, fixed a net basic price of 24 cents per gallon for the milk to be delivered. It also provided: "That whenever and whilst the buyer reduces its price to customers in order to meet competition or on account of a milk price war in Fresno, the said basic price for milk hereinbefore fixed shall stand reduced for the time of continuance of buyer's said reduced price, in an amount equal to one-half of said reduction." On May 28, 1930, the defendant's manager informed the plaintiff that thereafter the basic price for milk delivered would be reduced 2 cents a gallon. It appears that at that time the defendant reduced its price for milk delivered directly to the homes of consumers, that is, at retail, from 14 cents per quart to 13 cents, and that the plaintiff was told of this fact. It also appears that at the same time the defendant reduced the price of milk it sold to stores from 12 cents per quart to 9 cents, although it appears that this was not known to the plaintiff. The defendant paid the reduced price of 22 cents per gallon for a time, but on September 9, 1930, it informed the plaintiff that it was not making any money, that other people were buying milk for less, and that it would make another cut of 4 cents per gallon, making this retroactive from and after August 1. Plaintiff protested, and stated he intended to look into his legal rights. Thereafter from month to month the defendant sent to the plaintiff an itemized statement showing the amount of milk delivered during the month, the amount due at the contract price, the amount of deduction at 6 cents per gallon, the amount of the balance, together with a check for the amount of the balance shown on the statement. Plaintiff cashed these monthly checks, making no further protest at the respective times.

On March 5, 1931, the defendant gave written notice to the plaintiff that it would discontinue taking milk from him after April 1, 1931. On the last-named date the defendant refused to accept plaintiff's milk, and thereafter he sold the same to other buyers. In this action which followed, a first cause of action seeks to recover an amount covering the 4 cents per gallon deducted by the defendant during the balance of the first year of the contract, and a second cause of action seeks recovery of damages in the amount of the difference between the selling price of the milk for the second year and the reduced contract price of 22 cents per gallon for that milk. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, but for amounts less than those prayed for in the respective causes of action, and from this judgment both plaintiff and defendant have appealed.

It appears that the defendant made no reduction in its price to its customers after May 28, 1930, and that the only reasons given to the plaintiff for the attempted reduction in his selling price in September were that the company was not making money and that other firms were buying milk at a cheaper price. Neither in its answer nor in its briefs on this appeal does the defendant set forth any claim of right to make this reduction of 4 cents per gallon under the terms of the contract. In both places it relies entirely upon the contention that the plaintiff's acceptance of the checks as sent constituted an executed agreement to accept the lesser amounts in full payment for milk furnished during the respective months.

[1, 2] The first question presented is whether the acceptance of these checks month by month, under the circumstances, precludes the plaintiff from recovering the balance of the contract price of the milk delivered, as previously reduced to 22 cents per gallon. The defendant contends that the sending of these monthly statements, with the retention of the checks sent therewith, constitute a succession of accounts stated. While both parties have discussed the matter with reference to the theory of an account stated, we think this theory is not properly applicable to the facts of this case. An account stated has been thus defined: "An account stated is a mere unperformed promise by one party to pay a stated sum to another." Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 183 P. 156, 159; Hammond L. Co. v. Richardson Building, etc., Co., 209 Cal. 82, 285 P. 851. Both historically and as it has developed this doctrine has always been applied to the settling or making certain of what was an unsettled account. Bennett v. Potter, supra. It should not ordinarily be applied or upheld for the purpose of establishing a lesser price for goods purchased and delivered, than that fixed in a prior written contract. In any event, it should not be so applied except under the most unusual circumstances and upon convincing proof. If ever applied in cases where there has been a written contract, the application should be confined to such elements as have been left unsettled by the contract or to things that have been left subject to later determination. It was never intended that this device for rendering certain such contractual elements as have been left uncertain should be used to vary the fixed terms of a written contract or to permit a party who has, in writing, agreed to pay a certain price for goods delivered to escape a part of his obligation by merely remitting a portion of the amount due.

The contract here in question provided for a fixed price until changed in accordance with its provisions, and, never having been so changed, the real question here is whether the payment of a part thereof was made and accepted under circumstances which will constitute an accord and satisfaction. In B. & W. Engineering Co. v. Beam, 23 Cal. App. 164, 137 P. 624, 626, it is said:

"The phrase 'accord and satisfaction' as it is known and applied in the law means the substitution of a new agreement for and in satisfaction of a pre-existing agreement between the same parties. More minutely defined, an agreement of accord and satisfaction is one whereby one of two parties, having a right of action against the other upon a claim arising out of an existing agreement, agrees to accept from the other party something in satisfaction of such right of action different from and usually less than that which might be recovered upon the original obligation. Civ. Code, § 1521. The effect of such agreement when executed is to extinguish the antecedent liability. Civ. Code, § 1523. As a matter of course an agreement of accord and satisfaction presupposes a prior controversy concerning the relative rights of the parties under the pre-existing agreement; and it may be conceded to be the law, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that, before a dispute concerning a claim for money alleged to be due under an existing contract can be made the basis of an agreement of accord and satisfaction, it must be shown that such dispute was bona fide."

In Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 443, 213 P. 45, 47, the court said:

"The general rule, which is but an amplification of our Code sections (Civ. Code, §§ 1521, 1523) defining satisfaction and accord, is—'That where the amount due is in dispute, and a check less than that claimed is sent to the creditor with a statement that it is sent in full satisfaction of the claim, and the tender is accompanied by such acts or declarations as amount to a condition that if the check is accepted at all it is accepted in full satisfaction of the disputed claim, and the creditor so understands, its acceptance by the creditor constitutes an accord and satisfaction even though the creditor states at the time that the amount tendered is not accepted in full satisfaction.' Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., 166 Cal. 23, 134 P. 989; B. & W. Engineering Co. v. Beam, 23 Cal. App. 164, 137 P. 624."

[3, 4] "The general rule is that he who relies upon an accord and satisfaction must plead and prove both. Simmons v. Oullahan, 75 Cal. 508, 17 P. 543. While it is not necessary that the dispute or controversy should be well founded, it is necessary that it should be founded in good faith. Without an honest dispute, an agreement to take a lesser amount in payment for the liquidated claim is without consideration and void. An arbitrary refusal to pay, based on the mere pretense of the debtor, whether for the obvious purpose of exacting terms which are inequitable and oppressive, is not such a dispute as will satisfy the requirements of the rule. Corpus Juris, vol. 1, § 75, pp. 554, 555, and notes."

[5] While a different rule has been applied as between principal and agent (Egan v. Crowther, 74 Cal. App. 674, 241 P. 900), to constitute an accord and satisfaction not only must there be a bona fide dispute as to the amount due, but the circumstances must show that the lesser amount tendered was given and accepted upon the condition and with the understanding that the acceptance thereof would constitute a full discharge of the obligation. Sierra, etc., Co. v. Universal Elec., etc., Co., 197 Cal. 376, 241 P. 76; Berger v. Lane, supra. In the latter case, the court further said:

"In all the cases that have been called to our attention in which a satisfaction has been held to have been conclusively expressed in writing, the writing in some form shows without question that the acceptance of the inclosure was clearly intended to be a satisfaction in full of the claim. This sometimes is shown by the express words used in the body of the check or by an accompanying receipt, stating that the amount sent is in full of all demands."

[6] The court here found, at least impliedly, that the plaintiff did not accept the monthly checks sent in full payment of the amounts due. We think the evidence sustains the findings made. It fully appears that there was no real dispute as to the amount due under the terms of the contract, and that the attempted reduction was arbitrarily made for express reasons not recognized by the contract. Nothing appears to show that the checks were accepted in full payment except that they were cashed and that suit was not brought at once. When first told of the reduction, the plaintiff protested, and stated he would look into his legal rights. No receipts were given, and the statements and checks contained nothing to indicate that they were conditional in any way, or that the payments made were intended to be in full. While the court made no express finding that there was no accord and satisfaction, not only is this really a conclusion of law, but the court found in favor of the plaintiff on the material facts put in issue by the answer, and found, among other things, that the contract price of the milk delivered was a certain amount; that a lesser amount had been paid; that a part of the contract price had not been paid; and that a balance was still owing and unpaid. There is an implied finding that the plaintiff did not accept these checks in full payment of the amounts due, the only possible conclusion from the findings is that there was no accord and satisfaction, and, in the absence of a better pleading, the findings must be held sufficient.

The next question is as to the amount of the judgment rendered on the first cause of action. While the court found that the amount paid to the plaintiff for milk delivered was $733 less than the same would have brought had not this deduction of 4 cents per gallon been made, it allowed this 4 cents per gallon only on 15 per cent. of the milk delivered, giving judgment on this cause of action for $109.92. This resulted because the court found, in accordance with certain evidence produced by the defendant, that on May 28, 1930, the defendant reduced the price of milk to its retail customers 1 cent per quart and to its wholesale customers 3 cents per quart; that on that day it reduced its basic price to the plaintiff 2 cents per gallon; that the defendant made no further reductions in price to its customers; that on May 28, 1930, the defendant was selling and disposing of 20 per cent. of the milk it purchased from the plaintiff and other producers at wholesale, and was selling 80 per cent. thereof at retail; and that at all times after August 1, 1930, the defendant was selling 15 per cent. of such milk at retail and 85 per cent. at wholesale. Accordingly, the court allowed the additional 4 cents per gallon only on 15 per cent. of the gallonage delivered.

[7] The conclusion thus drawn by the court from these facts requires a consideration of the meaning of this contract and of such evidence as throws any light thereon. The contract provides for one price only, equivalent to 24 cents per gallon, which was later reduced to 22 cents. It refers to this price in the singular as "said basic price," "said reduced price," and the like. It makes no reference to any difference in the price dependent upon whether the defendant resold the milk at retail or at wholesale. In providing for a possible reduction, it makes the same dependent upon whether the buyer reduced "its price to customers." The plaintiff testified that "our price has always been based on the retail price," and that, when the reduction was made on May 28, 1930, he was informed of the reduction in the retail price, but not of any reduction in the wholesale price. Not only is it reasonable to infer from the contract that the one price to the customers of the defendant, referred to therein, was the retail price where milk was delivered to householders, this kind of trade then constituting the greater part of the defendant's business, but this interpretation is borne out by the subsequent conduct of the parties. As was said in Work v. Associated Almond Growers, 102 Cal. App. 232, 282 P. 965, 966:

"In determining the meaning of a written agreement, the courts have always given the utmost consideration to the interpretation which the parties themselves have placed upon it, as evidence of their acts, 'and in all cases where the terms of their contract, or the language they employ, raises a question of doubtful construction, and it appears that the parties themselves have practically interpreted their contract, the courts will follow that practical construction. It is to be assumed that parties to a contract best know what was meant by its terms, and are the least liable to be mistaken as to its intention; that each party is alert to his own interests, and to insistence on his rights, and that whatever is done by the parties contemporaneously with the execution of the contract is done under its terms as they understood and intended it should be. * * * In its execution, every executory contract requires more or less of a practical construction to be given it by the parties, and when this has been given, the law, in any subsequent litigation which involves the construction of the contract, adopts the practical construction of the parties as the true construction, and as the safest rule to be applied in the solution of the difficulty.' Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 14, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275, 84 P. 145, 150."

[8] When the reduction in price was made on May 28, 1930, although the defendant was then selling 20 per cent. of its milk at wholesale, this situation was not even mentioned to the plaintiff, and the basic price to him was reduced by only his share of the reduction that had been made in prices to retail trade. This was done although the plaintiff had agreed to assume one-half of any reduction in "its price to customers," and although the wholesale price had been reduced three times as much as had the retail price. While the additional reduction to the plaintiff, had the proportion sold at wholesale been considered, would have amounted to about $20 a month at the time the change was made in accordance with the retail price, and must have greatly increased each month as the court found that 85 per cent. of its milk was being sold at wholesale by the defendant from and after August 1, this important matter was never mentioned or acted upon by the defendant. The interpretation thus placed upon the contract by the parties is rather conclusive, especially in view of the fact that, when a further reduction was arbitrarily attempted in September, no mention was made of wholesale prices or of any increase in that part of the business, and, even when the answer was filed in this case, no facts were alleged in connection with such a situation, and no contention has been here made with respect thereto. Both under the pleadings and under the contract, as interpreted by the parties, all evidence as to any change in the proportion of milk which was being sold at wholesale was immaterial. Under these circumstances, we think the plaintiff was entitled to recover the additional 4 cents per gallon on the amount delivered, and the court has found that this amounts to $733.

[9, 10] The answer of defendant sets up as defenses to the second cause of action that the plaintiff had not performed his part of the contract during the first year, in that on certain dates milk was furnished which was not up to the required standard, and that notice of termination had been given before the close of the first year as required by the contract. The only points here raised by defendant, with regard to the second cause of action, are that the court erred in refusing to admit evidence that the defendant gave to the plaintiff an oral notice of termination of the contract some forty-five days before the end of the year, and that the court erred in excluding evidence to the effect that on ten scattered dates throughout the first year of the contract a part or all of the milk delivered by the plaintiff was rejected by the board of health of the city of Fresno as not up to standard. The contract called for written notice thirty days before the expiration of the year, and it is undisputed that the only written notice given was received by the plaintiff on March 5, 1931. No proof was offered tending to show any waiver of the written notice. With respect to the quality of the milk delivered, no evidence was offered to show what proportion of the delivery on any date was rejected. Most of the ten days complained of were many months before the end of the first year; the last two being on January 7th and March 2d. The contract provided that the defendant should not be required to pay for any milk that did not meet the requirements of the board of health, and that the buyer need not pay for any milk with a foreign odor or, in its discretion, could allow a lesser price therefor. The offer of proof shows that the milk on these occasions was rejected by the defendant, and under the terms of the contract it was under no obligation to pay for the same. However, the evidence shows that the defendant went on receiving milk for long periods after each rejection. The court found that the plaintiff had complied with the contract, that written notice of termination was not given within the time required, and that the plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to deliver the same quantity of milk for the next year. The evidence sustains the findings, and we find no error in the rulings complained of.

The plaintiff has also appealed from the amount of damages allowed by the court on the second cause of action. It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff sold his milk to the best advantage during the ensuing year, and the court made proper findings showing the difference between the contract price of such milk for that year and the price for which the same was sold. However, in considering the contract price, the court took the same position it had taken on the first cause of action, namely, that on 85 per cent. of the milk the contract price was only 18 cents per gallon, while on the remaining 15 per cent. it was 22 cents. The court found to the effect that of the 29,200 gallons per the second year 85 per cent. or 24,820 gallons should be taken at a price of 18 cents per gallon, and the remaining 4,380 gallons at 22 cents. Accordingly, the court fixed the damage at $1,378.02. If our view on this matter is correct, an additional 4 cents per gallon should have been allowed on the contract price of the remaining 24,820 gallons. It follows that an additional $992.80 should have been allowed to the plaintiff, making his damages $2,370.82 instead of $1,378.02. All of the necessary facts have been found by the court, and the result is a mere matter of computation from the facts found. We see no necessity for a retrial, but the judgment should be modified as indicated.

The judgment is modified by increasing the amount allowed as owing on account of milk delivered from $109.92 to $733, and by increasing the amount allowed as damages from $1,378.02 to $2,370.82.

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

McCLAIN v. SAME.

Civ. 8558.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 14, 1933.

1. Licenses ⇨39.

Corporation's certification to corporation commissioner of employment of agent and request for permit for him to sell its securities gave notice of agency to world and estopped corporation to deny it (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended).

2. Licenses ⇨39.

Corporation's designation of agent under Corporate Securities Act does not automatically install him as its representative for sale of its securities; authorization and contract of employment being necessary (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended).

3. Licenses ⇨39.

Corporation's assent to sale of its securities by agent designated under Corporate Securities Act will be presumed, where sale was made with corporation's actual or implied knowledge (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended).

4. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Evidence in actions for money received for corporation stock held to show that corporation not only authorized person making false representations to purchaser to act as its agent in selling stock, but actually participated in sale and received proceeds.

5. Corporations ⇨80(2).

Stockbroker's action in holding himself out as manager of corporation's securities department, with full knowledge and acquiescence of corporation's managing officer, bound corporation by broker's confirmation of purchase of stock by persons relying on selling agent's false representations without knowledge of facts.

6. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Evidence in actions for money received for corporation stock held to show that one on whose fraudulent representations plaintiffs relied in purchasing stock dealt with them as corporation's authorized agent, thereby estopping it to deny his authority.

7. Estoppel ⇨72.

When one of two innocent persons must suffer by another's act, he by whose negligence it happened must suffer.

8. Money received ⇨18(3).

Rule that plaintiff in action for money received must show that defendant was unjustly enriched does not mean that evidence must show that defendant retained riches until time of trial.

9. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Corporation receiving money paid for stock in reliance on its agent's fraudulent representations was unjustly enriched, and hence liable to purchasers therefor, though its manager procured proceeds in exchange for his stock in corporation.

10. Corporations ⇨1.

Corporations being creatures of law, defense of corporate entity, urged as shield for wrongdoing, will not be sustained.

11. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Corporation cannot urge its manager's fraud in intercepting note exchanged for stock, purchasing stock himself, and reselling it to corporation to establish good faith of transaction as against purchasers; corporation's knowledge of manager's acts being presumed.

12. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Corporation manager's embezzlement of amount of note exchanged for stock is no defense to purchasers' claim of fraud in corporation's procurement of note.

13. Corporations ⇨80(9).

Corporation manager's published confession that he falsified records and misappropriated money of corporation held insufficient to put purchasers of stock on notice of selling agent's false representations as to corporation's assets, securities, and dividend paying record.

14. Corporations ⇨80(9).

Purchaser of corporation's stock in reliance on its agent's representations as to its assets, securities, and dividend paying record was not bound to examine corporation commissioner's records to discover falsity of such representations.

15. Corporations ⇨80(9).

Proxy, fraudulently obtained by corporation manager, to vote stock at corporation elections and stockholders' meeting, did not charge stockholder with knowledge, acquired by manager through falsification of corporation's records, as to falsity of agent's representations as to corporation's assets, securities, and dividend paying record when stock was purchased.

16. Corporations ⇨80(10).

Rescission of purchase of corporation stock 38 days after stockholders' meeting, at which partial report, requiring experts 39 days to prepare, was read, held not too late, though purchaser was put on inquiry as to falsity of agent's representations in sale of stock at such meeting.

17. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Failure of purchaser of corporation stock to notify selling agent or corporation's manager of rescission of contract held immaterial, in view of former's fraudulent representations and latter's confession of embezzlement.

18. Corporations ⇨80(12).

Stock purchasers' failure to tender back dividends received did not bar rescission of contract for fraud, where corporation made no objection to tender on receipt of notice of rescission, and distinctly denied liability for amount paid (Code Civ. Proc. § 2076).

19. Contracts ⇨270(2).

Rules regarding prompt rescission of contract and restoration of benefits received being of equitable cognizance, little importance attaches to slight delay in discovering or pursuing means of discovering fraud, where no injury results.

20. Contracts ⇨350(3).

While promptness in rescinding contract for fraud is primarily for trial court, finding of delay, precluding recovery of amount paid thereunder, must be supported by substantial evidence.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

Consolidation actions, two by Laura Belle Damerel and one by Olivia McClain, against the North American Bond & Mortgage Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

Ingle Carpenter and Harold A. Fendler, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. Ronald Button and Geo. T. Warren, both of Hollywood, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is taken from a single judgment entered in three consolidated actions, which judgment is against the plaintiff and in favor of defendant in each case. The plaintiff Laura Belle Damerel instituted two actions, one for money had and received and the other in claim and delivery, whereby she sought recovery of a nonnegotiable note exchanged by her for capital stock of defendant corporation. The action of Olivia McClain was for money had and received.

Practically the same issues are presented in the three cases. We will take first the case of Olivia McClain. On or about July 12, 1929, Mrs. McClain purchased through one Joe Zastrow fifty shares of the preferred capital stock of North American Bond & Mortgage Company, a corporation. Throughout this opinion hereinafter the said company will be referred to as North American Company. On October 25, 1929, she purchased one hundred and seventy shares additional. In each instance she paid $100 per share and the transaction was a cash deal. It was found by the trial court that the purchase of the stock in each instance was induced by and through the fraud and deceit of Joe Zastrow, who falsely and fraudulently represented the facts to Mrs. McClain for the purpose of inducing her to buy the stock. It is further found that Mrs. McClain believed in and relied upon these fraudulent representations, and was induced thereby to make the purchase. Further, it is found that, at the time Zastrow made such representations, he (Zastrow) knew, or had reason to believe, or should have known, that said representations were wholly false and untrue. These findings stand unattacked. We might add they are amply supported by the evidence. The respondent does not question the fact that Mrs. McClain was defrauded to her injury and loss. The claim is that Zastrow had no connection with the defendant corporation. Our first task, then, is to identify Joe Zastrow. If respondent's position is sound, the case ends here. In order that the picture may be as complete as the record will permit, we may go somewhat into detail, inasmuch as our inquiry does not stop with the identification of Zastrow as an individual, but is concerned more with his relationship to or with the respondent corporation.

In June, 1922, the North American Company applied to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to sell its preferred stock. This permit was granted. On August 31, 1929, Joe Zastrow filed with the state corporation department an application for a certificate to represent North American Company. This application may be summarized as follows: Zastrow makes application for certificate authorizing him to represent North American Bond & Mortgage Company. He supplies the routine data usual in such applications by reference to the commissioner's files. He set forth that the terms and conditions of his employment, with particular reference to the commission he will receive, is "8%." This application is verified, and as a part thereof is the following:

"To the Commissioner of Corporations:

"North American Bond and Mortgage Company (Employer) hereby certifies that the statement made by J. Zastrow, applicant, in the foregoing application of the items of his employment is true and correct, and requests that said application be granted.

"Dated Sept. 10, 1929.

"North American Bond & Mortgage Co.

Employer

"Signed by M. E. McKittrick
Asst. Sec'y.

"[Corporate Seal] Title of Officer

"6331 Hollywood Boulevard—Hollywood, Cal.

Address of Employer"

That portion of the application bearing the request of the North American Company was attested by and with the corporate seal. M. E. McKittrick was the assistant secretary of the corporation. Much argument is presented on the question of this instrument and its binding effect, if any, upon the North American Company. The evidence, beyond contradiction, shows that one Beesemyer was the secretary and general manager of North American. The name Beesemyer will frequently appear herein, and it may be noted that the full name is Gilbert H. Beesemyer. As general manager, Beesemyer had full charge of everything. As secretary, under the by-laws he was the custodian of the corporate seal, and as manager he was to superintend and have control of the management of the affairs of the corporation subject to the direction and supervision of the directors. McKittrick, the assistant secretary, had charge of everything in North American Company, under Beesemyer. According to her testimony, she signed the application of Zastrow and placed the corporate seal thereon as an incident of her usual routine. Referring to the incident, she says: "It was probably brought down to me by someone, and I was asked to sign it, and as I had been signing similar papers on their request I probably did. As I remember I was told to sign it, that it was according to Mr. Beesemyer's instructions. I affixed the seal as part of the duties of secretary or assistant secretary. The seal was a part of the signature." She further testified that "where I signed for North American I thought it was all right to put the seal on, too, if it was all right to sign." This evidence also remains uncontradicted. It leaves no question but that the signing of the Zastrow application was authentic and genuine, so far at least as the corporation commissioner was concerned.

On September 20, 1929, a certificate of authority was issued to J. Zastrow to act as agent of North American Bond & Mortgage Company "in the sale of its securities within the State of California in accordance with the permit issued to it on the twelfth day of June, 1922, and any amendment thereof or supplement thereto hereafter made." It will be observed that the application and the permit tie in with the securities of North American Company, inasmuch as the permit specifically limits the agency to the securities theretofore by the corporation commissioner permitted sale. There is in the entire record not a single word of explanation on the connection of North American with the designation of Zastrow as agent. It is not denied that North American presented the application for his appointment, nor is it denied that the act of the assistant secretary, authenticated with the seal of the corporation, was an authorized act within the scope of her duties under the direction of the general manager.

[1-3] The Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended) makes a clear distinction between agents and brokers. An agent, under the act, is one employed or appointed by a company or broker to sell securities, while a broker is one engaged in the general business of buying and selling securities. The agent must have a principal, and the very nature of his calling is one of employment. When a corporation employing an agent certifies the fact of such employment to the corporation commissioner, requesting a permit for the agent to act for the corporation in the sale of its securities, it is certainly some evidence of agency. The entire scheme of the Corporate Securities Act would be thwarted and rendered ineffective if this were not the case. Being of public record, the proceedings give notice of the agency to the world at large and estop the corporation from denying the agency thus created. However, we agree with respondent's contention that the designation of an agent under the Corporate Securities Act does not automatically install the agent as the representative of the corporation for all purposes, or even for the sale of securities, until some further steps are taken. In other words, the corporation may designate one as agent and not give him any securities to sell. By the mere designation he would have no power to go out and contract for the sale of the corporation's securities. There must be an authorization and contract of employment. But with the designation of agency the assent of the corporation to a sale of its securities by the agent will be presumed where it is shown the sale was with the knowledge of the corporation or under conditions which imply such knowledge.

[4] So much, then, for Zastrow. Let us now consider his conduct in connection with the sale to Mrs. McClain. Zastrow, through the found fraud and misrepresentations, induced Mrs. McClain to purchase on the first occasion fifty shares of first preferred stock of North American at the price of $100 per share. He had with him at the time a "buy" order blank on which was printed the name of the corporation, and did represent to Mrs. McClain that she was dealing direct with the corporation. Accordingly the check for $5,000 was made payable directly to North American Bond & Mortgage Company. Within a few days the stock certificate showing ownership of fifty shares in Mrs. McClain was delivered to her. The check payable to the corporation was entered upon the books of the company, and was by it indorsed and cleared, and the canceled check returned to Mrs. McClain showed the indorsement and payment. On the second occasion of purchase by Mrs. McClain she secured one hundred and seventy shares of first preferred stock of North American at the price of $100 per share. This transaction was somewhat involved, inasmuch as it was necessary for her to dispose of other securities in order to obtain the cash with which to procure more North American stock. She had $16,900 tied up in an investment handled through a building and loan association. At Zastrow's persuasion she made out an order on such association to pay to North American Company the sum of $16,900. Pursuant to the order the building and loan company executed and delivered to Zastrow its check for $16,900, payable to North American Bond & Mortgage Company. This check was received by the North American Company, indorsed and paid, and the amount deposited to the credit of that concern. In addition, Mrs. McClain paid $100 cash, making the total $17,000. This is the story of how Olivia McClain got her stock. The mere narrative convinces us that the stock was sold to her by North American Company, and that the company not only authorized Zastrow to act as its agent in the sale thereof but actually participated therein and received the proceeds thereof. Digressing for the moment on the question of the fraud, we may note that there is no controversy on the issue, but, to bring the fraud home to North American Company, without the aid of implication, the undisputed fact is that that company, through the medium of the press and by means of paid advertisements, broadcast the same representations found to be false, and at the same time Zastrow was procuring purchasers. The foregoing sufficiently disposes of this branch of the McClain case, leaving for further discussion hereinafter other phases of the appeal equally important to her cause of action.

We may pass then to the Damerel actions. Mrs. Damerel purchased through Zastrow thirty shares of stock in North American Company, giving to Zastrow her check for $3,000 payable to North American. This check was indorsed, cashed, and deposited to the credit of the company. This transaction took place on April 24, 1930. Here we may note again the status of Zastrow with relation to North American Company. As we have already noted, Zastrow had secured the authorization as agent for North American in 1929. This expired December 31, 1929. On January 13, 1930, a renewal application was filed by Zastrow with the corporation commissioner. The former application was by reference expressly made a part of the renewal application. Zastrow again applied for authorization to act as agent for North American Bond & Mortgage Company. As a part of the application was the following:

"J. M. Friedlander—Commissioner of Corporations

"J. Zastrow hereby requests that the foregoing application be granted.

"Dated January 13, 1930.

"North American Bond & Mortgage Co.

(Name of Company)

"By Gilbert H. Beesmyer [Signed]

"6331 Hollywood Boulevard, Hollywood."

Without analysis the same appears with reference to the corporation's participation in the application as in the original proceeding. The phrase "J. Zastrow requests" is meaningless, inasmuch as the corporation, under its seal and with the signature of its manager, signed the application, thereby adopting the statements therein contained. On January 20, 1930, the permit was issued by the corporation commissioner authorizing J. Zastrow to act as the agent of North American Bond & Mortgage Company in the sale of its securities, in accordance with the permit issued the corporation on June 12, 1922. We note again the specific tie-in with the securities of North American. It is beyond reason to even think that this application, as well as the former, was not on the express request and with the full knowledge of the corporation, and likewise the permits issued on the applications. It is interesting to note the comment of the trial judge, as follows: "I haven't any doubt after examining that paper that the application was as much that of the North American Bond & Mortgage Company as it is of Zastrow."

[5] And thus we find Zastrow on the dates in question, namely, during April of 1930, again presented to an investing public as the duly chosen and authorized agent of North American. The same found fraudulent representations were made and the same findings of fraud and reliance are made as to Zastrow's dealings with Mrs. Damerel as were found in the McClain case. Likewise there were exactly the same fraudulent and false statements broadcast by the North American Company during the period of the Damerel transactions. After the sale of April 24, 1930, wherein and whereby North American received the $3,000 by check, Zastrow again sought out Mrs. Damerel, on or about April 25, 1930, and finding her without further ready means he prevailed upon her to dispose of other securities she then held. Mrs. Damerel was the owner of a trust deed securing an obligation in the amount of $4,500, wherein the obligors were named Wilson, and this has been referred to as the Wilson-Damerel note. Zastrow assured Mrs. Damerel that the North American Company would buy the note and that she could then invest the proceeds in North American. Accordingly she turned the note and trust deed over to Zastrow, and in a few days he returned, assuring her that the North American Company had made investigation and found the note and security sound. Thereupon Zastrow gave to Mrs. Damerel the check of North American for $4,200, being the then present value thereof after discount to equate interest. This check she immediately indorsed over to North American, and, adding a $300 check payable to that concern, she made a purchase of forty-five shares of North American at the price of $100 per share. On April 24, 1930, Mrs. Damerel received a letter on the stationery of the North American Bond & Mortgage Company, which letter is as follows, omitting address:

"Dear Mrs. Damerel: We wish to confirm your purchase of thirty shares of North American Bond & Mortgage Company and to thank you for your commitment. The certificate will be delivered by our Mr. Zastrow at an early date.

"Very truly yours,

"D. Tackaberry,

"Manager Securities Department."

On April 28, 1930, after the purchase of the forty-five shares, Mrs. Damerel received an acknowledgment in practically the same form, omitting only any reference to Zastrow.

Beesemyer, upon his examination as a witness, testified that he did not recall whether he as manager of North American or the officers and directors of that company knew that Tackaberry was holding himself out as manager of the securities department of North American; that he had many talks with Tackaberry, but did not remember whether he saw any of the letters mailed out by Tackaberry to purchasers on the form noted. He stated that he may have seen such letters, but paid no attention to them. His answer, verbatim, was: "No, I don't recall. At the same time I would have had no objection to it particularly. It helped him with his business, and I was always anxious to have anybody make money." Tackaberry was a stockbroker with offices in the same building as Beesemyer. The latter's testimony regarding Tackaberry is as follows: "Mr. Tackaberry sold many stocks that the North American Bond & Mortgage Company wished to sell; other securities he didn't handle as a general rule, and being in a general stock selling business he more or less took it upon himself to consider himself as manager of securities for us, but he wasn't. Emphatically he was not an employee drawing a salary of the company." However, holding himself out as manager of securities, with full knowledge and acquiescence of the North American, would suffice, in view of the lack of knowledge on the part of those relying upon the appearances.

[6] The foregoing presents the first question on the appeal; namely, the status of Zastrow in his dealings with appellants. The trial court found that at no time was Joe Zastrow the agent of North American to sell any stock to either plaintiff, and that said Zastrow did not act within the course and scope of his authority as a stock salesman of and for North American in any of the transactions with either plaintiff. The evidence does not support nor justify such a finding. The facts are undisputed, and in passing we may note that neither side called Zastrow as a witness. The explanation of defendant was that Zastrow had been contacted and that he warned defendant that if he were called he would "fix" the defendant. He was not called. Zastrow was definitely designated to the commissioner of corporations as the agent of respondent, and he entered directly upon the work specified in the creation of the agency. By indorsements of the various checks, by acknowledgment of subscriptions, by retention of the proceeds of sale, the respondent company unequivocally held out Zastrow, not only to appellants but to the world at large, as its representative. The purpose of the Corporate Securities Act and of all similar legislation is primarily to give to the public assurance of the integrity and authority of those agents or brokers licensed thereunder. And such purpose would be aborted and rendered of no avail if the solemn assertions of those seeking permission to operate under the statute were held meaningless. The evidence herein permits of but one conclusion, namely, that Zastrow, when he dealt with the appellants herein, dealt with them and each of them as the authorized agent of respondent corporation, and that the latter is estopped to deny his authority.

[7-9] We come now to the real defense of the corporation, and here too it may be noted that the main facts are in little dispute and may be narrated as illustrative of the conditions existing in so far as the internal affairs of the company may be concerned. North American, during the years 1929 and 1930, had no treasury stock for sale. No resolution or other act of its board of directors authorized the offering to the public of any of the company's treasury stock, preferred or common. Beesemyer was the manager of the corporation, and in direct and full control of the books, records, and finances thereof. The directors met every week, but seemed to know very little of the business that was transacted. The corporation, as far as its actual management went, was just another designation for Beesemyer. There were a number of employees, classed as secretaries, assistant secretaries, clerks, transfer agents, etc. Each of these worked under the supervision of Beesemyer and under his orders. It seems that Beesemyer personally owned considerable stock in the corporation. The fact is that the stock that was sold to the appellants herein was the personally owned stock of Beesemyer. The modus operandi was to send out an agent ostensibly representing the corporation, backed up by an advance advertising campaign, and have him contact prospects to whom he would unfold the story of opportunity knocking and ready and sure profits. The agent would procure a purchaser who believed he or she was dealing with the corporation. The money received would go directly to the corporation and into its funds. Then Beesemyer would dig out a certificate of his own holdings and cause to be made a transfer thereof in the amount required. Then the corporation would, under the heading in its books "Exchange," pay out the money it had received to Beesemyer. Every step in the proceeding was done by the employees of the corporation in their respective positions as employees of the company and under the specific direction of its manager. There is no evidence to support even an inference that the acts of the corporation agents and secretaries were other than routine. No suggestion of fraud or dishonesty attaches to any of these employees. In other words, each and every act done by any of them was done as part of the routine work of the corporation and under the direction of the managing agent, whose directions they were in duty bound to follow without question. And on the face of these instructions they were not warranted in assuming any irregularity. We dwell thus on this phase of the case merely to emphasize the extent to which the corporation lent itself to the accomplishment of whatever Beesemyer planned.

The Wilson-Damerel trust deed and note were purchased directly by North American Company and its check paid for the same. The method of transfer was directed, not by Beesemyer but by another official of the corporation. When purchasers of stock delivered their check to North American, and the latter acknowledged receipt thereof by indorsement and the funds derived therefrom went into the account of the corporation, the transaction was identical with one wherein the purchaser delivered at the receiving window of the corporation the money in cash. The corporation got the money, and whatever it may have done with it thereafter is a matter that does not affect the rights or equities of the appellants herein. The stock transfer books of the corporation were under the exclusive control of Beesemyer, and according to the testimony the entries in the stock book were mere matters of "automatic procedure." In fact, everything was on corporation routine and schedule, attested as to genuineness by corporate seal and entry up to the time of distribution of the spoils. The procedure parallels that of an employee taking the cash out of the till, and it seems certain that no defense would exist in favor of a merchant against his creditors from the fact that his cashier decamped with the assets.

To review all of the authorities on corporate liability, ultra vires, fraud, and ratification would be a gigantic task and one yielding naught but academic conclusions. It seems a model case for the application of the recognized rule that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer. This rule is discussed in Lynch v. International Banking Corp., 63 Cal. App. 432, 229 P. 968, where many authorities in support thereof are cited. See, also, Schumann-Heink & Co. v. U. S. National Bank, 108 Cal. App. 223, 291 P. 684, 292 P. 547; Green v. Caribou Oil Mining Co., 179 Cal. 790, 178 P. 950; MacDonald v. Reich & Lievre, Inc., 100 Cal. App. 736, 281 P. 106. Respondent repeatedly asserts that in an action for money had and received it must definitely appear that defendant has been "unjustly enriched." This does not mean that the evidence must show that such riches have been retained by the defendant up to the time of trial. The evidence here shows that North American received the money and disbursed it at the instance of its manager. It is practically the same as though North American had sold the stock and then gone in the open market and purchased enough to meet the order. Let us suppose that, instead of Beesemyer transferring his own stock to plaintiffs, he, as manager and secretary, had taken from the funds of the company money sufficient to procure the necessary number of shares and then had completed the sale to plaintiffs. It could not be successfully claimed that the corporation had not received anything from plaintiffs, for the reason that, in order to consummate the fraud, it was necessary to secure the stock elsewhere and thus partially use the funds obtained. The corporation was enriched and its funds increased. How these funds were distributed does not affect plaintiffs' cause of action.

[10] Summing up, we find a fraudulent transaction carried on by and through a corporation in the accomplishment of which every corporate agency was involved, from the manager down to the office boy. And because, when the fraud was done and completed, one was somewhat faster and secured the profits, the corporation disclaims any liability. The entire transaction is slightly hazy. One might easily infer that, if at any stage of the proceedings up to the kill a question had been raised as to the genuineness or fairness of the transaction, or if the honesty and integrity of the management had been assailed, a chorus of indignant protest would have arisen within the sacrosanct confines of this fortress of fraud. The idea of incorporation has worked out as a convenient aid to modern business, and the efficacy and usefulness of this form of business entity cannot be questioned. But withal corporations are creatures of the law and exist only at the pleasure of the law. Whenever the corporate entity is urged as a shield for wrongdoing the courts have not been backward in beating down the defense in an endeavor to preserve the equality of simple justice. The instant case depicts a sidelight on the old, old story of human greed and lust for power and pelf. If the law is powerless to interfere merely, forsooth, because one party has clothed itself in habiliments of modest corporate pattern, supplied by the very authority it seeks to destroy, then indeed has the time arrived when the law has devoured itself and in sickened surfeit yields up its existence.

[11, 12] The claim is urged that the Wilson-Damerel note and trust agreement came into the hands of the North American Company as a negotiable instrument before maturity, and was by it purchased in good faith and for value from Beesemyer, and that the corporation is a holder of said note free from all claims of plaintiff Damerel. The note was purchased by the corporation itself, direct from Mrs. Damerel, and was obtained through fraudulent representations. As a matter of fact, the transaction on the note was what is commonly termed a "wash" transaction. The mechanics of purchase and sale were employed, but in fact and reality it was merely a transfer of the note for the stock sold. And, further, respondent's strenuous contention on this score almost demonstrates the weakness of all of its claims, because here it not only admits but urges the knowledge of the corporation and the regularity of the acts of its agents and employees. The transaction of purchase of the note was between the corporation and Mrs. Damerel. The purchase price was paid by a check of the corporation and the check indorsed back directly to the corporation in return for stock. On this transfer the title passed from Mrs. Damerel direct to the company. The claim of the corporation that the manager, Beesemyer intercepted the note in transit and made himself the purchaser and then resold it to the corporation presents a situation where corporate knowledge must be presumed. In other words, the corporation cannot urge the fraud of its own agent as against Mrs. Damerel to establish the good faith of the transaction. Mrs. Damerel exchanged the Wilson note for the stock of the corporation and dealt directly with the corporation. If in the internal management of the company its manager or secretary embezzled the amount paid, that is no concern of Mrs. Damerel; nor is it a defense to the claim of fraud in the procurement of the Wilson note.

We are of the opinion that appellants, and each of them, have shown that the corporation received the money and note, and, dependent upon the solution of other questions hereinafter presented, are entitled to recover in the present action.

[13] The final points presented regard the sufficiency and promptness of the rescission. Here again we take up the case of each plaintiff separately, for the reason that the facts differ in each, and there is not the slightest privity or jointure between the plaintiffs. We will take first the case of Olivia McClain. The finding of the trial court is as follows: "That it is not true that on or about the 27th day of February, 1931, Olivia McClain discovered for the first time the falsity and untruth of the representations set forth in plaintiff's complaint and it is not true that prior to said date said plaintiff had no knowledge whatsoever concerning the falsity of said representations; that in truth and in fact plaintiff knew, or could have known by the inspection of the financial statements of North American Bond and Mortgage Company at its office and on file in the office of the corporation commissioner of the state of California, of the falsity of said statements immediately after the purchase of her said stock at the times referred to in plaintiff's complaint. That plaintiff Olivia McClain on and after December 12th, 1930, learned of the financial condition and affairs of said defendant North American Bond and Mortgage Company and ascertained that said company had many unsecured loans and many financial losses on account thereof and owned stock in various companies, and notwithstanding said knowledge plaintiff Olivia McClain on January 20th, 1930, attended a stockholders' meeting of the defendant North American Bond and Mortgage Company and voted the shares of stock referred to in the complaint of said Olivia McClain at said stockholders' meeting." The court further found that Mrs. McClain became a stockholder on July 15, 1929, and that at all times since becoming such stockholder she exercised certain rights as such, and executed and delivered a proxy to Beesemyer to act for her in all of the affairs of the corporation; and that by the appointment of Beesemyer and his acting as her agent through the proxy she was and is charged with the knowledge of Beesemyer. The evidence in support of the first finding quoted in full may be reviewed.

It appears that in December of 1930 the collapse came and was a matter of grave public interest. Beesemyer was arrested and charged with certain criminal offenses. The whole affair was given wide publicity. On December 12 of that year Beesemyer made open confession of his delinquency. This confession was published in full in the daily press, and Mrs. McClain admits knowledge thereof. The confession was in evidence herein, and the portion thereof referring to North American Bond & Mortgage Company is as follows: "I further state that I falsified the records of the North American Bond and Mortgage Company and the Guaranty Holding Corporation and misappropriated large sums of money belonging to said institutions for my own personal use, and that such acts done by me in connection therewith were also done without the knowledge or consent of any of the directors or officers of either of these institutions." The fraud found consisted in false representations as to the assets of the North American and the nature of its securities and its dividend paying record. We fail to see where this confession could put any one on notice or convey any information on that subject. By the wildest stretch of the imagination one could not infer that there is anything particularly dishonest or corrupt in the victim of a theft. The fact that B holds up and robs A does not give rise to any suspicion that A was a thief.

[14, 15] The court in its findings holds that Olivia McClain could have learned the falsity of the representations by going to the office of the corporation commissioner and examining the records of that office. No such duty was placed upon her. McKeehan v. Pacific Finance Corp., 120 Cal. App. 578, 8 P. (2d) 213; Tatterson v. Kehrlein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 263 P. 285; Zwart v. Landfield, 93 Cal. App. 328, 269 P. 740; De Garmo v. Petitts

Confiserie, 93 Cal. App. 261, 269 P. 602; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515; MacDonald v. Reich & Lievre, Inc., supra. In French v. Freeman, supra, at page 587 of 191 Cal., 217 P. 515, 518, it is said, quoting from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence: "The mere existence of opportunities for examination, or of sources of information, is not sufficient, even though by means of these opportunities and sources, in the absence of any representation at all, a constructive notice to the party would be inferred; the doctrine of constructive notice does not apply where there has been such a representation of fact." The cited cases amplify this doctrine and affirm it. The finding as to the proxy given Beesemyer, having the effect of charging Mrs. McClain with all of the knowledge of Beesemyer, finds no support in law or in the facts here. The obtaining of the proxy was a part of the fraud perpetrated by and through the corporate agency. The proxy in any event simply authorized Beesemyer to vote the stock at any election of directors or at any other election held for any purpose, and to vote the stock at any meeting of the stockholders on any question voted on at such meeting. Beesemyer had no proxy to falsify or alter records, and the knowledge that he acquired through such methods was adverse to the stockholder and not imputed to her. 1 Cal. Jur. 852.

[16, 17] It appeared in evidence that shortly after December 12, 1930, the date of the Beesemyer confession, there was much activity amongst the unfortunate stockholders of North American. Mrs. McClain was much distressed, and telephoned to the corporation offices seeking information and advice both as to the condition of the company and her individual liability. She was always given encouraging reports. On January 20, 1931, there was a meeting of the stockholders, at which time and place there was a general discussion of the corporate affairs. Mrs. McClain attended the meeting. A partial audit was read and some discussion thereon had; it being expressly stated by the reporting auditor that the report was incomplete and subject to further investigation and report. The general information given was sufficient to raise a suspicion of the falsity of the representations made at the time Mrs. McClain purchased the stock. Mrs. McClain, being an elderly woman, testified that the whole proceeding was Greek to her, that there was much confusion and excitement at the meeting and that she heard nothing that was said. At the conclusion of the meeting, or at least during some part thereof, the stockholders present by ballot selected a committee to represent them. Mrs. McClain voted a ticket that was given her, voting her 270 shares of stock for seven directors. There is no evidence contradictory to that of Mrs. McClain on the question of her participation in the stockholders' meeting, and nothing negating her statement that she heard nothing that transpired. Shortly thereafter she did begin an investigation, and on February 27, 1931, served her notice of rescission upon the respondent company.

Conceding that Mrs. McClain was put upon inquiry on the 20th of January, the rescission on February 27th, hardly more than a month thereafter, should not of itself be held too late. It took from December 12, 1930, to January 20, 1931, for the experts to prepare a partial report for the stockholders, so it would seem rather fast for appellant to acquire full knowledge in practically the same time as it took the expert accountants. The fact that Mrs. McClain gave no notice of rescission to Zastrow or to Beesemyer is immaterial, in view of what has heretofore been stated.

[18-20] Coming now to the case of Mrs. Damerel on the question of promptness of rescission: Mrs. Damerel did not attend any stockholders' meeting; otherwise the same findings were made as to her knowledge and presumed knowledge. The same conclusion is reached by us and the same authorities applied. She, too, gave a proxy to Beesemyer. The finding of the court as to both appellants is that "in truth and in fact no rescission was effected." While this might properly be classed as a conclusion of law, it appears as a finding of fact following the findings of facts from which such conclusion was drawn. These facts are that plaintiffs did not tender back everything of value by them received by virtue of the purchase of the stock. The direct finding is that both plaintiffs, while holding the stock, received certain dividends which they did not tender back upon the attempted rescission.

There are two answers to this argument. Upon receipt of the notice of rescission respondent company made no objection to the tender, and distinctly repudiated and denied any liability. The attitude of the corporation was such as to indicate that, regardless of what was tendered, it would not recognize the rescissions. Section 2076, Code Civ. Proc. Quoting from De Garmo v. Petitts Confectionery, 93 Cal. App. 261, 269 P. 692, 697: "If appellant fails in the present action, he would be entitled to retain the $500 dividend; if he succeeds in this action, he will be entitled to retain the $500 as a partial restoration of the $20,000 and have judgment against defendant for the balance. In no event, therefore, could the defendant possibly be injured." The same doctrine is announced in Kales v. Houghton, 190 Cal. 294, 212 P. 21. It would have been a hazardous thing for these plaintiffs to turn back to the corporation some $3,000 in cash at a time when such pandemonium prevailed. The money, once in the corporate treasury, may or may not have been sufficiently marked to permit recovery. The probability was that immediately a thousand hands would have been reaching for it. The rules regarding promptness of rescission and restoration of benefits are of equitable cognizance and intended to promote justice rather than to impede it. Accordingly, where no injury follows a slight delay in discovery or in pursuing the means of discovery, little importance will attach thereto. We concede that the question of promptness is primarily one for the trial court, but there must be some substantial evidence supporting a finding that precludes recovery on this ground.

Other questions presented by appellants require no discussion.

The judgment is reversed.

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held not available to guest in automobile accident to establish gross negligence of host, in absence of direct proof (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141½, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

Harrison G. Sloane and Fred A. Steiner, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Hillyer & Boldman, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages arising from an automobile accident which occurred on July 13, 1931, while the plaintiff was riding as the guest of the defendant. At that time, section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580), required the plaintiff in such a case to establish intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence on the part of the defendant in order to recover, and the respondent contends that gross negligence was here established.

The appellant did not appear at the trial, and the only evidence as to how the accident occurred is found in the testimony of the respondent. He testified that they were riding along a paved highway on a clear dry day between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon; that "we were driving so fast that I know I was very uneasy"; that he told the appellant not to go so fast; that he had been in automobile wrecks before, and "most any speed" would make him feel uneasy; that, if a car was going above fifteen miles an hour, he would rather not be in it; that the appellant did not slow up as the result of his remonstrance; that he did not know how fast the appellant was driving at the time of the accident; that he was unable to estimate how fast the car was going; that he did not know how the accident happened; that just prior to the accident he saw no other cars and heard no impact; and that as they were riding along he felt a sudden shock, became unconscious, and when he regained consciousness he was in a hospital. He also testified that on the next day the appellant told him "that the car left the road and turned over, and told me how badly the car was damaged."

The complaint alleges that the defendant drove and operated his automobile "at a speed in excess of fifty-five miles per hour, and so recklessly, carelessly and negligently that said automobile left the highway and turned over approximately three times," and that, as a consequence, the plaintiff sustained certain injuries. The court found that on the occasion in question, while the plaintiff was riding as a guest of the defendant, the defendant drove and operated his automobile "at a fast rate of speed so recklessly, carelessly and negligently that said automobile left the highway and turned over."

The direct evidence here presented was not sufficient to show negligence in the matter of speed (Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 P. 38; Rosander v. Market Street Railway Co., 89 Cal. App. 710, 265 P. 536), and there is no direct evidence of any other negligence. The respondent apparently concedes this, and thus states his position:

"However, under our theory of the case, we believe that the speed of the car at the time of the accident has little or no bearing on the case. The fact that the appellant was driving the car at the time of the accident is the matter of importance.

"It is our contention that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies to all cases of negligence where an automobile is shown to be under the management of the defendant and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if the defendant used proper care."

Without considering the questions presented as to the sufficiency of the complaint and the findings for a case involving gross negligence, or whether a sufficient foundation was laid with respect to the general circumstances to make the doctrine applicable, we proceed at once to what the respondent states to be the only real point to be decided, namely, Is the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur available to a plaintiff, in the absence of any direct proof, for the purpose of establishing gross negligence? In other words while this doctrine may be invoked to make out a prima facie case of negligence, is it sufficient in itself to make out a prima facie case of gross negligence, where such a showing is required?

The doctrine referred to has always been applied in cases where the circumstances are such as, unexplained, afford reasonable evidence of want of care on the part of a defendant, and, where applicable, it creates a presumption sufficient to make out a prima facie case of negligence. Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 265 P. 238, 59 A. L. R. 480. So far as we are informed, the doctrine has always been applied for the purpose of proving that some negligence existed and never with respect to the amount or degree of such negligence. The respondent argues that, since the doctrine has been applied in cases involving carriers of persons both for reward and without reward, and since a higher degree of care is required in the one case than in the other, the doctrine applies to all degrees of negligence, and may therefore be invoked to make out a prima facie case for a plaintiff regardless of what form of negligence he is required to prove. Citing Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877. While this doctrine has been held to apply regardless of the degree of care required in a particular case, it has only been so applied in order to make out a prima facie case that ordinary care had not been exercised or slight negligence had been established; in other words, to show that negligence existed. It is quite different to relate the doctrine not to the degree of care required before ordinary negligence begins, but to the degree of negligence that exists, or as to how far the defendant has gone beyond the line of the care required of him.

If the respondent's contention that this doctrine may be invoked to make out a prima facie case of whatever degree of negligence the plaintiff is required to establish be correct, the 1929 amendment to the statute above referred to, forbidding recovery for ordinary negligence and requiring proof of exceptional negligence in guest cases, would be of no effect whatever in many cases where slight negligence, at the most, existed, since a plaintiff by the very paucity of his proof and by reliance on this doctrine could circumvent the statute and recover upon a showing no greater in quantity or in effectiveness than would have been necessary before the amendment was adopted. We think that this result cannot and does not obtain, and that the amendment in question placed a burden upon a plaintiff to establish a certain degree or extent of negligence which cannot be met by a mere inference or presumption that some negligence existed.

In our opinion, the use of this doctrine for such a purpose as here urged would be inconsistent with the doctrine itself. It applies only where the plaintiff does not know what caused the accident and negligence may be presumed from the fact that an accident occurred, in view of the general circumstances. But, where a plaintiff is required to prove not only negligence, but gross negligence, this very requirement would seem to imply the necessity of proving how the accident occurred and that certain facts exist which in themselves disclose the presence of gross negligence as distinguished from ordinary negligence.

For the reasons given, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

WINFIELD v. UNITED FRUIT CO.
No. 338.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, California.
July 7, 1933.

1. Seamen ⇨29(5).

Injured seaman can sue under Jones Act in state court where valid service of summons can be effected (Merchant Marine Act 1920, § 33 [46 USCA § 688]).

2. Commerce ⇨81.

That business of corporation is exclusively interstate and foreign does not render corporation immune from ordinary process of state courts.

3. Seamen ⇨29(5).

Seaman hired in San Francisco and injured on high seas could sue employer, foreign corporation, doing interstate business, in municipal court of San Francisco, by serving summons on manager in San Francisco, where corporation docked ships and maintained offices (Merchant Marine Act 1920, § 33 [46 USCA § 688]).

Facts disclosed that some 20 employees were engaged by foreign corporation in San Francisco, that employees' contract initiated in San Francisco and was to terminate there, and that corporation had at least one bank account in San Francisco, and maintained two offices there.

Appeal from Municipal Court, City and County of San Francisco; Alden Ames, Judge.

Action by Evan H. Winfield against the United Fruit Company. From an order granting defendant's motion to quash service of summons, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

B. E. Kragen and Derby, Sharp, Quinby & Tweedt, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

GOODELL, Judge.

Defendant, a New Jersey corporation, operates a fleet of three, and sometimes more, steamships between the port of San Francisco and certain ports in Central and South America. The vessels touch at Los Angeles on their north-bound trips. Appellant was hired by respondent at San Francisco as a storekeeper aboard the S. S. Chiriqui for her voyage from San Francisco to Port Armuelles, Panama, and return to San Francisco. While at sea off the Central American coast, plaintiff suffered an injury for which he brought this action in the municipal court, under the so-called Jones Act, being section 33 of the United States Merchant Marine Act of 1920 (46 USCA § 688), claiming $2,000 damages. Summons was served in San Francisco upon defendant's manager, and defendant appeared specially and moved to quash the service upon the ground that it was a New Jersey corporation, that the cause of action sued upon did not arise in California or relate to business or transactions within this state, and that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the person of the defendant. The motion was heard upon affidavits and oral testimony touching the operations and business of defendant in California, and was granted. Defendant has never done any of the things required by law to qualify it to transact business within this state.

The base of defendant's Pacific Coast operations is San Francisco, where it maintains a force of about twenty employees. In addition to the manager, there are a general freight and passenger agent who attends to soliciting freight and passenger business for the ships, an accountant who attends to money matters and accounts, and a purchasing agent, all under the direction of the manager. There are two offices in San Francisco; one is in the business district and the other is at the terminal on Third street. At this terminal freight is received and stored; there the gear and equipment for the loading and discharging of the ships are kept, and the men are hired for the ships. At San Francisco the vessels are provisioned and supplied, and at San Francisco bills of lading are issued for shipments to the foreign ports at which the steamers call. Bananas in large quantities are brought to San Francisco and Los Angeles from foreign ports and are marketed and sold in California by Fruit Dispatch Company, a corporate affiliation of the defendant, managed by its San Francisco manager.

Defendant maintains at least one commercial bank account in San Francisco, wherein the proceeds of the sale of bananas and other merchandise are deposited. Out of this account the seamen are paid in cash, and the account is subject to checks drawn by defendant's accountant at San Francisco under the direction of its manager. Claims for damaged cargo are adjusted at the San Francisco office, and money collected for prepaid freight on outgoing shipments is deposited in the local bank account, as are also the proceeds of passenger tickets. Advertisements are carried by defendant in shipping journals published in San Francisco. The manager reports on other than routine matters to the company's New York office; but the San Francisco office is called by the defendant its division office.

[1] Appellant's right under the Jones Act to sue in a state court where valid service of summons can be effected was settled in 1932 by the decision in Bainbridge v. Merchants', etc., Co., 287 U. S. 278, 53 S. Ct. 159, 77 L. Ed. 392, 1933 A. M. C. 32, and the trial judge so held, in reliance on Mitchell v. Pacific Steamship Co., decided by this department in 1930.

The question of a valid service of summons, however, is the real problem presented by this appeal.

We are satisfied from the facts of record, summarized above, that defendant at the time summons was served was doing business within this state; that the person upon whom service was made was its manager, within the meaning of section 411, Code of Civil Procedure [Milbank v. Standard Motor Construction Co. (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 271 and cases cited]; that consequently—passing for the moment the question of interstate commerce—there was a valid service. The record surely shows that defendant ever since 1927 has been transacting “within the state some substantial part of its ordinary business by its officers or agents appointed and selected for that purpose.” Davenport v. Superior Court, 183 Cal. 506, 508, 191 P. 911. Defendant earnestly contends, however, that this business is purely interstate and foreign in character, and not at all intrastate, and that to compel it to litigate in a state court is to unduly burden interstate commerce. It is further contended that a foreign corporation, even if it is present in a state (because doing an interstate and foreign business therein), may not, unless it has consented, be sued on transitory causes of action arising elsewhere, but which are unconnected with any corporate action by it within the jurisdiction. In support of this contention, defendant relies upon a long line of cases starting with Old Wayne Mutual Life Ass'n v. McDonough, 204 U. S. 8, 27 S. Ct. 236, 51 L. Ed. 345, decided in 1906, and coming down to Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Chatters (Southern Railway Co. v. Chatters) 279 U. S. 320, 49 S. Ct. 329, 73 L. Ed. 711, decided in 1929. The Old Wayne Case holds that the statutory consent of a foreign corporation to be sued does not extend to causes of action arising in other states. This principle was applied in Simon v. Southern Railway Co., 236 U. S. 115, 35 S. Ct. 253, 261, 59 L. Ed. 492, strongly relied upon by defendant, holding that service under a Louisiana statute was not “effective to give the district court of [New] Orleans jurisdiction over defendant as to a cause of action arising in the state of Alabama.” The reason for the rule is thus given by Mr. Justice Lamar at page 130 of 236 U. S., 35 S. Ct. 255, 260: “Otherwise, claims on contracts, wherever made, and suits for torts, wherever committed, might, by virtue of such compulsory statute, be drawn to the jurisdiction of any state in which the foreign corporation might at any time be carrying on business.” One of the leading cases on the question of the burdening of interstate commerce by actions in state courts is Davis, Director General, etc., v. Farmers' Co-operative Equity Co., 232 U. S. 312, 43 S. Ct. 556, 557, 67 L. Ed. 996. There the Santa Fé Road, a Kansas corporation, was sued in Minnesota, where it had no railroad, by another Kansas corporation, for a grain loss in an intrastate shipment in Kansas. Process was served upon a soliciting agent of the Santa Fé Road in Minnesota under a statute of that state providing that any corporation, having an agent within the state soliciting freight or passenger traffic, could be so served. The court, in holding that the action unduly burdened interstate commerce, said: “So far as appears the transaction was in no way connected with Minnesota or with the soliciting agency located there.”

In Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. Co. v. Wells, 265 U. S. 101, 44 S. Ct. 469, 68 L. Ed. 928, Wells, a citizen of Colorado, employed by the plaintiff, was injured in New Mexico, and he sued in Texas, where the plaintiff had neither trackage nor an agent. It was held on the authority of the Davis Case that the suit in Texas unduly burdened interstate commerce. In Michigan Central R. Co. v. Mix, 278 U. S. 492, 49 S. Ct. 207, 73 L. Ed. 470, Doyle, a resident of Michigan, was killed in that state. His widow moved to Missouri, where she sued. The railroad company was a Michigan corporation, had no line in Missouri, had never consented to be sued there, and had never been admitted to do business there. The court held that the company was not amenable to Missouri process. In Fry v. Denver & Rio Grande R. Co. (D. C., N. D. Cal.) 226 F. 893, the action was commenced in the state court against the defendant railroad, a Colorado corporation, for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, a passenger, in Colorado. After removal for diversity of citizenship, a demurrer challenging the jurisdiction was sustained by Judge Van Fleet upon the authority of the Old Wayne and Simon Cases. The reasons for his decision were substantially the same as those found in the railroad cases just discussed, although his decision antedated the Davis Case by some years. Weinard v. Chicago, M. & St. Paul R. Co. (D. C.) 298 F. 977, is simply an extension of the rule of the Davis Case, and differs from it only in the fact that the defendant had part of its railroad in the state of the forum. The action was brought in the federal court in Minnesota by a resident of the state of Washington against the railroad company, a Wisconsin corporation, for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff at Tacoma, Wash. The trackage in Minnesota, the court held, made no difference in principle; the action nevertheless burdened interstate commerce, and service of summons was quashed.

Panstwowe Zaklady Gravitazne v. Automobile Ins. Co. of Hartford and Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. (D. C.) 36 F.(2d) 504, 506, was commenced in the state court and thence removed. It was an action against a railroad company engaged in interstate commerce for loss on the high seas of merchandise shipped under an Illinois bill of lading to Baltimore, and thence transshipped to a European port. "So far as appears," says the court, "the transaction was in no way connected with this state [New York], or with any agency of the defendant located here." A motion to dismiss, as against the railroad company, for lack of jurisdiction was granted on the ground of the burden upon interstate commerce and on the authority of the Old Wayne, Simon, and Davis Cases and Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wells. In addition to the cases just discussed, the defendant relies upon Mitchell Furniture Co. v. Selden Breck Construction Co., 257 U. S. 213, 42 S. Ct. 84, 66 L. Ed. 201, a suit brought in Ohio by an Ohio corporation against a Missouri corporation upon a contract made in Illinois to be performed in Michigan. The basis for the decision was that the defendant was not doing business in Ohio, and the contract sued on was neither made, nor was it to be performed, there.

has been denied, the cause of action not only arose outside the state, but it was not shown to have arisen out of any business conducted by the corporation within it or to have had any relation to any corporate act there." Chatters Case, 279 U. S. 320, 328, 49 S. Ct. 329, 331, 73 L. Ed. 711. In the instant case we assume for the purpose of the decision that defendant's business in California is exclusively interstate and foreign in character. That fact, however, does not render the corporation immune from the ordinary process of the courts of a state. International Harvester Company v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 234 U. S. 579, 34 S. Ct. 944, 58 L. Ed. 1479. In that case the state of Kentucky had instituted a criminal proceeding in its own courts against the Harvester Company for a violation of a Kentucky anti-trust law. The precise question in the case was whether or not the state court had jurisdiction, and it was held that it had. The facts were that the company had agents within the state, soliciting orders which were sent to another state, in response to which the machines of the Harvester Company were delivered in Kentucky. There was a continuous course of shipment of machines into Kentucky. Authority was vested in the agents within the state to receive payment in money or by check or draft and to take notes payable at banks in Kentucky. The course and method of dealing were shown by circulars issued by the company to its agents disclosing a clear intent and a studied plan to keep the business strictly interstate in character. The circulars opened with the order: "The company's transactions hereafter with the people of Kentucky must be on a strictly interstate commerce basis." Id., 234 U. S. 584, 585, 34 S. Ct. 944, 945, 58 L. Ed. 1479. "This course of conduct of authorized agents within the state," says Mr. Justice Day at page 586 of 234 U. S., 34 S. Ct. 944, 946, "in our judgment constituted a doing of business there in such wise that the Harvester Company might be fairly said to have been there, doing business, and amenable to the process of the courts of the state."

In the Davis Case, Mr. Justice Brandeis (at page 315 of 262 U. S., 43 S. Ct. 556, 557) amplifies the reasons underlying the interstate commerce rule as given by Mr. Justice Lamar, as follows: "That the claims against interstate carriers for personal injuries and for loss and damage of freight are numerous; that the amounts demanded are large; that in many cases carriers deem it imperative, or advisable, to leave the determination of their liability to the courts; that litigation in states and jurisdictions remote from that in which the cause of action arose entails absence of employees from their customary occupations; and that this impairs efficiency in operation, and causes, directly and indirectly, heavy expense to the carriers—these are matters of common knowledge." It is obvious that the maintenance and trial of this case in the court in which it was commenced will impose none of these burdens. San Francisco is the port at which the Chiriqui is provisioned, supplied, and manned; and, if a view or inspection of her equipment is needed, or if the testimony of her officers or crew is required, no more convenient or available place can be found than San Francisco. On the other hand, a trial of this case in New Jersey would lead to the consequences, and impose the burdens, spoken of by the justices in the quotations given above.

In the Davis Case, as has been noted, "the transaction was in no way connected with Minnesota or with the soliciting agency located there," but the author of the opinion was careful to remark, "It may be that a statute like that here assailed would be valid, although applied to suits in which the cause of action arose elsewhere, if the transaction out of which it arose had been entered upon within the state" (footnote citation to the International Harvester Company Case and to "Jurisdiction over non-residents doing business within a State" by Austin W. Scott, 32 Harvard Law Review, 871, 887), and further: "These questions are not before us, and we express no opinion upon them." The questions thus left open—and, to some extent, anticipated—in the Davis Case, were squarely presented in the Chatters Case, 279 U. S. 320, 49 S. Ct. 329, 330, 73 L. Ed. 711, where the plaintiff, Chatters, a citizen of Louisiana, bought a through ticket at the office of the Louisville & Nashville Company in New Orleans for a journey to Washington, D. C., on which trip he was injured in Virginia. The Louisville & Nashville Company was a Kentucky corporation, the Southern Railway, a Virginia corporation. The action was brought in the federal court in Louisiana, process was served upon the Southern's designated agent in Louisiana (as in the Simon Case), and the Southern Company appeared specially and excepted to the jurisdiction upon the ground that the cause of action, which was transitory, arose outside Louisiana, and not out of any business done by the Southern within Louisiana. The ticket was in three parts: (1) Over the Louisville & Nashville Road from New Orleans to Montgomery, Ala.; (2) over the Atlanta & West Point Road from Montgomery to Atlanta, Ga.; and (3) over the Southern Road from Atlanta to Washington. Each of the three roads controlled the train over its own part of the trip, and the accident happened on the Southern's tracks, in Virginia. The ticket was bought by Chatters at the office of the Louisville & Nashville Company in New Orleans, that company acting as agent for the Southern in making the sale. Mr. Justice Stone points out that the Southern "carries on in the state, through an office and agents of its own there located, continuous solicitation of freight and passenger traffic," and "maintains its own office there for the sale of tickets for passage over its own and connecting lines" (citing the International Harvester Company Case). He then holds that the fact that the journey upon which the passenger was injured originated in the purchase of his ticket from the Southern Railway (acting through its agent, the Louisville & Nashville Company) in Louisiana was sufficient to render the Southern amenable to service of process in Louisiana, despite the fact that the injury was in Virginia; and thus distinguished the case from the Old Wayne and Simon Cases. As said in the recent case of American Indemnity Co. v. Detroit F. & S. Co. (C. C. A.) 63 F.(2d) 395, 397, respecting the Chatters Case, "since the passenger's injury involved a breach of duty created by the sale of his ticket within the state, the suit was held to be so connected with business done in the state as to fall under the statute."

It is self-evident under the facts that San Francisco is the natural and logical place for the trial of this case; and therefore that the case is not within the spirit or reason of the rule against the burdening of interstate commerce. It is equally self-evident that in this case the fact that plaintiff was employed at San Francisco for the voyage upon which he was injured brings the case within the rule of the Chatters Case. The making of the contract of employment in California brings the appellant's injury—suffered upon the high seas—into relation with defendant's business in this state, just as the purchase by Chatters of his ticket in Louisiana connected his injury with the business of the Southern Railway in the state of suit. Moreover, there are many factors present here which were entirely absent from the cases upon which defendant relies. Unlike the Simon, Davis, and Fry Cases, Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wells and Michigan Central R. Co. v. Mix (where the rails of the interstate carriers did not touch the state of the forum), the defendant's steamship line has San Francisco as its terminal port, and its business on this Coast centers here. As in the International Harvester Company Case, it has in California not only an agent soliciting business, but a large force of employees, including those in executive positions. Plaintiff's injury was sustained on the high seas and not within the territorial jurisdiction of any state. Added to these factors is the circumstance that plaintiff's contract of employment was to terminate in San Francisco where it began. As far as the relations between plaintiff and defendant were concerned, this was the home port of both parties; as far as any state jurisdiction was concerned, California was the only state with respect to which both parties dealt. Furthermore, an analogy exists between this case and that of Hireen v. Interstate Transit Lines, 52 F.(2d) 182, 183 (D. C., N. D. Cal.) where it was held that a passenger who bought a ticket in Nebraska for a trip to California, and who was injured in Nebraska, could, nevertheless, sue in this state. In so holding Judge Kerrigan cites and quotes from the Chatters Case, and says: "Since the performance of defendant's contract of carriage was to terminate in California, the cause of action is sufficiently related to the business of the defendant within this state. The cases of Michigan Central R. Co. v. Mix, 278 U. S. 492, 49 S. Ct. 207, 73 L. Ed. 470, and Missouri ex rel. St. Louis, etc., Ry. v. Taylor, 266 U. S. 200, 45 S. Ct. 47, 69 L. Ed. 247, 42 A. L. R. 1232, indicate that that is the rule when the contract of carriage or consignment is to terminate in the state of suit."

[3] Other cases than those herein cited have been presented by both sides, but it is not necessary to discuss them. We are satisfied for the reasons and upon the authority already given that the municipal court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person of defendant, and that the exercise or assertion of that jurisdiction does not unduly or unreasonably burden interstate commerce.

The judgment appealed from, together with the order quashing service of summons, is reversed, and the cause remanded to the municipal court for further proceedings looking to a trial on the merits.

PRESTON, Justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

The record presents a judgment roll appeal by defendants from a decree of foreclosure in favor of plaintiffs upon certain mining property in Tuolumne county. The sole question presented is whether the complaint fails to state a cause of action by the omission therefrom of appropriate allegations averring the performance of certain precedent and concurrent conditions and covenants found in the agreements of the parties, which are exhibits to the complaint, and in which is contained the mortgage in question.

The answer to the contention is that the covenants and conditions alluded to are neither precedent nor concurrent with the money obligation sued upon. The obligation to pay is definite and certain. The obligation to surrender certain documents and other property, and to procure reconveyance under a deed of trust, was to follow only upon a precedent act of appellants, to wit, the procuring by them of an abstract of title showing ownership of title to the mining property in appellant corporation (subject to certain specified exceptions). Until this was done no obligation existed on the part of respondents.

Thus we have a case where an independent covenant is sued upon and no relief is asked concerning covenants which are mutual or concurrent. The complaint, therefore, is not defective (Fresno Canal, etc., Co. v. Perrin, 170 Cal. 411, 149 P. 805); hence the conclusion above announced.

Plaintiffs (a minor child and his father) filed suit against defendants for damages arising out of collision between plaintiff's minor child and an automobile driven by one defendant for the other defendant in the scope of his employment. Plaintiffs recovered judgment, and defendants appeal.

The minor plaintiff, a boy ten years old at the time of the accident, was playing on the east side of the highway running through the city of Delano at about 8 o'clock in the evening. He approached the easterly side of the highway, stopped, observed the traffic, watched two cars pass in opposite directions, and then started to cross the highway in the middle of the block. He testified, in substance, that he waited on the easterly side of the highway for two cars to go by, one going north and one going south, after which he looked up and down the highway and started across; that, when he was a little beyond the center of the street, he was struck by defendants' automobile, and did not see it before he was hit; that, after he started running across the street, he looked but did not see defendants' automobile. The defendant driver testified that he did not see the boy before the car struck him. He placed the speed of his automobile at between fifteen and eighteen miles per hour. Some witnesses placed it at thirty-five miles per hour. The lights on the automobile were burning. The evidence showed that there were a number of business houses along the highway in the immediate proximity of the accident, and some traffic on the highway.

[1] The record brings us inevitably to the conclusion that, under the facts of this case, it was a question for the trial judge to determine whether or not the driver was negligent, and whether his negligence was a proximate cause of the accident and injuries. "From this picture the jury could with reason conclude that defendant either was not watching the street, which it was his duty to do, * * * or did not have his car under that control which the law requires of a driver. * * * If failing in either duty, his failure was negligence proximately causing the accident." Scott v. Shaw, 115 Cal. App. 400, 1 P.(2d) 531, 532.

[2-4] We likewise are of the opinion that it was a question of fact for the trial court to determine whether or not the minor plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. When a boy ten years old crosses a highway, and is injured, even though he fails to look before crossing, the question of his negligence is usually and naturally a question of fact for the determination of the jury or trial court. Shannon v. Central-Gaither Union School Dist. (Cal. App.) 23 P.(2d) 769. There is evidence that he looked before he started across the street, and under such circumstances the following rule is applicable: "Where he looks but does not see an approaching automobile, or seeing one, erroneously misjudges its speed or distance, or for some other reason assumes he could avoid injury to himself, the question is usually one for the jury." White v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 531, on page 542, 284 P. 1086, 1091. The trial court was therefore justified in finding adversely to defendants in this case on both the question of negligence of the driver and the contributory negligence of the boy.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; PRESTON, J., dissenting.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

CRAIG, Justice.

A judgment for damages was entered upon a verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiff, a minor child, on account of personal injuries alleged to have resulted from negligence of the defendant's employee. The defendants appealed.

[1-3] A horse-drawn delivery wagon of the appellant company in custody of its driver, a codefendant herein, stood unattended in a city street near the respondent's residence. The latter climbed upon the same and fell or was thrown therefrom as the horse moved forward. The evidence upon the question in controversy is meager. It appeared that said vehicle was supplied with hooks to which by rings in the reins the same were to be tightly drawn back and fastened. Also, there was a brake held by notches and, as testified by the driver, "when you push it up on the side it pulls it back into the notches which hold it in place." When stopping to make a delivery, the rein "pulls the horse's head back and that makes the lines taut * * * and in addition to that you had to put on the brake" to prevent the horse from moving during the driver's absence. The appellants maintain that the fact that a child may not be capable of contributory negligence does not always render a defendant liable upon mere proof of injury. And they doubtless properly distinguish turntable cases which have been said to be exceptions to the general rule, since "if an owner became responsible merely because children were attracted, it would burden the ownership of property with a most preposterous and unbearable weight." Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 P. 379, 380. An instruction given to the jury in the instant case and to which the appellants take especial exception stated: "If you find that plaintiff was injured by defendant's horse and wagon, and if you further find that plaintiff was too young to be negligent, that the burden of proving lack of negligence falls on the defendants and if they fail to prove themselves free from negligence, then you should find for the plaintiff." Scellars v. Universal Service Everywhere, 68 Cal. App. 252, 228 P. 879, 880, is cited as authority for argument that the rule so stated had no application. It was there observed that: "Aside from the occurrence of the accident, there is no further showing of negligence on the part of the defendant except the testimony above referred to that high motor speed could cause the damage which resulted. To hold the defendant liable under these circumstances would be to merely conjecture that he had conducted himself negligently, and thus caused the injury." But the appellant's driver testified that the respondent had to his knowledge previously been found under his wagon; that the grade of the street "is just enough there with that kind of a wagon so that without applying the brake it would go downhill. The brake would have to be applied to hold the wagon from going downhill." It appeared by positive testimony that said wagon ran over the respondent, and that he was injured thereby; and although asked repeatedly the driver failed to give any testimony from which the jury might even infer that said brake had been applied "to hold the wagon from going downhill." The doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" is that when a thing which causes injury without fault of the injured person is shown to be under the exclusive control of the defendant and the injury is such as in the ordinary course of things does not occur, if proper management is exercised, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation that the injury arose from the defendant's want of care. Moore v. Steen, 102 Cal. App. 723, 283 P. 833. It means "the thing speaks for itself," and so speaking furnishes an inference of negligence in the absence of showing to the contrary. Where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servant and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of events does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation by the defendant that the accident arose from want of proper care. Crooks v. White, 107 Cal. App. 304, 290 P. 497. The theory of the doctrine is that the defendant in charge of an instrument which causes injury either knows the cause of the accident or has the best opportunity of ascertaining it, and the plaintiff having no such knowledge is compelled to allege negligence in general terms and to rely upon proof of the happening of the accident in order to establish it. Kenney v. Antonetti, 211 Cal. 336, 295 P. 341. The rule stated by said instruction was accompanied by cautionary instructions applicable to the evidence before the jury, and if they believe from uncontradicted evidence that said driver having knowledge of the necessity for the exercise of care under the peculiar conditions related by him had not applied his brake and gave no explanation of his failure so to do, it lay within their province to infer a degree of negligence from which an absence of showing to the contrary would render the defendants liable under the rule stated in numerous cases. Having admitted knowledge of such conditions and of his duty, all intendments being resolved in favor of the verdict, it must be assumed that the jury concluded that the appellants knowingly permitted a danger to exist for which they could afford no legal justification.

The judgment is affirmed.

Upon rehearing the Industrial Accident Commission reduced the award, and claimant filed petition for review, and award was annulled, and respondents apply for certiorari to annul the decision annulling the award.

Award annulled.

J. L. Kearney, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. I. Townsend, of San Francisco, and Loeb, Walker & Loeb and Herman F. Selvin, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Justice.

Following fatal injury to an employee, compensation was allowed by the Industrial Accident Commission upon the ground of serious and willful misconduct of his employer. On rehearing before said commission, the award was reduced upon the ground that the evidence of such conduct was insufficient to warrant an allowance of extra compensation. The respondents have petitioned this court for a rehearing after decision upon a writ of review annulling the order last mentioned.

It appeared that said employee, while engaged in removing electric wires at the top of a pole, came in contact with a metal conduit which was at the time not insulated at that point. It is contended that exposure of the conduit at the time in question constituted a dereliction amounting to serious and willful misconduct of the employer. Section 1, Statutes of 1911, c. 499, p. 1037, as amended in 1915, c. 600, p. 1058, provided that no "person, firm, or corporation shall * * * erect or maintain vertically on any pole any wire or cable used to conduct or carry electricity, without causing such wire or cable to be at all times wholly incased in a casing," etc. Sections 34 and 35 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 862) require that every employer furnish employment and a place of employment safe for employees, and forbid a failure or neglect so to do. Orders of the California State Railroad Commission further recite that "any portion of the riser or iron pipe enclosing the riser, extending within eight feet of any supply conductor shall be covered with a casing," etc. The petitioner asserts that, even if the decedent's superiors in charge of such facilities had not known that this conduit was not insulated at the time in question, the defective condition which caused the injury was apparent, that it should have been observed, and that said employer and its agents in charge must be held to have known the law.

[1-3] Where the jurisdiction of a board depends upon the existence of certain facts, it has authority to determine whether or not those facts exist, and its determination of such question is conclusive on collateral attack. In re Grove Street, 61 Cal. 438; People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 P. 749. But certiorari is a direct attack (Vanfleet on Collateral Attack, § 2), in which the existence of jurisdictional facts may be questioned, and "willful misconduct" is a jurisdictional question in such cases which is open to inquiry in such a proceeding (Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 P. 35).

[4] It has been held that serious misconduct of an employer must be taken to mean conduct which he either knew, or ought to have known, had he turned his mind to the matter; conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of employees, and involving the knowledge of a person that the thing which he does is wrong; though not necessarily shown by positive evidence that he was notified of an unsafe condition, but shown by circumstances tending to establish proof of a reckless disregard for the safety of others and a willingness to inflict injury. E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 184 Cal. 180, 193 P. 105, 16 A. L. R. 611.

The official in charge of power supply and his subordinates who were superior to the decedent and his coemployees swore that they were not aware of the rules of the respondent commission nor of the Railroad Commission; and did not know of the absence of insulation near the top of said pole until after the accident. The pole was 33 feet and 10 inches in height, and by said rules and statutes the conduit in controversy was required to be insulated throughout its length. Both the supervising head of power supply and the gang foreman had been present and were about the pole which formed part of a line then for some time in existence and operation. The foregoing facts were not controverted.

[5] That the covering which had protected the upper part of the pole had fallen off on the day before Summers was fatally injured is an undisputed fact. There was evidence indicating that it had been off for some time. Winchester stated that he had no actual knowledge of this fact. He was the manager in charge of the work that was being done. He testified that he was on the ground on the 21st day of June, the day before the accident. He went out there on the evening of that day or the morning of the 22d, but could not say that he saw Summers at that time. This, of course, would have been after the covering of the upper part of the pole had fallen off. In the morning of the 21st, and before directing Summers to work on this pole, Winchester warned him to be careful and that the pole was dangerous. Under these circumstances, we think that as a matter of law it must be held that, even though Winchester did not have actual knowledge of the exposed and dangerous condition of the conduit on the 22d day of June, he could have known of it had he turned his mind to the matter. Knowing as he did the hazardous condition of this pole, the admitted facts and the failure to look and observe that this covering had dropped off was a reckless disregard for the safety of the men at work about and upon it.

In arriving at the facts as to the covering over the upper part of the pole we have disregarded the testimony of the witness Bennett. Counsel for both parties have at some period of this litigation, apparently depending on how Bennett had last told his story, questioned his reliability, and in this we concur with both. His first version was that even before the covering fell off on June 21st the upper 12 or 14 feet of the pole had been uncovered. This, he said, included the cross-arm area in the uncovered portion. Later, on the occasion of a further hearing, Bennett changed his statement, and said that, if the covering had not dropped, the cross-arm would have been covered. Subsequently, in an affidavit filed with the respondent commission, he reverts to his first testimony and avers that the upper part of the conduit which Summers contacted "was at no time enclosed."

[6] The cases of Helme v. Great Western Mill Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 185 P. 510, and Brown v. Lemon Cove Ditch Co., 36 Cal. App. 94, 171 P. 705, are cited as holding that, in an action based on section 12, subdivision b, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, it must be alleged and proved (1) that a failure to house gears was "gross negligence" or "willful misconduct"; (2) that it was a personal failure to act on the part of an elective officer, such as a director, of a corporation defendant; and (3) that such failure indicated willful disregard of the life, limb, or bodily safety of an employee. Since that section is not involved in this proceeding, they are not in point. The same is true of Schmidt v. Pursell, 47 Cal. App. 440, 190 P. 846. Under both commission rules and statutes this conduit, situated as it appears to have been, was undoubtedly required to be kept insulated not merely over the lower portion of the pole, but over all of the upper portion as well. The line had been erected for some time. The gang foreman Moss, and Winchester who had charge of the power supply plant of the studio, a branch of the electrical department of the studio where the work was being done, had been present and about the pole since the covering fell off the upper portion, if it was there. It is common knowledge that to contact electricity or a conduit through which it is passing and which is uninsulated is dangerous. The evidence fully established the foregoing facts and others heretofore mentioned. We conclude that the finding that the employer's misconduct was not willful is unsupported by the evidence, and that therefore the commission acted without jurisdiction in making its award based upon that conclusion.

The award is annulled.

Respondent instituted her action for divorce alleging cruelty and failure to provide. Appellant filed his answer denying the allegations of cruelty and failure to provide and filed a cross-complaint seeking divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The trial court found against the issues of cruelty and that appellant had failed to provide respondent with the common necessities of life, granted her an interlocutory decree of divorce, and divided the community property. This decree is before us for review.

Appellant presents but a single ground upon which he urges a reversal of the judgment, namely, that there was ample uncontradicted evidence to establish extreme cruelty on the part of the respondent against appellant, and no evidence of willful neglect and failure to provide on the part of appellant. His brief is entirely inadequate to present the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. It has no supplement containing any evidence offered in the court below on the questions presented here. The body of the brief contains detached and isolated excerpts from the evidence which are not in sufficient narrative form to give a connected idea of the testimony. Respondent's brief does not contain any of the evidence or quotations or reference to the reporter's transcript. We have, however, carefully reviewed the entire record and have reached the conclusion that while the evidence is conflicting there is substantial and material evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court. No good purpose could be served by detailing the evidence here.

[1] It is fundamental that where there is substantial evidence in the record to sustain findings and judgment of the trial court, a reversal will not be had because of a conflict in the evidence.

[2] The trial judge is a trier of fact. He must weigh the evidence, determine its weight and sufficiency, and judge the credibility of the witnesses appearing before him. When there is material and competent evidence to sustain his findings and judgment, they cannot be disturbed on appeal.

CRAIG, Justice.

In an action for damages arising from the impact of automobiles at an intersection of public thoroughfares, a verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff appealed.

[1, 2] The appellant was a passenger in one of the vehicles of the respondent taxi service, which, while proceeding westerly, was struck by a car driven southerly into the intersection and to the left toward the east while said taxi was crossing the same. Each was maintaining about the same speed of twenty miles an hour; the respondent driver, Thompson, had advanced to the northwesterly section of the crossing, and was not aware of the other's intended turn until the impact of the latter's left front fender with his left rear fender. The statutes provide, and the jury were instructed, that a vehicle must be driven on public highways at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, nor at such a speed as to endanger life, limb, or property; that the authorized speed is fifteen miles an hour in traversing a grade crossing or intersection when the driver's view is obstructed and in a business district, and twenty miles an hour in a residence district; and that the burden rested upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the defendants were negligent, and that their negligence was the proximate cause of injury. The jury were informed further that the primary duty of said service was to employ a competent driver, and that it was the duty of such driver to exercise with respect to the safety of passengers the highest degree of care. Insufficiency of the evidence is the only ground upon which a reversal is sought by the appellant. It appeared that the driver of the south-bound automobile suddenly and without warning turned to the left and against the taxicab while the latter was traveling at a rate of speed which the jury may have deemed reasonable and proper under the instructions of the trial court. A judgment will be reversed where the evidence shows that a party in whose favor it was rendered so far violated the standard of conduct required that an appellate court may say as a matter of law that he was negligent and that such negligence constituted the proximate cause of injury. Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland T. R., 175 Cal. 1, 164 P. 798. The question of contributory negligence is not involved. Nor is it contended that the driver of the taxicab disregarded any duty prescribed by law or by the instructions with respect to the safety of his passenger, which a reasonable and prudent person would or could have exercised in like circumstances. The speed of his car was not shown to have had any direct connection with, nor to have been responsible for, the accident.

[3, 4] An appeal was also taken from the order denying a motion for a new trial. This ruling is not an appealable order. Matters aliunde the record are argued in the appellant's briefs, and also attack the expediency of the denying of such a motion. With these questions we are not concerned upon appeal, nor does the record as presented require that the verdict and judgment be disturbed. Goddeau v. Levy, 72 Cal. App. 13, 236 P. 354; *Flores v. During the year 1928 Le Roy Payne purchased different stocks through the agency of respondent's assignor, paying cash for the securities and accepting deliveries of them. In the latter part of the year he had a conversation with one Sidney Clark, an employee of the assignor, in which trading in stocks on a margin was discussed. This resulted in Payne and the assignor entering into a written agreement that the assignor would act as broker for Payne in dealing in stocks on a margin. It appears that for a number of months after the execution of this contract Payne had on deposit with his brokers sufficient money and securities so that all of the stocks which he had purchased could have been more than paid for without the sale of any of the stocks purchased on margin. Several months after January 1, 1929, Payne increased his operations so that his deposit of stock and money with his brokers was not sufficient to pay for the stocks purchased for him without disposing of some of them. Up to the latter part of July, 1929, the brokers only purchased such stocks as Payne directed either in person or over the telephone. About this time, Payne, who was a resident of the city of Fresno, took a trip and was gone until the latter part of August of the same year. Before leaving he authorized his brokers to use their discretion in purchasing stock for him upon margin, which they did during his absence. He testified that upon his return he informed Clark to discontinue this practice. Clark could not recall any such instruction. On September 6, 1929, the brokers purchased fifty shares of "Curtis-Wright" for $1,318.75, and fifty shares of "Standard Brands" for $1,975, and on September 25th, fifty shares of "General Gas & Electric A" for $5,200, all without the prior knowledge of Payne. They notified him by telegram of the purchase of the two stocks on September 6th and also sent a memorandum of purchase by mail. A similar memorandum of purchase was sent at the time of the purchase of the General Gas & Electric stock. On or about the last of each month they sent by mail a detailed statement of all transactions on his account for that month. He made no objection to the purchase of the three stocks just mentioned until November 14, 1929, after their market value had decreased as a result of the stock market crash in October of that year. Frequent demands were made upon Payne by his brokers after October 23, 1929, that he deposit with them additional cash or securities to protect his margin. This he refused to do, and in June, 1930, his brokers sold all his stocks and applied the selling price to his account and this suit was brought to recover the deficiency. Judgment was rendered against Payne for the sum of $6,039.94, from which this appeal is taken.

The margin contract executed by Payne on November 26, 1928, was as follows: "The undersigned, the customer, agrees with Plunkett and Lilienthal and Co., the broker: a. That all transactions for, or in connection with the account of the customer, shall in all respects be subject to the rules and customs of business of the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange, and its Clearing House, or of any other Exchange or Board of Trade on which such transactions may be executed. b. That all transactions for or in connection with the account of the customer shall be deemed to be included in a single account, notwithstanding the fact that such transactions may be segregated into separate accounts on the books of the broker. c. That all securities from time to time carried in the customer's marginal account, or deposited to protect the same, may be loaned by the broker, or may be pledged by the broker, either separately or together with other securities, either for the sum due thereon, or for a greater sum, all without further notice to the customer. d. The customer agrees upon demand, to deposit any additional margin required by the broker and in case of his failure so to do, or whenever, without any demand for more margin, the margin on the account of the customer shall become reduced to less than five per cent (5%), or whenever in the judgment of the broker, it is necessary for his protection, the broker shall have the right to close the account or any trade or transaction included therein on the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange, or elsewhere, or at public or private sale, all without further notice to the customer."

The practice of San Francisco brokers in handling margin accounts where the stock was listed and sold on the San Francisco Stock Exchange may be briefly summarized as follows: When the order was received from a customer he was required to deposit with his broker the difference between the selling price of the stock and the amount banks would lend upon it as collateral. The broker bought the stock upon the San Francisco Stock Exchange. At the close of business the transaction was recorded in the books of the exchange and the following day the broker received the purchased stock. He either pledged the stock with his bank as security for a loan to pay the balance of the purchase price or carried the loan himself, retaining the stock as collateral. The stock thus transferred was what was called "Street Certificates." These were ordinary stock certificates indorsed in blank by the shareholder with the indorsement guaranteed by some responsible bank or broker. So indorsed they were regarded as negotiable and passed from person to person without further indorsement until such time as a delivery was made to a customer who had purchased and paid for them. The broker was required to keep in his possession, or pledged, a total number of the shares of stock of the corporation equal to the total number of shares purchased by him for the accounts of all of his customers dealing in such stock on a margin, so that when a customer paid for his stock and desired its delivery the transaction could be closed by delivering the number of shares purchased on margin, although the certificate delivered to him might not have been for the identical shares which the broker purchased at the time he executed the customer's order.

Where the broker was not a member of the New York Stock Exchange, and the stock purchased by the customer was not listed on the San Francisco Stock Exchange, the broker would execute the order through a San Francisco representative of a broker having a seat on the New York Stock Exchange. The "street stock" was not delivered to the broker for the customer, but was held by the member of the New York Stock Exchange or his correspondent to secure the account of the customer's broker, or it might have been pledged by the member of the New York Stock Exchange with his bank to secure that portion of the purchase price paid for the stock on such exchange by its member broker. Payne's brokers were not members of the New York Stock Exchange.

Appellant urges two grounds for a reversal of the judgment. First, that the margin contract under which the stock was purchased by the brokers was illegal and void under the provisions of section 26 of article 4 of the Constitution of California; second, that because the three purchases of stocks in September, 1929, were not expressly authorized by Payne, his account cannot be charged with them. She maintains that if her first contention is sustained, respondent cannot recover; and if her first contention is not sustained and her second contention is sustained, the judgment should be reduced to $961.75.

In support of her first contention appellant cites section 26 of article 4 of the Constitution and the cases of Cashman v. Root, 89 Cal. 373, 26 P. 883, 12 L. R. A. 511, 23 Am. St. Rep. 482; Sheehy v. Shinn, 103 Cal. 325, 37 P. 393; Kullman v. Simmens, 104 Cal. 595, 38 P. 362; Parker v. Otis, 130 Cal. 322, 62 P. 571, 927, 92 Am. St. Rep. 56; Stillwell v. Cutter, 146 Cal. 657, 80 P. 1071; Hartnett v. Wilson, 31 Cal. App. 678, 161 P. 281. The section of the Constitution in question was amended in 1908. All of the cases cited, except Hartnett v. Wilson, supra, were decided under the language of the section prior to this amendment and are therefore of little assistance in the decision of the question involved.

The original section was apparently intended to prevent marginal transactions on a stock exchange and transactions where an immediate delivery of the stock was not had. The amended section prohibited fictitious transactions on the stock exchange where there was no intention on the part of the customer and the broker to deliver the stock, and where the parties contemplated mere payment of the difference between the contract and the market price on divers days.

In the case of Hartnett v. Wilson, supra, the trial court held there was no intention on the part of either the customer or the broker to deliver the stock in question, and that therefore it was a fictitious marginal transaction and prohibited by the constitutional provision as amended in 1908. In the instant case the trial court made a contrary finding. It was here found that there was an intention to deliver the stock purchased. This sufficiently distinguishes the two cases so that the rule announced in Hartnett v. Wilson, supra, is not applicable here.

sideration, and a decision after the amendment became effective. Therefore, the discussion of the effect of the amendment in this opinion must, strictly speaking, be considered dicta. However, as it appears that the case was first heard in department and a rehearing granted for the express purpose of considering the effect of the amendment, this dicta would seem to be the result of careful study of the question. After quoting the original and amended sections, it was said: "The concluding sentences of the respective sections show the changes made by the amendment which are involved in this action. The original section gives the broader description of the thing prohibited. It forbids all contracts for the sale of stock "on margin, or to be delivered at a future day." The new section forbids such sales only when they are made "without any intention on the part of one party to deliver and of the other party to receive the shares, and contemplating merely the payment of differences between the contract and market price on divers days." The contract between Sisson and Edwards, as it is alleged, was clearly a contract for the purchase and sale of stocks on margin (see Parker v. Otis, 130 Cal. 330, 92 Am. St. Rep. 56, 62 P. 571, 927), and as such was forbidden by the constitutional provision in force at the time it was made. But the allegations of the complaint do not show a contract which comes within the description of the thing forbidden by the amended section. The complaint does not aver that the sales were made without any intention to deliver or receive the stock, or that the parties contemplated merely the payment of differences between the buying price and the market price on a future day. Both the old and the new section declare that the forbidden contracts "shall be void." The contract as alleged was void under the old section, the one then in force, but it would not have been void under the new section, if it had been made after its adoption."

The case of Cisler v. Ray, 213 Cal. 620, 2 P.(2d) 987, 989, 79 A. L. R. 584, presents facts quite similar to the one at bar. Ray was a customer of a broker member of the San Francisco Stock Exchange, the assignor of Cisler. Ray maintained a margin account with the broker who executed his orders on the floor of the exchange. The action was brought to recover money lost in buying and selling a certain stock. A judgment in favor of the broker's assignee and against the customer was sustained. The following was said: "An additional finding that the contracts of the parties contemplated actual deliveries of shares of stock and that there was no violation of the provisions of section 26 of article 4 of the state Constitution, lifts out of the case any contention that the contracts or transactions involved were illegal."

In Mitchell v. J. H. Roth & Co., 124 Cal.

App. 96, 12 P.(2d) 91, the court stated the facts and the law applicable thereto as follows: "The portion of section 26, article 4 of the Constitution, relied upon by appellants, reads: 'All contracts for the purchase or sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association without any intention on the part of one party to deliver and of the other party to receive the shares, and contemplating merely the payment of differences between the contract and market prices on divers days, shall be void, and neither party to any such contract shall be entitled to recover any damages for failure to perform the same, or any money paid thereon, in any court of this State.' In the case before us both plaintiff and her assignor signed contracts in writing in which they agreed to buy the stock, each containing the following language: 'It is understood and agreed * * * that actual delivery is contemplated.' Thus on their face the contracts were not violative of the constitutional provision. It is appellants' contention, however, that the testimony shows that both plaintiff and her assignor had the oral understanding with Lowery that they were not to receive the shares of stock or pay the balance due on them, but that Lowery agreed to sell the stock on April 1, 1929, for $35 per share, and to pay them the difference between that sum and $25 per share, the price at which they had agreed to buy. Even thus nakedly stated, we are satisfied that the transaction is not in violation of the constitutional provision. The agreement was not the ordinary short-selling agreement in which the parties gamble upon the price of the stock at a fixed future date, the buyer to win if the stock goes up and the seller to win if it goes down. Here was no gamble at all. In consideration of their agreement to buy the stock and the payment of one-half of its purchase price, Lowery promised absolutely that on April 1st he would sell the stock for a definite price, $35 per share. If he could not sell it for $35 on April 1st, he was not to sell it at all, nor did he make any effort to sell it at that date at a lower price. The plaintiff testified that she understood that, if the stock did not sell for $35 on April 1st, 'then I was to get my certificates'; and plaintiff's assignor, Mrs. Riley, testified that she thought she owned the stock. We are satisfied that the constitutional provision in question is designed merely to prohibit dealing in futures with no intention to purchase or sell actual shares of stock, but merely to 'pay off' upon the rise or fall of the market between fixed days. Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 459, 460, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392, 123 P. 276. This was not such a transaction."

[2] It is well settled that a broker in executing an order for a customer acts as the latter's agent in the transaction. Liberman v. McDonnell, 97 Cal. App. 171, 275 P. 486;

Gallagher v. Jones, 129 U. S. 193, 9 S. Ct. 335, 32 L. Ed. 658. In Blankenhorn-Hunter-Pulin Co. v. Thayer, 199 Cal. 90, 247 P. 1088, 1089, 48 A. L. R. 797, it is said: "As between a broker and a marginal customer, the latter is also the owner of the stock, and the broker is a pledgee (Richardson v. Shaw, 209 U. S. 365, 14 Ann. Cas. 981, 52 L. Ed. 835, 28 S. Ct. 512 [see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes]; Thomas v. Taggart, 209 U. S. 385, 52 L. Ed. 845, 28 S. Ct. 519), and has a lien on the stock for any advances he may make thereon, and has the implied consent of the owner lawfully to repledge the same (In re J. C. Wilson & Co., supra [D. C.] 252 F. 631); that, as between the broker and his cash customer the latter is entitled to the immediate delivery of the stock (Duel v. Hollins, 241 U. S. 523, 60 L. Ed. 1143, 36 S. Ct. 615), and the marginal customer is entitled to the delivery when he pays the balance of the contract price (In re Mason [C. C. A.] 282 F. 202)."

The Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to consider the reciprocal obligations of a broker and customer under a marginal contract in Richardson v. Shaw, supra, and the following was quoted with approval from Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235, in that opinion: "The broker undertakes and agrees—1. At once to buy for the customer the stocks indicated. 2. To advance all the money required for the purchase beyond the 10 per cent furnished by the customer. 3. To carry or hold such stocks for the benefit of the customer so long as the margin of 10 per cent is kept good, or until notice is given by either party that the transaction must be closed. An appreciation in the value of the stocks is the gain of the customer, and not of the broker. 4. At all times to have, in his name and under his control, ready for delivery, the shares purchased, or an equal amount of other shares of the same stock. 5. To deliver such shares to the customer when required by him, upon the receipt of the advances and commissions accruing to the broker; or, 6. To sell such shares, upon the order of the customer, upon payment of the like sums to him, and account to the customer for the proceeds of such sale. Under this contract the customer undertakes—1. To pay a margin of 10 per cent on the current market value of the shares. 2. To keep good such margin according to the fluctuations of the market. 3. To take the shares so purchased on his order whenever required by the broker, and to pay the difference between the percentage advanced by him and the amount paid therefor by the broker. The position of the broker is twofold. Upon the order of the customer he purchases the shares of stocks desired by him. This is a clear act of agency. To complete the purchase he advances from his own funds, for the benefit of the customer, 90 per cent of the purchase money. Quite as clearly he does not, in this, act as an agent, but assumes a new position. * * * In my judgment the contract between the parties to this action was, in spirit and in effect, if not technically and in form, a contract of pledge." In this same case, the Supreme Court of the United States quoted from Jones on Pledges, section 496, as follows: "The broker acts in a threefold relation: First, in purchasing the stock he is an agent; then, in advancing money for the purchase, he becomes a creditor; and finally, in holding the stock to secure the advances made, he becomes a pledgee of it. It does not matter that the actual possession of the stock was never in the customer. The form of a delivery of the stock to the customer, and a redelivery by him to the broker, would have constituted a strict, formal pledge. But this delivery and redelivery would leave the parties in precisely the same situation they are in when, waiving this formality, the broker retains the certificates as security for the advances."

[3] From the foregoing authorities it would seem clear that the present Constitution does not prohibit marginal trading on a stock exchange where it is done in good faith, and where the broker actually buys the stock and has it or a like number of shares of the same stock for delivery to his customer when the full purchase price, charges, and interest are paid.

[4.5] Payne testified that he at no time intended to accept any delivery of stock from his brokers, but was merely gambling on the stock market. He did not disclose this intention to his brokers during the entire time he was trading through them and until long after the break in the stock market made loss to him inevitable. A secret intent to violate the law, concealed in the mind of one party to an otherwise legal contract, cannot enable such party to avoid the contract and escape his liability under its terms.

[6] In considering appellant's second contention, that the three purchases of September, 1929, were unauthorized by Payne, and that he should not be required to pay for them, we must bear in mind that he was notified of the first two purchases by telegram and a memorandum by mail on the day they were made, and of the second purchase by mail, and that he also received by mail shortly after October 1, and November 1, 1929, itemized statements of his account showing these purchases, and that he did not object to their having been made until November 14, 1929, after their greatly reduced market values had made a loss from the purchases certain. We think these facts show a ratification of the purchases under the rule laid down by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Leviten v. Bickley, Mandeville & Wimple (C. C. A.) 35 F.(2d) 825, where the facts involved are very similar to those of the instant case.

Appellant relies upon Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 152 Cal. 507, 93 P. 85, 87, as authority supporting her second contention. Owing to the wide difference in the facts of the two cases we cannot so construe it. The following is a quotation from that authority: "If an agent with ostensible authority to sell his principal's wheat, but under instructions to sell it for not less than $1 a bushel, shall sell and deliver it for 50 cents a bushel, there is no power in the principal to rescind the sale. Shall the principal by accepting the 50 cents be held to have exonerated his agent from liability for the other 50 cents per bushel? Such a doctrine certainly does not commend itself, and is not sustained. It is limited, so far as the agent is concerned, to those cases where there remains with the principal, after his first complete knowledge of the transaction, the power to rescind, and, failing so to do, he is properly charged with full acceptance of all the responsibilities of the contract, even to the exoneration of his agent, because, with the ability to rescind, if he had rescinded, the transaction would be at an end and nobody would be injured." The latter part of the quotation is applicable here. If Payne had disaffirmed the purchases promptly upon being notified of them the stocks could have been sold. He waited until such sales must result in serious loss to someone. He should not be permitted to take advantage of his own delay and thereby cause a serious loss to his agent.

selling of stocks on stock exchanges. Appellants were customers of respondent, who acted as their broker in marginal trading in stocks on stock exchanges. Most of the transactions here involved were made on the Los Angeles Stock Exchange. These marginal tradings resulted in a net loss to appellants, which they refused to pay, and this suit followed. The action was tried before a jury and a verdict was rendered against them in the sum of $9,899.07.

The sole question presented on this appeal is whether the transactions between the parties were illegal and contrary to the provisions of section 26 of article 4 of the Constitution. The identical question has been considered by us at length in the case of Griffin v. Payne, 24 P.(2d) 370, the opinion in which has this day been filed. The issues in the two cases are identical, with the exception that in the instant case there is no question as to the lack of authority of respondent to make marginal purchases or sales for appellants. In Griffin v. Payne, supra, we held that marginal trading in stock, under the facts there appearing, did not violate the provisions of section 26 of article 4 of the Constitution. The same conclusion must be reached in this case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Injunction suit by the General Petroleum Corporation of California against S. W. Loughead and another, doing business as Baer & Loughead as proprietors of the Cupertino Service Station. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

LANGDON, Justice.

Defendants owned land and a gasoline service station thereon. They leased the same to plaintiff corporation. By the terms of the lease the station was to be used for the purpose of selling plaintiff's products exclusively, and the building and equipment were painted in the distinctive colors used in advertising those products. A contract was also entered into by the parties, making defendants the agents of plaintiff to sell its products, and licensing the use by them of the tanks and containers. After performing for some time, defendants ceased selling plaintiff's products, changed the color and advertising of the station, and commenced to sell materials produced by a rival company, in violation of the lease and contract. Plaintiff brought this action for an injunction to restrain defendants from trespassing upon the premises and from advertising, storing, or selling any products other than those of plaintiff. It is alleged that defendants threaten to continue their activities unless restrained. The lower court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals from the resulting judgment.

Stated briefly, the case is one in which plaintiff, having a leasehold estate in the premises, seeks to enjoin the continuing trespasses of defendants, who are occupying and using the station in a manner prohibited by the terms of their contract. No attempt is being made, either directly or indirectly, to secure specific performance of that portion of the agency contract by which defendants agree to sell plaintiff's products. In other words, plaintiff does not seek to compel the performance of personal services by defendants, and, of course, it could not do so. Plaintiff asks merely that defendants be enjoined from using the station save in the manner agreed upon; and, so far as any injunctive process is sought, defendants are free to leave the leased premises.

Under these circumstances, our recent decision in the case of Associated Oil Company v. Myers (Cal. Sup.) 18 P.(2d) 668, is controlling. We there held that the plaintiff in such a case is without an adequate remedy at law, and that equitable relief by injunction was proper. It is unnecessary to add to the full discussion of principles and authorities contained in the opinion in that case.

The judgment is reversed.

McCANN et al. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State.
S. F. 14586.

Supreme Court of California.

July 28, 1933.

1. Corporations ⇨19.

Where mandamus proceeding, brought to compel secretary of state, on payment of nominal fee, to file articles of incorporation for corporation having only nonpar stock, was pending when statute requiring substantial filing fee and applicable to pending applications took effect, statute held to apply (Pol. Code, § 409, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1933, c. 20).

2. Constitutional law ⇨190.

No constitutional objection exists to retroactive operation of civil statute, except where vested right or obligation of contract is impaired.

3. Corporations ⇨17.

Statutory conditions for incorporation do not constitute offer which results in contract on mere filing of application.

4. Contempt ⇨21.

Respondent secretary of state could not be adjudged in contempt for disobeying per-empty mandamus requiring him to file articles of incorporation on payment of nominal fee, where, before writ was issued, statute requiring substantial fee took effect but was not called to court's attention (Pol. Code, § 409, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1933, c. 20).

In Bank.

Mandamus proceeding by Leo C. McCann and others, incorporators of the Lincoln Shares Corporation, and others against Frank C. Jordan, Secretary of State, in which a peremptory writ was issued [20 P.(2d) 47]. On order to show cause why respondent should not be adjudged in contempt.

Order discharged.

Ellis, Lyman & Steindorf and Howard C. Ellis, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioners, on February 5, 1932, sought to file articles of incorporation for Lincoln Shares Corporation, and tendered the nominal filing fees then required by statute for a corporation having only non-par stock. Upon refusal of respondent secretary of state to file the articles unless paid a filing fee of $1,000, petitioners sought and obtained an alternative writ of mandate from this court. Our final decision after rehearing was rendered March 15, 1933, and a peremptory writ was issued, requiring respondent to file the articles upon payment of the fees previously tendered. McCann v. Jordan (Cal. Sup.) 20 P.(2d) 47. Respondent, acting upon the advice of the Attorney General, again refused to file the articles, and on April 6, 1933, this court issued its order to show cause why respondent should not be adjudged in contempt.

The contention of respondent is that, conceding the force of this court's holding that the fee demanded was not required by the statutes in force at the time of petitioner's application, nevertheless this situation was corrected by urgency legislation which went into effect while the case was pending in this court. Stats. 1933, c. 20, amending Political Code, § 409, subd. 5. Under the amended statute the fees demanded by respondent are proper. Hence the sole question before us now is whether respondent may require compliance with the statute in its present form, notwithstanding the prior application of petitioners. This issue was not raised or considered in the former proceeding.

[1-3] In our opinion, the amended statute is clearly applicable to petitioners' application, and no satisfactory reasoning or authority has been presented to us which casts any doubt upon this conclusion. The statute in terms applies to any application now pending before the respondent; hence no question of statutory construction is presented. The retroactive operation of a civil statute is by no means unusual, and no constitutional objection exists to such operation save where a vested right, or the obligation of a contract, is impaired. County of San Bernardino v. State Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 20 P.(2d) 673; Los Angeles v. Oliver, 102 Cal. App. 299, 283 P. 298. Petitioner suggests that the incorporation statutes are "a general offer" by the state "to bring a group of persons into corporate being upon the fulfillment of statutory requirements then existing," and that upon "acceptance" of that offer "a substantial contract right is created." No authority is cited for this unique view, and we think it requires no discussion to dispose of the contention that the statutory conditions for incorporation constitute an offer which results in a contract upon the mere filing of the application. Petitioners certainly had a right, enforceable at law, to compel respondent to accept their articles if in compliance with statutes then in force. But, whatever may have been petitioners' right at the time of the original application, it is plain that they have no present right to have their articles filed except in compliance with existing law.

In State v. Crawford, 90 Fla. 264, 105 So. 446, 448, a foreign corporation tendered to the secretary of state of Florida the requisite fees for filing articles. The latter refused to accept them, demanding a larger fee. An alternative writ of mandate being granted, the case came before the court, but prior to decision the law was amended so as to require the larger fee. The court dismissed the writ on the ground that the new statute governed, saying: "As the relator's application for the permit gave it no vested or contract right while the former law was in force, the relator has now no right to a peremptory writ to enforce a statutory duty in the premises, when such duty on the conditions alleged no longer exists because of the change in the statute law."

This case is almost directly in point, there being no substantial distinction between the rights of foreign corporations and the incorporators of a domestic corporation, so far as the legislative power in question is concerned.

Such cases as Rose v. Estudillo, 39 Cal. 270, where petitioner held county warrants, a recognized contractual obligation, and Montgomery v. Kasson, 16 Cal. 189, where the grantee of land from the state performed work of reclamation, having a vested right in the land, are clearly distinguishable. Here we have no contract and no vested right. The situation before us here is very similar to that presented by an application for a permit to build a certain type of structure in a certain place, under the terms of an existing zoning ordinance, followed by a change in the ordinance. It is well settled that the new ordinance may operate retroactively to require a denial of the application, or the nullification of a permit already issued, provided that the applicant has not already engaged in substantial building or incurred expenses in connection therewith. *Brougher v. Attorney and client ⇨57.

Petition to review state bar governors' order recommending petitioner's suspension from law practice must be dismissed, where not filed within statutory time (St. 1927, p. 41, § 26).

In Bank.

Application by R. O. Bordner to review an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California recommending petitioner's suspension from the practice of law.

Petition dismissed.

R. O. Bordner and O. G. Foelker, both of Oakland, for petitioner.

Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, A. B. Bianchi, Warren Olney, Jr., and Max C. Sloss, all of San Francisco, and Thomas C. Ridgway and Leonard B. Slosson, Associate Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In this matter, the petition to review the order of the board of governors of the state bar, recommending that the petitioner be suspended from the practice of law, was not filed in this court within sixty days after the filing of the certified copy of the decision of said board of governors with the clerk of this court. Petitioner has therefore failed to comply with section 26 of the State Bar Act (Stats. 1927, p. 41) fixing the time within which petitions for the review of orders of the board of governors must be filed. For this reason the petition is dismissed.

LANGDON, Justice.

This is an action to reform an insurance policy on grounds of mistake. Plaintiff owned a two-story, shingle roof, frame dwelling house in the city of Fresno, Cal., located in fire zone No. 1. A city ordinance provided that any structure in said zone which should be enlarged or altered to an extent exceeding 20 per cent. of its value should be made to comply completely with certain building requirements applicable to this zone. Plaintiff had a fire insurance policy in the amount of $4,975 on her building with North British & Mercantile Insurance Company, by the terms of which the company was liable only for the actual cash value of the loss, without allowance "for any increased cost of repair or reconstruction by reason of any ordinance or law regulating the repair or construction of buildings." Agents representing defendant company, soliciting plaintiff's business, explained that, if damage occurred which required rebuilding in compliance with the ordinance, she would suffer an additional loss not covered by her regular policy. Thereafter, on June 29, 1928, they procured for her a "Contingent Liability" policy in the sum of $3,000, which they represented would cover the said possibility of loss for which she was not already insured. This policy was renewed some years later.

On April 23, 1931, a fire damaged the property to the extent of $1,703, which sum was paid by North British & Mercantile Insurance Company. The city building inspector, finding that the building was worth $5,000, and consequently that there was over 20 per cent. loss, refused a permit to repair the damage. Plaintiff then furnished proof of loss to defendant company, and claimed a loss of $3,297, the difference between the value of the building ($5,000) and the amount paid by the other insurance company ($1,703). Defendant refused to pay the sum demanded, relying on a clause in its policy which provided that its liability "shall not exceed * * * such proportion of the actual value * * * of the property * * * as the amount of this policy bears to the total insurance covering on the property." Defendant computed its liability under this clause as $1,075.86, though on other grounds it refused to pay the same. Plaintiff then brought this action, alleging that she had secured the contingent policy in reliance upon the representation that it would fully cover the possibility of loss for which her other policy did not insure her. The evidence to this effect was clear and convincing, and the trial court reformed the instrument and gave judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, the limit of the policy.

[1-3] Defendant raises a number of points, none of which goes to the substantial merits of the cause, and they are deserving of only brief mention. It is contended that plaintiff was guilty of laches in seeking reformation, in that nearly six years passed before she sought the relief. The obvious answer is, of course, that not until the loss occurred, and the defendant made its position clear, did she discover the mistake, and then she acted with diligence. It is further contended that, by placing a deed of trust on the property, plaintiff violated the clause of the policy requiring "sole and unconditional ownership" by the assured. It has frequently been held that the giving of a mortgage or deed of trust does not violate such a clause. Lee v. United States Fire Ins. Co., 55 Cal. App. 391, 203 P. 774; Fox v. Connecticut Fire Ins. Co. (Mo. App.) 268 S. W. 393; 3 Cooley on Insurance, p. 2181. Finally it is argued that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff to amend her complaint after appeal was taken. The fact is that during the trial it was disclosed by the testimony that the present policy was a renewal of the one originally issued. Plaintiff thereupon asked the court for permission to amend on the face of the complaint, and proceeded to offer evidence on the issue. After judgment, and at the time of settlement of the transcript, it was discovered that by some inadvertence the amendment had not been made, and the court then made a nunc pro tunc order authorizing it. This was entirely proper, and defendant has in no way been prejudiced.

No other points require discussion. The judgment is affirmed.

PRESTON, Justice.

The question here is whether the evidence sufficiently supports the findings and whether the findings support the judgment.

The cause involves a controversy between half-sisters over a purported division of property made to them by their mother during her last illness, and it follows the general trend of a family quarrel with contradictory testimony given by the opposing parties.

Plaintiff seeks the cancellation of a deed made by the mother conveying certain real property to defendant, and in her complaint she alleged that at the time said deed was executed the mother was over seventy years of age, ill, infirm, of such unsound mind as to be wholly incapable of transacting business, and had for two days prior thereto been in a state of coma from which she never regained consciousness; that defendant, who lived with the mother until her death, well knew her condition, but, with the intention of cheating and defrauding plaintiff out of her share in said property, and taking advantage of the close and intimate relation with her mother, procured her to execute and deliver said deed without knowledge of plaintiff, and immediately placed it of record.

The cause was heard by the court sitting without a jury. It found that the mother had expressed her wish to the daughters that her property be divided, but that she gave no instructions as to how or in what manner the division was to be accomplished; that defendant, without conferring with plaintiff, and leaving plaintiff in ignorance of her action, caused said deed to be drawn and executed; that defendant took advantage of her close and intimate relation with her mother to deceive the mother into the belief that defendant and plaintiff had agreed upon execution of the conveyance; that the entire matter of procuring it was done clandestinely by defendant and with the intent on her part to cheat and defraud plaintiff out of her share of said property. Judgment followed for plaintiff. Defendant appealed upon the grounds first hereinabove mentioned.

The evidence shows that the relationship between these half-sisters had long been inharmonious; that defendant was closer to and more intimate with the mother, having lived at her home for many years, while plaintiff resided in a different part of the state; that in May, 1930, the mother was suffering from a fatal malady, and, about the time of her removal to the hospital, plaintiff arrived to see her; that the mother felt that she would not recover and took occasion to tell her daughters that she desired them to "make up" and "get along" and "settle everything in a peaceable manner." It is the claim of defendant that the mother also indicated that she wished her real property to be divided, and had planned that defendant should have the family home and that plaintiff should take two unimproved lots in Richmond, Cal. These parcels of real property, together with the furnishings in the home, personal belongings, and $3,700 in a savings account, constituted the mother's entire estate.

Defendant moved to the hospital with the mother, and was in constant attendance upon her save for a few hours each day, when she was relieved by plaintiff. Two days prior to the mother's death, to wit, on May 26, 1930, defendant, during her relief period, caused deeds to be prepared conveying to her the said home and to plaintiff the said lots. She then brought these documents back to the hospital with her; took plaintiff's place at her mother's bedside, but did not mention to plaintiff what she had done or what she contemplated doing with respect to said conveyances. After plaintiff left the hospital, and during the same afternoon, while the doctor and a nurse were present in the room, defendant exhibited the deeds to her mother, explained their purport, and the mother thereupon executed them as best she could, by making her mark thereon, and the doctor and the nurse witnessed them. After execution, the deeds were handed back to defendant, who laid them aside until she again saw plaintiff. She then delivered to plaintiff the deed to the Richmond lots, but plaintiff was not satisfied with this purported property division, and soon returned said deed to defendant. The deed to the home, the cancellation of which is here decreed, remained in the possession of defendant, and she recorded it shortly after the passing of her mother. Defendant could give no real explanation of her failure to advise plaintiff of her intention to secure the signature of the mother to these deeds or for her failure to ask plaintiff to remain during the consummation of the transfer.

It is not necessary to further detail the evidence. It suffices to say that the court was warranted in believing that defendant took advantage of her mother's condition and of their intimacy to deceive the mother and to defraud plaintiff. The allegations of the complaint in effect charge incompetency of the grantor, undue influence, fraud, and deceit. The findings do not follow the wording of these allegations, but they are full and complete, and in substance and effect definitely express the conclusion that the deed was procured as the result of fraud, undue influence, and deceit practiced by defendant. We have no hesitancy whatsoever in holding that the findings as drawn support the judgment, and that the evidence sufficiently supports the findings.

LANGDON, Justice.

This is an action to cancel a note and deed of trust given as security therefor. Plaintiffs, husband and wife, both unfamiliar with business transactions, were solicited by one F. Vergel De Dios, a salesman in the employ of defendant Interstate Guaranty Company, to buy an "undivided interest" in the said company for $500. Acting in reliance upon the false representations of De Dios that he would cause such interest to be transferred to them, they executed the note and deed of trust, De Dios signing the note as a joint maker. De Dios took the instruments to defendant company, which issued a check for $500 payable to plaintiffs, who thereupon indorsed them to De Dios. De Dios then delivered the check to defendant company, which took it and cashed it in payment of an alleged pre-existing indebtedness of his. It may be observed that Joseph Gonzalez denies signing the deed of trust, and Maria Gonzalez denies indorsing the check. However, these matters are immaterial in view of the other facts of the case.

[1] Plaintiffs were given judgment in the court below, canceling the note and deed of trust on grounds of fraud and failure of consideration. Appellants' contentions, that the pleadings failed to state a cause of action, and that the evidence does not support the findings, are devoid of merit. The false representation, a promise made without intention to perform it [see Masten v. Fox West Coast Theatres, 117 Cal. App. 303, 3 P.(2d) 610], is clearly established; so also is the reliance thereon, and the damage suffered. Failure of consideration is equally well established, for plaintiffs received nothing for their money.

[2] Defendant claims, however, that it is a bona fide purchaser of the note, for value, and without notice of the defects; that is, a holder in due course. But in the transaction through which it obtained the note it was represented by De Dios, and the value it gave was the satisfaction of his prior indebtedness. Under these circumstances, the knowledge of the fraudulent intentions of De Dios, defendant's agent, is imputed to defendant, his principal. McKenney v. Ellsworth, 165 Cal. 326, 132 P. 75; Live Oak Cemetery Association v. Adamson, 106 Cal. App. (Supp.) 783, 288 P. 29. Consequently, defendant cannot claim the rights of a bona fide purchaser without notice.

For this reason it is unnecessary to consider the question whether in California a payee of a negotiable instrument (in this case, the defendant) may be a holder in due course.

The judgment is affirmed.

PRESTON, Justice.

In this cause the trial court rendered judgment for defendants after sustaining their objection to the introduction of testimony upon the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. Plaintiff appealed.

The complaint alleged that on February 3, 1927, plaintiff became the owner of certain apartment house property, subject to a $65,000 incumbrance held by defendant Harry Feigenbaum under a deed of trust calling for payments to him of principal and interest at the rate of $600 a month; that on August 30, 1928, there was due and owing to said defendant $3,154 advanced by him for taxes and assessments on the property in addition to the $600 installment payable August 15, 1928; that plaintiff was physically and mentally ill, inexperienced in business, and financially embarrassed and said defendant, an experienced business man, induced her, through threats of a receivership and loss of her interest, to cause the property to be deeded to him in the name of his son and daughter-in-law (codefendants herein), in return for an option permitting plaintiff to purchase the property at any time up to January 2, 1929. The complaint further alleged that his deed was intended to be a mortgage, prayed that it be so adjudged, and that plaintiff have an accounting of defendants' management of the property.

The option agreement, made an exhibit to the complaint, shows that the property was subject to a first mortgage of $90,000 and said second incumbrance of $65,000, $51,200 of which remained unpaid; and that plaintiff should have the privilege of purchasing it within the above-mentioned period, subject to said incumbrances, upon payment to said codefendants of the sum of $7,753.61, which amount probably represents the aforesaid payments due defendant Harry Feigenbaum, in addition to payments of principal and interest falling due over the period of the option.

[1, 2] But said option agreement also shows that on August 30, 1928, the property was conveyed by one Marie K. Wheelock to defendants. Thus it conclusively appears that plaintiff neither had title to the property on that date, nor did she make the deed which she now claims was in reality a mortgage. Her connection with the conveyance, if any, is nowhere shown. The complaint merely alleges general ownership in plaintiff, and that she "caused" the deed to be made. How or when said Marie K. Wheelock acquired the property does not appear, nor is her relation to plaintiff explained. The terms of the trust deed and conveyance are not set forth. The option, on its face, is not an agreement to reconvey to the grantor, but an agreement to convey to plaintiff, a stranger to the deed. The insufficiency of the pleading is apparent. No request was made to amend. Therefore, the court properly sustained defendants' objection to the introduction of evidence and rendered judgment in their favor.

Suit for declaratory relief brought by plaintiff to have determined whether or not a lease entered into by the plaintiff as a tenant and the defendant as landlord had been renewed. Plaintiff contends that there had been no legal renewal of the lease, while the defendant makes a contrary contention. The lease was for a term of five years beginning on July 1, 1925, and provided for a monthly rental of $416.66. It contained a provision giving to the lessee "the right, privilege and option to renew this lease for a further period of five (5) years from and after the expiration thereof, to wit: from the first day of July, 1930, to the first day of July, 1935, upon the same term and conditions as are embodied in this lease except that the rental for said premises during all of said renewed term shall be the sum of Five Hundred Dollars per month, payable monthly in advance, and it is agreed that if the Lessee determines to exercise this option he shall give written notice of his decision so to do to the lessor, or to his agent, sixty (60) days prior to the date upon which this lease expires by its terms, and in the event that the Lessee decides to exercise this option and gives to the Lessor notice of his decision so to do sixty (60) days before the expiration of this lease, then the Lessor agrees to execute and deliver to the Lessee a written lease of said premises for said extra term of five (5) years at said rental of Five Hundred Dollars per month, such lease to have incorporated therein the same terms and conditions as are contained herein, except as to the amount of rental, which rental shall be at the rate of Five Hundred Dollars per month during all of the renewed term."

The lease covered a brick building fifty by one hundred feet in size situated at the northwest corner of Tenth and Harrison streets in the city of Oakland. The plaintiff, the tenant, remained in possession of said premises for the full term of five years, and paid all rent called for by the terms of said lease. He also continued in possession of said premises after the expiration of said five-year term. He gave no notice of his decision to exercise said option for a renewal of said lease before the expiration of said original term of five years, or at any time thereafter. He did, however, pay to his landlord after the expiration of said five-year term the increased rental to be paid by him in case the lease was renewed; that is, the sum of $500 per month each month from July 1, 1930, the date of the expiration of said original term of five years, to and including the 1st day of September, 1931. These monthly payments of rent the court found were made "on and in some instances within two or three days after the first day of each month commencing with July 1, 1930." They were made by checks drawn by plaintiff in favor of defendant, and to each check was attached a voucher containing the following notation: "Rental of northwest corner of 10th and Harrison Streets, Oakland, Cal. for the month [here was inserted the month and year of the payment] as per lease." These checks together with the attached vouchers were received and accepted by the defendant. The vouchers were detached from the checks, after which the checks were indorsed by the defendant, deposited by him in the bank, and were then returned to the plaintiff through the regular banking channels. Another fact to which some importance is attached—especially by the plaintiff—is that plaintiff, in addition to the premises above referred to, and on April 1, 1929, leased a storeroom belonging to defendant and adjoining the first mentioned premises. The monthly rental called for in this second lease was $125 payable monthly on the 1st day of each month. Plaintiff's checks after the effective date of this second lease included the monthly rental under both leases, and each check given prior to July 1, 1930, was for the combined sum of $416.66 and $125, or $541.66, and each check drawn on July 1, 1930, and thereafter, to and including September 1, 1931, was for the sum of $625. The two properties together constituted the northwest corner of Tenth and Harrison streets, and, as stated before, the rental of these combined properties was paid by one check for the aggregate amount of the monthly rental thereof.

After the payment and acceptance of the rent due September 1, 1931, the plaintiff brought this action, which its attorney terms "a friendly suit for declaratory relief between the tenant and landlord brought by the tenant to have it determined whether or not a lease has been renewed or not." A trial was had at which the two leases, the checks above referred to, together with said vouchers, were before the court. There was also oral testimony received, which was to the effect that plaintiff had never expressly notified defendant in writing, or otherwise, of its exercise of its option to renew said lease of July 1, 1925, and that no written renewal of said lease had ever been executed by the parties hereto. It was also shown by evidence that, after September 1, 1931, plaintiff continued to pay the rental upon said two pieces of property by check in the same amount and in the same manner as before September 1, 1931, except that the notations on the vouchers attached to these later checks did not contain, as did the prior vouchers, the words "as per lease." This course of dealing continued to some time in December, 1931, when the lease of April 1, 1929, expired because of the expiration of its term.

The trial court made findings and rendered judgment, and declared that said lease had by the acts of the parties been extended for a term of five years from July 1, 1930. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from said judgment.

The facts of the case are not in dispute. In the findings of the court, the facts as detailed above are fully and rather minutely set forth. In addition thereto, the court found as facts that the provisions in said lease requiring written notice of plaintiff's decision to exercise its option for a renewal of said lease, and for the making of a new lease for an additional term of five years, had been waived by the parties thereto and particularly by the defendant, for whose benefit said provisions were inserted in said lease.

Plaintiff insists that these findings of the court regarding waiver of these provisions of the lease are mere conclusions of law and have no place in the findings of fact. It is not always an easy matter to distinguish between findings of fact and conclusions of law. But, in the instant case, we think the question presented is not of material importance. As stated above, the facts of this case are fully and rather minutely set forth in the findings. A perusal of the findings will show that practically all the material evidentiary facts in this case are to be found fully set forth therein. Under these circumstances, it is of no consequence that the conclusions of the court regarding the waiver of the said provisions of the lease are made a part of the findings of fact rather than included in the conclusions of law. If we regard them as findings of fact, then their validity is to be determined by evidentiary facts found in other parts of the findings. If we regard them as conclusions of law, then they must stand or fall dependent entirely upon the facts as found by the court. In the instant case, the result would be the same whether we regard these matters as conclusions of law or as findings of fact. The one question to be determined is whether the provisions of the lease providing for a renewal have been waived by the parties to the lease.

The evidence shows that, at the expiration of the original term of five years, the plaintiff remained in possession of the leased premises and paid the increased rental provided for by the terms of the lease. The defendant after the expiration of the lease permitted the plaintiff to remain in possession of the premises and accepted from it the increased rental which was to be paid only in case the lease was renewed. This course of business continued for a period of more than a year without either party questioning the rights of the other. Were we considering this case from the standpoint of the rights of the tenant, we would be disposed to hold that the landlord, by accepting the increased rental and by permitting the tenant to remain and enjoy the possession of the leased premises, had waived the formalities prescribed in the lease in order to effect its renewal. We can see no reason why the same rule should not govern when applied to the rights of the landlord. Whether these provisions of the lease providing for its renewal were for the benefit of the landlord or the tenant is, in our opinion, a matter of no great consequence. Neither party expressly conformed to them, but both parties conducted themselves as if these provisions had been literally complied with. That the plaintiff considered that it was operating under the terms of a lease of the corner property may be inferred by the notation which it made on the vouchers attached to its checks. This notation, as we have seen, reads as follows: "Rental of northwest corner of 10th and Harrison Sts., Oakland, Cal., for the month of * * * as per lease." This inference is not entirely overcome by the fact that it also had a second lease covering the adjoining premises. The rental under this second lease was only $125 per month, while plaintiff's checks, after July 1, 1930, were each for the sum of $625. The notation on the voucher, "as per lease," could not have referred entirely to the second lease. As the amount of the checks to which the vouchers were attached covered the rental of both premises, we must conclude that the plaintiff in drawing these checks and vouchers had in mind both premises as being under lease by it from the defendant. This construction of the checks and vouchers is in harmony with the entire conduct of the plaintiff and the defendant as well, at the expiration of the original term of said lease, and for fifteen months thereafter. It seems clear to us from the evidence in the case, as expressed in the findings, that the parties intended to and did renew the lease for this additional term of five years, and that by their acts and conduct they waived the formalities provided in said lease for its renewal.

The plaintiff contends that such a determination of the question herein involved is contrary to the doctrine announced in the cases of Howell v. City of Hamburg Co., 165 Cal. 172, 131 P. 130, and Robertson v. Drew, 34 Cal. App. 143, 166 P. 838. We do not find anything in either of these cases at variance with our conclusion announced above. In the case of Howell v. City of Hamburg Co. the question at issue was whether a certain lease between the parties had been extended or renewed. It was conceded that the original lease was void, as its provisions contravened the terms of an ordinance of the city of San Francisco. Nevertheless, the parties thereto had operated thereunder during its original term. After occupying the premises for some months after the expiration of said term and paying the increased rental provided in said lease in case the lease was renewed, the defendant surrendered possession of the premises and removed therefrom. Plaintiff, the landlord, thereafter sued the defendant, the tenant, for three months' rental accruing after defendant had vacated said premises, on the theory that the lease had been renewed by the conduct of the parties. This court held that the provision in the lease giving the tenant the right to occupy the premises for an additional term after the expiration of the original term was an option to extend the lease and not to renew the lease for this additional term, and, as the original lease was void, there could be no valid extension of a void lease. Had the original lease been a valid lease, we apprehend that the court might have held that the parties by their acts and conduct had effected a valid extension thereof. In Robertson v. Drew, supra, the plaintiff leased the premises to the defendant for one year, with the privilege to defendant of renewing the lease for a further term of from one to five years. On the expiration of the original term, the tenant served written notice that he had elected to take the premises for a further term of two years. The landlord replied for the tenant to call "at the office and we will fix it up." The tenant did not call at the office of the landlord, and nothing further was done regarding the matter. The tenant remained in possession for a period of about six months, paying the rental, which under the renewal of the lease was to be the same as under the original lease. After the tenant vacated the premises, they remained unoccupied during the balance of said two-year term. The landlord then brought action to recover the rental for something like eighteen months, being the time intervening between the vacation of said premises by the tenant and the expiration of said two-year term. A judgment in favor of the tenant was affirmed; the court (at page 145 of 34 Cal. App., 166 P. 838, 839) holding that: "We think these circumstances negative the theory that the parties understood that the defendant was entitled upon mere notice, or by remaining in possession, to hold the premises for an additional period under the original lease." It will thus be seen that the court decided the question as to whether the lease had been renewed by what the court conceived to be the intention of the parties immediately following the expiration of the original lease. In the present case the trial court was of the opinion that the intention of the parties as expressed by their conduct after the expiration of the original term of the lease was to renew the lease upon the terms expressed therein. There is at least one important respect in which the present action differs from the case as presented in Robertson v. Drew, and that is that the plaintiff herein, the tenant, paid the increased rental required under the renewal. Another material circumstance present in this action is that the tenant has continued in possession of the leased premises paying this increased rental, and was so in possession of the property at the trial of the action. These facts differentiate this case from the case of Robertson v. Drew, and justify, in our opinion, the conclusion, no doubt in the mind of the trial court, that the parties to the lease by their acts and conduct following the expiration of the original term intended to renew the lease for an additional term, and that they waived the formal requirements provided in the lease for the renewal thereof.

The trial court went further and found that the plaintiff, by sending its check for the increased rental on July 1, 1930, together with the vouchers attached, thereby gave written notice of its election to exercise its option for a renewal of said lease. Plaintiff contends that, even if the check and voucher can be construed as written notice to the landlord of the tenant's intention to exercise said option, it was sent after the expiration of the original term, and was therefore ineffective for any purpose, citing Robertson v. Drew, supra, and other authorities recited in the opinion in that case. We are not basing our opinion in this case entirely upon said checks and vouchers, but upon the entire course of conduct and the business dealings of the parties thereto, following the expiration of said original term. As stated before, we consider that the acts and conduct of said parties during said period of time as strong evidence that the parties to said lease intended to and did renew said lease for an additional term of five years.

The judgment is affirmed.

RAGNO v. BOVET.

MORGAN v. RAGNO et al.

S. F. 14847.

Supreme Court of California.

July 29, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 28, 1933.

1. Automobiles ⇨244(10).

In collision action, evidence that defendant motorist was driving without lights over one and one-half hours after sunset, and was driving in middle traffic lane of bridge, lane to his right being free of traffic, held to sustain jury's implied finding of defendant's negligence.

2. Automobiles ⇨245(81).

As bearing on contributory negligence, whether deceased motorist turning into middle lane of lighted bridge could have seen defendant's unlighted car approaching held for jury under evidence.

3. Automobiles ⇨209.

Statute forbidding passing of vehicle on left side by driving to left side of highway unless left side is clearly visible held not violated by deceased motorist's passing stalled automobile, if defendant's approaching automobile was not visible because unlighted (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122, as amended by St. 1929, p. 540, § 50).

Requirement of St. 1923, p. 557, § 122, as amended by St. 1929, p. 540, § 50, was complied with by deceased if, at time he made turn to pass stalled automobile, he had clear vision of highway and all vehicles thereon within range of his lights, and if beyond that range he had clear vision of highway and all lighted vehicles thereon.

4. Automobiles ⇨172(2).

Words "oncoming traffic," within statute forbidding passing of vehicles by driving to left of highway, if left side is not free of "oncoming traffic" for sufficient distance ahead, held not to refer to on-coming vehicles illegally operated without headlights and hence not visible to others using highway (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122, as amended by St. 1929, p. 540, § 50).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Traffic," see Words & Phrases.]

5. Statutes ⇨189.

Literal interpretation of statutory language which would lead to absurd result should be avoided.

6. Automobiles ⇨245(81).

Whether deceased motorist, turning into middle traffic lane of bridge at 30 to 40 miles per hour to pass stalled car, and colliding head-on with defendant's unlighted automobile, was contributorily negligent, held for jury (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122, as amended by St. 1929, p. 540, § 50).

7. Automobiles ⇨206.

Motorist had right to presume that others using highway were performing duty in having machines properly equipped with headlights.

8. Negligence ⇨68.

In absence of reasonable grounds to think otherwise, it is not negligence to assume that one is not exposed to danger which can come only from violation of law or duty by another.

9. Evidence ⇨54.

Basing inference on inference held not permissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 1960).

10. Trial ⇨139(1).

Directed verdict for defendant was proper, where, in case of contrary verdict, judge would be compelled, under evidence, to grant defendant new trial.

11. Automobiles ⇨245(15).

Evidence held insufficient to take case to jury on theory that defendant motorist failed to signal when suddenly turning into middle traffic lane to pass stalled automobile, and thereby caused motorist following to swerve into extreme left lane and collide with automobile approaching from opposite direction.

CURTIS, Justice.

These are appeals from judgments in personal injury cases. All of the appeals arose out of litigation involving the same accident. The actions were consolidated for trial, and the appellants have brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The accident occurred on the San Mateo-Hayward bridge about 6:25 p. m. on the evening of November 13, 1930. The bridge runs in a general easterly and westerly direction, and has a railing 4 or 5 feet high on each side. It is 27 feet wide, and is divided into three lanes of equal width, the lines being indicated by six-inch markers. The bridge was lighted at the time of the accident with lights 210 feet apart staggered on opposite sides of the bridge. At the time of the accident a car occupied by the Joos family headed east was stalled in the southerly traffic lane. Although it was dark, the car was seen by the witnesses at a considerable distance. We will discuss this point in the case later in this opinion.

On the evening of the accident, Sylvester Robbiano and his brother-in-law, John Ragno, had been visiting in Redwood City and were returning to their homes in Oakland. Each had his separate car. Robbiano was driving a Buick; Ragno was driving a Nash. As they proceeded easterly across the bridge, Ragno was in front and Robbiano was following. They were in the south lane, and were traveling at a speed variously estimated at from 35 to 40 miles an hour. As they approached the Joos car, Ragno turned out into the middle lane, passed the parked car, and then returned to the south lane. Robbiano turned out to pass the Joos car, and as he did so another car was approaching from the east. The latter car was occupied by the defendant Louis A. Bovet and Miss Mabel Morgan. They were traveling 35 to 40 miles per hour in a Ford car. A head-on collision occurred between the Buick and the Ford cars. Whether the collision took place in the middle lane or the north lane, and the exact distance of the point of collision from the Joos car, were controverted facts. The collision was so violent that Robbiano suffered injuries from which he died. His widow and children commenced an action against Bovet. The latter answered and filed a cross-complaint against John Ragno as administrator of the estate of Robbiano and against John Ragno and Josephine Robbiano personally. John Ragno, as administrator of the estate of Sylvester Robbiano, filed a cross-complaint against the defendant. Mabel Morgan commenced a separate action against John Ragno and Josephine Robbiano. As above stated, the actions were consolidated for the purposes of the trial. The jury returned a verdict against the defendant Bovet. It also returned a verdict against Bovet and in favor of John Ragno as administrator of the estate of Sylvester Robbiano. From the judgments entered on the verdicts, the defendant Bovet has appealed. He also appealed from the order made by the trial court granting a nonsuit against him on his cross-complaint. But the latter appeal he abandoned in his opening brief. The trial court granted a nonsuit against Mabel Morgan in favor of Josephine Robbiano. It directed a verdict in favor of Ragno as against Mabel Morgan, and from the judgment entered thereon she has appealed.

Robbiano v. Bovet.

[1, 2] We will first consider the case brought by the widow and children of Robbiano against Bovet. The validity of the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in this action depends upon two propositions: First, the negligence of Bovet; and, secondly, if Bovet was negligent, the freedom of negligence on the part of Robbiano. It is not seriously contended that Bovet was not negligent, as there is direct evidence that at the time of the collision he was driving his car without lights over one hour and a half after sunset, and was also driving in the middle lane of the bridge; the lane to his right being free of traffic. The question of Bovet's negligence must be held to have been conclusively established. As to the claim that Robbiano was negligent, we have seen that the verdict of the jury was to the effect that he was not. The sole question, therefore, for us to decide is whether the evidence in the case shows that Robbiano was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. In the first place, in support of his contention that Robbiano was guilty of contributory negligence, the appellant claims that the evidence shows without any contradiction that Robbiano, had he exercised due care when he turned out of the right lane into the middle lane in order to pass around the stalled Joos car, could have seen the Bovet car even though it was traveling without lights. Appellant relies upon the testimony of Ragno and Lyons, two of respondents' witnesses, to substantiate this claim. Ragno testified that he saw the Joos car when he was a block or a block and a half from it, and that he turned to his left to go around it. Lyons testified that he saw the Joos car when he was a few blocks away. It seems to be agreed that, when the witnesses refer to a block, they have in mind a block 300 feet in length. Appellant argues that, if Ragno could see the Joos car a block and a half away, and Lyons could see the same car a few blocks away, Robbiano could see the Bovet car when he (Robbiano) made the turn into the middle lane to go around the Joos car. We do not think this conclusion necessarily follows from the testimony of these two witnesses, nor from any evidence in the case. As far as Lyons being able to see the Joos car "a few blocks away," the evidence shows that the Joos car was facing Lyons, and that its headlights were burning. That he could see the headlights of the Joos car at the distance stated is really no evidence as to the distance an unlighted car could be seen, or whether it could be seen at any substantial distance under the conditions prevailing on the evening at the scene of the collision. Referring to the testimony of Ragno that he saw the Joos car a block and a half away, and his further testimony that he could not see its tail-light for the reason that some one was standing between Ragno and this light, it might, at first blush, be considered as strong evidence that an unlighted car under the circumstances related could be seen for at least the distance of a block and a half, and therefore that Robbiano could have seen, had he looked, the car of Bovet, which was probably in the neighborhood of a block and a half away at the time Robbiano made the turn into the middle lane. However, there is one factor which appellant has not taken into consideration in arriving at the above conclusion, and that is, that the bridge was lighted at the time of the collision with lights 210 feet apart staggered on its opposite sides.

The evidence does not show but that the Joos car had stopped immediately under one of these lights. If it had, then it could be seen a greater distance than if it were some distance removed from any of these lights. The conditions may have been entirely different as to the location of the Bovet car at the time Robbiano made the turn into the middle lane. For aught the evidence shows, it may at that time have been some distance from any light, and in that case its visibility would have been much less than if it were directly under one of said lights. Under these circumstances, we think the jury were justified in inferring that Robbiano could not see the approaching Bovet car, and particularly would this be so where there was evidence before them from a number of witnesses that the night was dark. It was near the middle of November an hour and a half after sunset. There was no evidence that the moon was shining. Taking all these facts into consideration, we are of the opinion that there was no compelling evidence before the jury that would make it their duty to hold or find that Robbiano saw the Bovet car at the time he made the turn into the middle lane or thereafter in time for him to avoid the collision.

[3] This brings us to the main contention of the appellant, and that is, conceding that Robbiano did not see, and could not by the exercise of reasonable care have seen, the Bovet car in time to avoid the accident, nevertheless Robbiano was guilty of negligence in turning into the middle lane of the bridge while the Bovet car was being driven thereon, even though it was being driven without lights, and for that reason it was not visible to Robbiano. In support of this contention appellant relies upon section 122 of the California Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1929, p. 540, § 50, the applicable portions of which read as follows: "The driver of a vehicle shall drive the same upon the right half of the highway and close to the right hand edge or curb of such highway * * * except when overtaking and passing other vehicles, in which event the overtaking vehicle may be driven on the left side of the highway, if such left side is clearly visible and is free of on-coming traffic for a sufficient distance ahead to permit such overtaking and passing to be made in safety; and providing that such overtaking vehicles shall return to the right hand side of the highway before coming within one hundred feet of any vehicle approaching from the opposite direction." Appellant lays great stress upon that portion of this statute which we have italicized, and his contention is that Robbiano violated said section of the act by turning into the left lane when it was not clearly visible as required by said section, and when there was on-coming traffic thereon. That the violation of a statute is generally negligence as a matter of law may be conceded. But did Robbiano actually violate any of the terms of this statute? It is the position of the appellant that he did violate said section because the middle lane was not clearly visible, and further that it was not free of on-coming traffic for a sufficient distance ahead to permit such overtaking and passing to be made in safety. There is no evidence, nor even a reasonable inference from the evidence, that Robbiano at the time he made the turn to pass the Joos car did not have a clear vision of the highway and of all vehicles thereon within the range of his lights, and that beyond that range he did not have a clear vision of the highway and all lighted vehicles thereon. The only object on the highway of which he did not have a clear vision was the unlighted car of Bovet. Did the section of the act quoted above require Robbiano to see something which, under the conditions prevailing at the time he turned into the left lane, he could not see? We hardly think any one will contend that the Legislature intended any such impossible feat.

[4, 5] The further contention that Robbiano violated said section of the act by turning into the lane to his left when said lane was not free of on-coming traffic seems equally tenuous. The contention that said lane was not free of on-coming traffic is based solely upon the fact that Bovet's unlighted car was being operated thereon. Evidently the Legislature, when referring to "oncoming traffic" in this section, did not have in mind vehicles that were being illegally operated thereon without headlights, and which for that reason were not visible to others using the highway. To adopt the construction contended for by the appellant would render the passing of machines upon the highway at nighttime, no matter how slowly they be traveling, extremely hazardous if not practically impossible. No driver during the nighttime would be safe in turning to his left to pass a machine in front of him for fear that there might be some unlighted machine approaching him. One of the cardinal rules to be followed in the construction of a statute is that its language must be given a reasonable interpretation, and a literal interpretation should be avoided which would lead to absurd results.

"All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language, which would avoid results of this character." Extract from opinion of Mr. Justice Field in United States v. Kirby, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 482, 486, 19 L. Ed. 278.

In the case of People v. Ventura Refining Company, 204 Cal. 286, 290, 268 P. 347, 349, 283 P. 60, this rule is approved in the following language: "Where the interpretation claimed leads to injustice, oppression, or to absurd consequences, the general terms used in a statute will be limited in their scope so as to avoid such a result." Continuing on page 292 of 204 Cal., 268 P. 347, 350, the court further stated: "General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to an absurd consequence. People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69, 124 P. 887. * * * When a statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions, one leading inevitably to mischief or absurdity, and the other consisting of sound sense and wise policy, the former should be rejected and the latter adopted. San Joaquin & K. R. C. & I. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 128 P. 924."

"The fact that the enforcement of a statute according to its literal import will have the effect of prohibiting otherwise necessary and useful acts may also furnish an entirely sufficient reason for concluding that the intent of its framers was not that it should so operate." People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69, 72, 124 P. 887, 888.

The principle enunciated in the foregoing authorities not only justifies, but in our opinion compels, us to limit the phrase, "oncoming traffic" used in section 122 of the California Vehicle Act as referring to lighted vehicles, or those vehicles on the highway equipped with proper lights so that they are visible to others using the highway. Under this construction of the section of the act, it is clear that Robbiano was not guilty of violating the terms thereof in making the turn into the middle lane for the purpose of passing the Joos car.

[6-8] Neither do we think he was necessarily guilty of negligence in traveling at a speed of 30 to 40 miles per hour as the evidence tends to show he was traveling at the time he turned to pass the Joos car. Not only does the statute permit such rate of speed, but it is apparent that at the time he passed the Joos car he could see all visible objects on the highway in front of him. The only object not within his vision was the unlighted car of Bovet. The question of his negligence was therefore a question of fact for the jury. Robbiano had the right to presume that those using the highway in front of him were obeying the law and were performing their duty in having their machines properly equipped with headlights. "The general rule is that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and in the absence of reasonable grounds to think otherwise, it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which can come to him only from violation of law or duty by such other person." 29 Cyc. 516; Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 137 P. 1078; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 58, 161 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Moreno v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 44 Cal. App. 551, 186 P. 800.

Other questions were presented and discussed in the briefs of the parties. These questions were fully considered in the opinions rendered by the District Court of Appeal when this cause was before that court. While the decision of the District Court of Appeal has been set aside by the order of transfer to this court, the discussion of those questions by the District Court of Appeal convinces us that they were not of sufficient consequence to entitle them to any detailed consideration by this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ragno, as Administrator, etc. v. Bovet.

This action, as we have already seen, was brought by the plaintiff as the administrator of the estate of Robbiano, deceased, to recover damages for the injury to the machine of said decedent by reason of said collision. The decision herein is controlled by and must follow that in the case of Robbiano v. Bovet.

The judgment is affirmed.

The other two cases herein involved were also before the District Court of Appeal, and opinions were rendered by said court in each of said cases. We are in complete accord with said opinions, and hereby approve and adopt them as the opinions of this court. They are as follows:

Morgan v. Ragno.

"The plaintiff asserts that the action of Mabel Morgan against John Ragno was based upon the contention that Ragno in passing the parked Joos car suddenly swerved to the left, thereby causing Robbiano, driving behind him at great speed, in order to avoid hitting the Joos and Ragno cars, to swerve into the north lane and collide with the Bovet car. In her closing brief she reinforces her contention by asserting that, when Ragno made the turn around the Joos car he gave no signal.

"In her complaint with much care the plaintiff alleged the positions of the different cars on the bridge immediately before the accident. She alleged that Robbiano was following Ragno three car lengths in the rear. Continuing she alleged: '* * * And said Ragno as he was near the point of the passage of the automobile being driven by him in an easterly direction to his right of said Bovet, driving his Ford automobile in a westerly direction as aforesaid, observed another automobile parked upon said bridge partially to the right of said Ragno's automobile and partially in the path of said Ragno's automobile, as it was then being driven by Ragno, and that in order safely to attempt to pass said parked automobile, said Ragno suddenly and without warning to any person slowed the speed of his Nash automobile and swerved towards the middle of the lane of traffic upon said bridge, whereupon the said Robbiano, driving said Buick automobile, in order to pass at an excessive speed between said Bovet's automobile and the said Ragno's automobile, swung the said Buick automobile to said Robbiano's left of said Ragno's automobile in a careless and negligent manner and in so doing ran into and collided with said Bovet's Ford automobile proceeding westerly on said bridge and on said Bovet's right-hand side of said bridge as above set forth.' Those allegations were denied in the defendants' answer. On the trial no witness testified that at any time Robbiano overtook, and attempted to pass, Ragno. The witnesses testified without conflict that Ragno was at all times ahead, and Bovet testified the Ragno car at no time interfered with him. No witness testified Ragno slowed down his car until after the accident. No witness testified the accident occurred when the Ragno car, the Bovet car, and Robbiano's car were at the same instant attempting to pass each other and to pass the Joos car. The witnesses Morgan, Bovet, and Lyons each testified they saw the Ragno and the Robbiano cars when they were as much as three-quarters of a mile away. No witness testified that Ragno did not give a signal before attempting to pass the Joos car. Bovet testified he did not see a signal if one was given. The plaintiff called Ragno as a witness. The defendants also called him as a witness. He was examined and cross-examined; nevertheless he was not asked whether he gave a signal or did not give one. The plaintiff was called as a witness in her own behalf, and testified that she was at all times looking directly ahead. The witness Lyons also testified that he was at all times looking at the movements of the Ragno car and the Robbiano car. Neither witness testified that Ragno did not give a signal.

[9-11] "As we understand the brief of the plaintiff, her reasoning is that the witness Bovet testified he did not see Ragno signal. Relying solely on that proved fact, she contends that it will be inferred Ragno did not signal; that it will then be inferred Robbiano did not know Ragno was going to make the turn; that it will be inferred Robbiano did not see the Bovet car coming from the east; and therefore that Ragno caused the acts of Robbiano. In the absence of more facts legally proved, that line of reasoning is not permissible. Code Civ. Proc. § 1960. When the defendants made a motion for a directed verdict, the record does not disclose that the plaintiff called to the attention of the trial court the theory which she now presents. In ruling on the motion, the trial court remarked: 'If the case went to the jury on the present testimony and the jury found against Ragno I would be compelled on motion for a new trial to grant it as to him.' The court applied the proper rule. Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 473, 123 P. 267. We think it did not err in applying the rule to the facts before it."

The judgment is affirmed.

Bovet v. Ragno.

"In this action, as stated above, the trial court ordered a nonsuit in favor of the defendant upon Bovet's cross-complaint. While the cross-complainant appealed, nevertheless he admitted error in his opening brief and has not pressed the appeal."

The judgment of nonsuit should be, and therefore is, affirmed.

Action by E. E. Kelly and Alice H. Kelly against Esther Smith and another, wherein the named defendant filed a cross-complaint, and action by Esther Smith against E. E. Kelly and Alice H. Kelly which were consolidated for trial. From two separate judgments for E. E. Kelly and Alice H. Kelly, Esther Smith appeals.

Judgments affirmed.

Thomas Butler, of Watsonville Junction, for appellants.

Louis B. De Avila, of Oakland, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

On January 6, 1927, the respondents Kelly and wife agreed to sell to the appellant certain real property located in Watsonville, together with the improvements thereon for the sum of $24,000, payable $5,500 cash, $600 on April 6, 1927, and $600 every six months thereafter until the whole was paid, together with interest on deferred payments at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, interest payable quarterly. The written instrument evidencing the contract of the parties required appellant to provide fire insurance, and in the exact language thereof said she would "cause the improvements on said premises to be insured against loss by fire, in the sum of $4000.00, loss if any payable to the parties hereto as their interests may appear, and pay all premiums to become due on account of said insurance. In the event that said second party shall fail to effect said insurance as hereinabove provided, first [party] may purchase said insurance and charge the cost thereof to the said second party. The premiums on said insurance to be added to the next instalment of principal or interest to become due on account of this agreement, and be paid therewith." The appellant entered into possession of the premises under the agreement. On October 6, 1929, she made default in the payment of the installment of principal and interest due on that date amounting to $841.50. On December 6, 1929, a fire destroyed one of the buildings, which was insured for the sum of $2,000, the policy being made payable, in case of loss, to appellant and respondents and the Bank of Italy Savings & Trust Association, as their interests might appear. The banking concern had loaned some money on the property, the note therefor having been signed by both the Kellys and Mrs. Smith.

In order to clarify the situation with respect to the proceeds of the policy, it is necessary to recite that appellant was leasing from respondents other and different property for hotel purposes, and, according to the claim of respondents, was in default in her payments of rental therefor. Regardless of the merits of that contention, which was not tried in either of the present cases, the respondents caused an attachment to be levied upon the interests of appellant in the proceeds of the policy amounting to the sum of $1,300, that being the amount at which the loss by fire was adjusted.

During the latter part of January, or the early portion of February, the fire chief of Watsonville notified Mr. Kelly, one of the respondents, that the burned improvements constituted a fire hazard, and that the building would have to be razed and the debris removed. Kelly replied that the matter should be referred to Mrs. Smith, as she was the owner of the property. Consequently, on February 17, 1930, the fire chief sent a similar notice to her, inclosing a copy to Kelly. Thereafter, in a conference between them, Mrs. Smith informed Kelly that a Mr. Whitsett had a man named Manning who would do the work for the lumber he could salvage. Mr. Whitsett had been representing Mrs. Smith as a real estate agent. Mr. Kelly instructed his representative, a Mr. Taylor, to contact Mr. Whitsett for the purpose of having the buildings razed by Mr. Manning. This was done, and during the early part of March, 1930, the partially destroyed building was torn down and the debris removed. On February 16, 1930, Mrs. Smith being still in default and having also failed to pay the installment of interest due on January 6, 1930, the respondent Kelly served a notice on her requiring her to fulfill all the covenants of the contract and to pay the delinquencies mentioned, together with certain unpaid taxes on or before April 16, 1930, or, in the event of her failure so to do, he would forthwith forfeit and cancel the contract and all her rights thereunder. Appellant made no payment, and on April 18, 1930, respondents Kelly commenced the first action involved herein to quiet title to the property. The appellant Smith answered, denying that her claim was without right and alleging the contract, and by way of cross-complaint she alleged that there had been a complete failure of consideration for three reasons, as follows: (1) The failure of respondents to either repair the building or credit her with the proceeds of the fire insurance, (2) the tearing down of the improvements without her consent, and (3) the disposal of the materials realized from razing the buildings without her consent, and sought recovery of the sum of $12,500 which she said she had paid on account of the contract. The second action was commenced by Mrs. Smith, alleging that the buildings were torn down without her consent, and the rentals she had been receiving thereby caused to cease, and that the consideration for the contract had entirely failed, and praying for judgment in the sum of $12,011.85.

The actions were consolidated and judgment entered for plaintiffs in the quiet title action and against defendant upon her cross-complaint, and another judgment denying any recovery to the appellant, the plaintiff in the second cause of action. Two appeals are prosecuted from the judgments so entered.

In brief, the court found that appellant had made default in the payment of installments under the contract, and had thereby forfeited all right to the property and to the moneys theretofore paid on account of the contract, and, in substance, that the default had occurred October 6, 1929. Also it was found that respondents had not entered upon the property and razed the buildings without appellant's consent, but that the entry and work of destruction and removal of the debris was expressly consented to, authorized, and directed by Mrs. Smith. It was further found that appellant had elected to and had affirmed the contract by filing, on April 11, 1930, an action based on her ownership and possession of the real property (the subject of the contract) to recover from the respondents here and the city of Watsonville damages aggregating $30,250, for alleged trespass upon the property and the razing of the buildings, which said action, at the time of the trial herein involved, was still pending in so far as the respondents were concerned. There is also a finding that the destroyed buildings formed no material inducement to Mrs. Smith, for the execution of the agreement, but that said improvements were old and of no value whatsoever.

The appellant contends that she was not in default under the contract because strict compliance therewith had been waived by respondents by the acceptance previously of late payments, and that the notice to perform was not sufficient to require prompt payment by her, and that the partial destruction of the building, followed by its demolition, constituted a failure of consideration.

[1-4] The evidence does not disclose a waiver by the respondents of the terms of the contract. But we cannot agree that the default which is found to have occurred on October 6, 1929, worked a forfeiture of her rights under the contract. The exact language of the agreement in this particular is as follows: "It is further understood and agreed that should the said second party fail to make any payment at the time and in the manner hereinbefore agreed, or fail to perform any covenant and condition on her part to be paid, kept and performed, then the said parties of the first part may terminate all the rights of second party under this agreement by notice personally served on the said second party, or mailed to her by registered mail addressed to her at Watsonville, California, and may re-enter upon said premises and remove all persons therefrom." Under this stipulation of the parties a notice of forfeiture was required which was not given until February 16, 1930, demanding performance on or before April 16, 1930. We entertain no doubt that the notice was sufficient to accomplish the desired purpose upon the expiration of the date specified. But it must also follow that there was no forfeiture or any attempted forfeiture prior to the expiration of the time designated. Hence, we are compelled to inquire into the effect of the fire upon the contract of the parties. We may ignore the effect, if any, of the subsequent demolition of the buildings, because upon substantial testimony the court found that Mrs. Smith had consented thereto. We cannot, in like manner, accept the finding of the court that the buildings were old and of no value whatsoever and formed no material inducement to Mrs. Smith to enter into the contract. True, it is, according to the testimony, that the buildings were very old. Likewise, Mr. Kelly gave it as his opinion, while testifying, that the property was just as valuable, if not more so, with the buildings destroyed as with them standing. Yet the fact remains that Mrs. Smith had been receiving $100 a month rental therefrom and the insurance company adjusted the loss at $1,300. It is obvious therefore that they were valuable as income producers and also had considerable intrinsic worth. We are therefore faced with the question of whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the loss of the property by fire should fall upon the vendor so as to enable the vendee to rescind or at least to be entitled to a credit upon the payments due upon her contract. Had the legal title to the premises been conveyed to appellant at the time of the contract, and respondents accepted back a mortgage or deed of trust for the balance of the purchase price, there would be no question. It would readily be admitted that the loss should fall upon the holder of the legal title. Nor can it be gainsaid that the reservation of title in this particular case was designed to serve the same economic purpose as a mortgage or deed of trust. There is therefore strong reason, as was recently indicated in the case of Bank of Italy v. Bentley (Cal. Sup.) 20 P.(2d) 940, 945, why the law applicable to the rights, duties, and responsibilities of the parties should be the same, rather than being made to depend upon "the more or less accidental form of the security." Further, it is to be remembered that the parties to the contract contemplated the possibility of the destruction of the buildings by fire, and, in order to safeguard themselves against such contingency, included a provision in the contract that the vendee should cause the buildings to be insured against fire and pay the premiums therefor. In other words, the vendor by such requirement indicated a plain intent, accepted by the vendee, that he was not expected to bear the loss. In view of these facts, we should have no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion which would be in harmony with most of the jurisdictions of the country, were this a case of unquestioned first impression. However, there are authorities in our own state that must be critically examined. We may summarily dismiss the case of Smith v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 91 Cal. 323, 27 P. 738, 13 L. R. A. 475, 25 Am. St. Rep. 191, by calling attention to the fact that the question there involved was whether a lease of a building for hotel purposes, for a term of five years, at a fixed rental and an option to purchase at the end of the term with possession in the lessee, constituted such a change of title as to avoid an insurance policy made payable to the owner—where, at the time the insurance was written, the insurance company had knowledge that the building was being erected with the intent of leasing it for hotel or rooming house purposes. The court answered the question in the negative, but it is interesting to note from a reading of the case that the opinion was rendered upon rehearing, and that the first conclusion was to the contrary. We note the case and the real question involved therein at this juncture because of the reference to it in subsequent authorities. Perhaps we ought also to observe that the District Court of Appeal, in Pinkböhner v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 6 Cal. App. 379, 92 P. 318, 321, viewed the Phoenix Case in the same light as we have just indicated, taking occasion to quote therefrom as follows: "For the purpose of this decision, it is sufficient to say that no case has been cited, and we have discovered none, in which the vendee has been held bound to pay the purchase price where a valuable part of the property has been destroyed before the day fixed for payment and conveyance, unless he has taken possession under the contract of sale or has the right to such possession under the contract before the occurrence of the loss."

Next we refer to Conlin v. Osborn, 161 Cal. 659, 120 P. 755, 760, in which case the contract was not consummated, nor had a change of possession occurred, but the vendee had borrowed from the vendor an abstract of title for use in having the title searched, and prior to the expiration of the time allowed for that purpose the improvements on the property were burned down in the great conflagration of 1906 in San Francisco. It was held that the loss fell on the seller and that there was a failure of consideration. The court, however, approved the reception of evidence relating to possession in these words: "The questions relating to possession were proper, however, because possession by a vendee is sometimes evidence that the parties consider the contract substantially completed and plaintiff was seeking to show that there was no basis for any such presumption in this case."

The case of Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 104 P. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609, is entirely beside the question here involved, although general expressions are therein contained which would seem to bear upon the problem. In that case there was an assignment of a leasehold with intent to then and there vest title in the assignee, and, although the assignor retained possession for a short period during which the premises were destroyed by fire, it was held that the loss fell upon the assignee, he being the owner of the title to the leasehold estate.

Higbie v. Shields, 27 Cal. App. 536, 150 P. 801, is to be classified with Conlin v. Osborn, supra. The contract was wholly executory and possession had not been delivered. The loss was held to fall upon the vendor, the court basing its opinion almost exclusively upon the fact that possession had not changed.

In Wong Ah Sure v. Ty Fook, 37 Cal. App. 465, 174 P. 64, the vendee, under a contract which called for payments subsequent to the initial one, was held to be entitled to recover the value of reconstructing a burned building, but in that case the court found an agreement on the part of the vendor immediately following the fire that, if the vendee would rebuild, he would be allowed by the vendor the cost of reconstruction. A like special agreement was involved in LaChance v. Brown, 41 Cal. App. 500, 183 P. 216.

In Kirtley v. Perham, 176 Cal. 333, 168 P. 351, personal property was sold, but title reserved until the total purchase price was paid. Upon the authority of many of the cases already examined, it was held that the loss fell upon the seller, although the court quoted from Mr. Williston's treatise on Sales to the effect that the majority rule is contrary, upon the theory that the rule in this jurisdiction was established. The case, however, is no longer of any authority, for the reason that the rule was changed by legislative enactment in 1931 (St. 1931, p. 2242). Section 1742, Civil Code, now reads in part as follows: "Unless otherwise agreed, the goods remain at the seller's risk until the property therein is transferred to the buyer, but when the property therein is transferred to the buyer the goods are at the buyer's risk whether delivery has been made or not, except that: (a) Where delivery of the goods has been made to the buyer, or to a bailee for the buyer, in pursuance of the contract and the property in the goods has been retained by the seller merely to secure performance by the buyer of his obligations under the contract, the goods are at the buyer's risk from the time of such delivery." It will be observed that this legislative enactment is in keeping with the extensive use of the so-called conditional sales contract and the great expansion of credit which has accompanied it. The same reasons which prompt the application of the majority rule respecting risk of loss in California to personal property ought to be given consideration when considering the loss of improvements to real property. Besides bearing in mind the great development of trade through the medium of such contracts with reservations of title as security, we ought to consider upon whose shoulders devolves the responsibility of so caring for the property that fire will not occur, and how improper care will contribute to the hazard thereof.

The observations just indulged bring us to a consideration of the case of Cooper v. Huntington, 178 Cal. 160, 172 P. 591, 592, in which case the Coopers (a mother and son) purchased from defendants ten acres of land of which four were washed away by a flood. The case originally grew out of misrepresentations respecting the available water supply for the property. After the filing of the complaint for fraud the parties arranged for a settlement, and a check was given by plaintiffs, but payment thereon was stopped because the flood came and washed away the soil from the four acres. And in order to minutely observe the distinction drawn by the court we quote the following sentence: "We are of the opinion that before partial consummation of this contract by a payment of any of the purchase price under it, the Coopers were in a position to withdraw from it." This language was followed later on in the opinion by saying that the statements in Conlin v. Osborn, supra, "* * * did not amount to a decision that under no contract may there be a failure of consideration, of which a vendee in possession may avail himself." Whatever comfort appellant might otherwise find in the case just discussed is largely dissipated by that of McCarty v. Wilson, 184 Cal. 194, 193 P. 578, 580, also involving erosion. It is there said: "Defendant finally insists that he is excused from performance by the circumstance that the property suffered a 10 per cent. depreciation in value by reason of a flood occurring between the time of the confirmation of the sale and the date of the commencement of the action. Bearing in mind that prior to the injury to the property defendant was in equity the owner of the land; that he was unquestionably entitled to the possession of the land under the contract with the estate, and that he had actually gone upon the land with men and teams and done about $1,700 worth of grading, we have no doubt that the risk of loss was upon him." In denying a petition for rehearing it was said the fact that the entire purchase price became due upon the confirmation of the sale distinguished it from cases relied upon by petitioner. We have already discovered, however, from the analysis of all the prior cases, it was not out of harmony with them.

We now come to the case which is most nearly in point; that of Lubarsky v. Chavis, 99 Cal. App. 610, 279 P. 205, 207. There a complaint in two counts, its first framed on fraudulent representations for rescission, and the second alleging failure of consideration arising by reason of the destruction by fire of a house on the property and asking that the agreement be rescinded, was filed. A demurrer was sustained, and, upon plain-tiff's refusal to amend, judgment was entered for defendant. On appeal it was reversed, the court saying that the first count was sufficient, and also deciding, solely upon the authorities heretofore discussed, that the loss fell upon the vendor, even where the possession was in the vendee. The case cannot be considered as authoritative upon the point here, for the reason that the conclusion is founded upon the following language used in referring to Conlin v. Osborn, supra: "The vendor had not yet delivered possession, but that fact has not been considered a distinguishing circumstance in California. The case has been followed where the vendee was in possession and where title had not passed." We have already ascertained that the reason cited for the conclusion does not in fact exist. We also direct attention to an article by Professor Cockerill in 1 Southern California Law Review, 399-321, where many of the cases heretofore mentioned are reviewed, and it is pointed out that they do not in fact depart from the doctrine, the conclusion of the writer being stated as follows: "No criticism is intended to be made of the decisions in the cases discussed. They are, it is believed, correctly decided on their respective facts. The suggestion made is only that, disregarding the loss, the vendor was not entitled in any of them to a decree for specific performance. If this distinction be admitted the doctrine of equitable conversion was in no way involved."

The discussion of the prior decisions should not be closed without a reference to Owen v. Pomona Land & Water Co., 131 Cal. 530, 63 P. 850, 856, 64 P. 253, which case involved the sale of land and water stock, with possession in the vendee during the completion of the contract. The water supply failed, and the purchaser sought to rescind on the ground of failure of consideration as well as for other reasons. With respect to the contention regarding the water this court said: "Whether or not, in the final adjustment of this controversy, it may be held that the plaintiff can claim or recoup damages for any actual failure of the supply of water which his stock purported to represent,—a point as to which we express no opinion,—it is certain that the failure which occurred was not a cause for rescission. If this part of the consideration for plaintiff's obligation failed in any degree, the failure was due to no fault of the defendant, and so was not a ground of rescission." (Italics ours.)

There can be no doubt about the rule generally. In a note to Sewell v. Underhill (197 N. Y. 168, 90 N. E. 430, 134 Am. St. Rep. 863, 18 Ann. Cas. 795) 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 233, will be found a citation of numerous authorities to the proposition that the loss falls upon the vendee in those cases where in equity the vendee becomes the owner of the property. Reference may also be made to Good v. Jar- rard, 93 S. C. 229, 76 S. E. 698, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 383, and note thereto. See, also, article by Professor Vanneman, 8 Minnesota Law Review, 127. Some differences of opinion will be found to exist with respect to those cases where the vendee is not in possession, but where the vendee is in possession, enjoying the entire beneficial use of the property, having acquired an estate which he may convey or incumber, and which to all intents and purposes is his; the great majority of opinion holds that the loss should fall upon him, such being the manifest intent of the parties where title is retained solely as security. And, in view of the insurance provision in this case, it should be particularly true. And this result is arrived at not by the legerdemain involved in the doctrine of equitable conversion so much as it is by the contract and the manifest purpose of the parties. By which we conclude that appellant was not entitled to rescind, by reason of the partial destruction of the premises by fire. This conclusion renders further discussion unnecessary.

POHL v. MILLS et al.

Sac. 4485.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 1, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 31, 1933.

1. Contracts ⇨259.

If party would not have entered into contract except for a material misrepresentation, he is entitled to rescind and to be placed as nearly as possible in original position.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨34(5).

Evidence in action to rescind showed that lessors of roadside stands with option to lessee for perpetual renewal falsely represented that structures were protected by copyright, and that such misrepresentations were inducing cause of leases.

3. Contracts ⇨99(1).

Where misrepresentations were calculated to induce making of contract, presumption is that they did, and nonreliance in fact must be shown to defeat relief for fraud.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨34(5).

Evidence in action to rescind for fraud showed that lessee of roadside stands which lessors falsely represented were protected by copyrights was not afforded opportunity to examine papers in connection with alleged copyright.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨28(1).

Caveat emptor did not apply where lessors of roadside stands falsely represented that they were protected by copyrights, and did not show lessee copyright papers which would have disproved their claim.

6. Contracts ⇨94(3).

Whether material misrepresentation was made with intent to deceive is immaterial, where it induced contract to injury of another.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇨28(1).

Where lessors of roadside stands knew that copyright had been refused for structure, copyright of photograph of structure could not afford reasonable basis for honest belief that such copyright protected structure itself so as to warrant representation to lessee that structure was copyrighted.

8. Landlord and tenant ⇨28(1).

Where lessors knew that copyright of roadside stand had been refused, it was their duty to so advise lessee instead of representing that stand was protected by copyright when only photograph of stand was copyrighted.

9. Fraud ⇨17.

Though one may be under no duty to speak, if he undertakes to do so, he is bound to speak truly without suppression of known material facts.

10. Landlord and tenant ⇨34(2).

Lessee of roadside stands with option for perpetual renewal held entitled to rescind for lessors' false representation that stands were protected by copyright, though no competitor had used similar stand.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action by F. E. Pohl against James Mills, Jr., sometimes known as James Mills, and Robert A. Rankin, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Jumbo Lemon Company, and the Jumbo Lemon Company, who filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

For prior opinion, see 17 P.(2d) 1059.

W. T. Belieu, of Willows, and Percy S. Webster, of Stockton, for appellant.

R. M. Rankin, of Willows, Wm. S. Graham, of San Francisco, and Marvin J. Rankin, of Red Bluff, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought by plaintiff for the purpose of rescinding four separate contracts for the leasing by him, with the option of perpetual renewal, of four roadside booths for the dispensing of nonintoxicating drinks, known as "Jumbo Lemons," together with the exclusive territorial right to operate said Jumbo Lemons in the district designated in each separate contract. Plaintiff claims the right to rescind and cancel said contracts because of certain alleged misrepresentations and fraud practiced upon him by defendants which induced him to enter into said contracts. Defendants filed a cross-complaint alleging that the repudiation of said contracts constituted a breach thereof. Judgment went for the defendants who were awarded damages in the sum of $2,917 with costs. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

In 1924, James Mills, Jr., and Robert A. Rankin, employees of the James Mills Orchard Company, a large grower of lemons and other citrus fruit, built and operated what they termed a "Jumbo Lemon," which was a structure some twelve feet long and about six feet in diameter, shaped to resemble a lemon and painted a lemon color, and having in all respects the general appearance of a giant lemon. It was intended as a roadside booth for the dispensing of nonintoxicating drinks, and soft drinks were sold through openings in each side by an operator who worked inside of the structure. In 1925, the two defendants formed a partnership for the purpose of building and operating Jumbo Lemon booths and leasing them to operators. Application was made by the attorneys for said partners for a patent on the design of the booth. This application was rejected upon the ground that it was no invention, the design being merely a simulation of a well-known object. The rejection of the patent was brought to the knowledge of the partners in January, 1925, by a letter from the patent attorneys handling the application. Shortly thereafter an application was made for a copyright of the structure itself. Apparently, even before the application was made, one at least of the partners was representing that the structure was a copyright structure as the following letter, dated February 5, 1925, was written by James Mills, Jr., to the attorneys in San Francisco: "We have your letter of the 3d concerning the Jumbo Lemon Sales Booth. If it is impossible for us to patent or copyright the design of the lemon booth could we copyright the title 'Jumbo Lemon?' We are contemplating establishing a line of these stands and do not wish to start business going and then have others in the position of being able to duplicate both the stand and the name and cut into the business. Several have asked how the lemon was constructed already and stated that they contemplated putting some in, and we by telling them the same was copyrighted have sidestepped the issue to date." (Italics supplied.) On July 7, 1925, the attorneys notified the partners that the application to register a copyright for the "Jumbo Lemon" sales booth had preliminarily been rejected upon the ground that a sales booth which was lemon shaped in configuration was not a work of fine art, and suggested that an application for a registration of a photograph of the booth be made. The partners were informed on August 6, 1925, that the application for a copyright of the booth itself had been finally rejected. The only procedure possible, therefore, was a registration of a photograph of the booth, and this was done, and on August 25, 1925, a certificate of copyright registration was issued in the name of James Mills, Jr. The certificate stated, "This is to certify * * * that one copy of the photograph named herein, not reproduced for sale, has been deposited in this Office under the provisions of the Act of 1909, and that registration of a claim to copyright for the first term of 28 years, has been duly made in the name of James Mills, Jr. * * * Title of Photograph Jumbo Lemon Booth. * * * " Thereafter the partners commenced to establish a chain system of these booths throughout the state of California. The Jumbo Lemon booths were leased to persons interested by written lease contracts, four of which contracts are involved in this action. In November, 1926, the plaintiff negotiated with the defendants for the leasing of four of the structures to be operated at or near Gilroy, Kings City, Redwood City, and Paso Robles, Cal.

The contracts are in writing and are in evidence. They are identical in form and substance except for the fact that each of said contracts specifies a different territory granted for the operation of said booths. The contracts commence with the statement that: "Whereas the lessors are the owners of the exclusive right to maintain and operate Jumbo Lemons, a form of roadside stand for mixing and dispensing nonintoxicating drinks, which Jumbo Lemon is a structure copyrighted by James Mills, and lessors are establishing a chain of said Jumbo Lemons throughout the State of California and other states to operate the same through lease contracts, and to maintain a standard system of operation, and whereas the lessee is desirous of operating one of said stands at or near [specifying the location of the stand] upon the terms and conditions imposed by the lessors and hereinafter set forth; Now Therefore, * * * the lessors hereby let and lease to said lessee and lessee hereby hires and takes from lessors one of the said Jumbo Lemons, together with the right to maintain and operate the same at a location in or near said above described city." The contracts then set forth the obligations of the lessors, the most important being: (1) To place upon the location secured by the lessee one of said Jumbo Lemon structures completely equipped, and (2) to sell and deliver all lemons, oranges, other fruits and nut products to be used by lessee in said business and to charge therefor prices which would not exceed the wholesale prices of fruit of like grade and quality at San Jose. (In this regard it was set forth that the lessors had contracted with the James Mills Orchards Corporation to supply lemons, oranges, and other fruits and nuts for the use of the lessors in operating their chain of Jumbo Lemons, and when the supply from that source was not available the lessors could at their option discontinue the purchase of supplies from other sources and lessee should make his own arrangements for supplying lemons, oranges, and other fruits and nuts.) Then follows a statement of the obligations of the lessee, the principal ones being: (1) To pay to the lessor for said structure and equipment, and the right to operate the same at the location selected by him, $1,200, payable in installments; to pay for the transporting, delivering, and locating of said lemon structure, and to pay in addition, for the seasons commencing with 1928, a royalty of 6 per cent. on the gross income from the proceeds of said business; (2) to lease a lot for the location of said structure; (3) to keep the grounds, the structure, and equipment clean, neat, and attractive, and in every way co-operate with the lessors in standardizing Jumbo Lemon system; (4) to purchase from the lessors all lemons, oranges, and other fruits and nuts which might be used in said business; (5) "to operate and keep open said Jumbo Lemon each season as long as weather conditions permit the operations thereof at a profit to the lessee"; (6) to keep the Jumbo Lemon structure and equipment painted and in good repair and condition, and during the closed season to properly protect it against damage and loss, and at the end of the term or sooner termination of said lease to deliver up said structure and all equipment in good condition; and (8) to furnish the lessors with a correct statement of the accounts of said business. The contracts expressly provide that: "In the event that all of the covenants and conditions of this lease are performed and kept by the lessee, the lessors hereby grant to the lessee the option of renewing this lease for an additional term of five years from the date of termination hereof, and at the end of each five-year period thereafter, under the same terms and conditions except that the rental shall consist only of a royalty or percentage amounting to six per cent. of the gross income derived from the operation of said business, payable monthly in the same manner and under the same conditions as is herein provided for the payment of such royalty."

Plaintiff operated the four Jumbo Lemon structures leased by him during the seasons of 1927 and 1928 and paid to the defendants the sum of $1,200 for each of said Jumbo Lemons, and paid a 6 per cent. royalty on the gross income of said business. Thereafter, plaintiff ascertained to his own satisfaction that the defendants did not own a copyright of the structure of the Jumbo Lemon booths, and on December 7, 1928, he gave the defendants a written notice that he rescinded said lease contracts, "by reason of your fraudulent misrepresentations in regard to a material fact, in that you fraudulently and knowingly misrepresented to me that said Jumbo Lemon structure is copyrighted by you and that you were the owner of the exclusive right to maintain and operate said Jumbo Lemon structure." The notice of rescission contained the further statement that plaintiff offered to restore to defendants everything of value received from them by reason of said lease upon the condition that they should do likewise, and contained a demand for the restoration to him of everything of value received by defendants by reason of said leases. Defendants refused to consent to the rescission of the leases, and thereafter, after the commencement of this action against them, served upon plaintiff a notice of default in the performance of the conditions of said contracts, and on June 4, 1929, took possession of the four Jumbo Lemon structures, together with whatever equipment was contained therein.

Plaintiff's complaint is framed upon the theory that the misrepresentation was made to him during the negotiations for the leasing of the Jumbo Lemon structures that the defendants owned an exclusive right to operate and maintain said Jumbo Lemons based upon a copyright of the structure itself, and that by virtue of said copyright no one could duplicate the structure and enter into competitive business against him; that this misrepresentation was in fact false, since the defendants did not own a copyright of the design of the structure itself; that the defendants at the time of making this misrepresentation knew that it was false; that relying upon such statements by the defendants he was induced to enter into the lease contracts, and he was thereby induced to expend money in the establishment of the business which he would not have expended had he been aware that the defendants did not own a copyright of the Jumbo Lemon structure. In short, it is the gist of plaintiff's cause of action that he bargained for the use of an exclusive right to operate and maintain a business adequately protected by a copyright upon the structure itself, and that he was entitled to receive that for which he bargained, and that no other form of protection such as a copyright of a photograph of the structure, or a possible exclusive right of use based upon prior user by defendants of said structures, could be substituted therefor. Being entitled to exactly what he bargained for, the plaintiff insists that, since he did not receive the precise thing for which he bargained, he is entitled to rescind his contracts and it is not necessary for him to show any loss of income caused by an encroachment upon his business, as his loss consists of the money expended by him in the acquiring of something which he had no desire to acquire, and which he would not have acquired had he been aware of the truth of the situation and had not been misled by the misrepresentations of the defendants.

It is apparently defendants' theory that, notwithstanding the fact that the defendants did not own a copyright of the structure, they had "something just as good," and that as the plaintiff, up to the time of the action, had not suffered pecuniary loss to his income, he could not complain and could not rescind said contracts.

Defendants' cross-complaint alleges that on the 7th day of December, 1928 (the date of the notice of rescission by plaintiff), the plaintiff, "without any valid reason or ground therefor, repudiated and abandoned said lease and the business established in accordance with the terms thereof, and refused to further perform many of the terms and conditions of said lease." It alleges that on said day the plaintiff converted to his own use all of the articles of personal property described in said leases, and that said plaintiff has refused to deliver the same to the defendants. Defendants prayed for the value of said equipment, the loss of royalty upon said business for the term of three years due to the abandonment of said business by the plaintiff, for the loss of profits upon the sale of fruits during the term of said leases, and for the loss sustained by the fact that plaintiff did not keep said structures in good repair and deliver them to the defendants in good condition. The defendants in addition sought damages for the "malicious conduct" of plaintiff in attempting to break up the Jumbo Lemon chain organization by stating that said leases were invalid and procured by misrepresentations and could not be enforced by the lessors, thereby causing dissension and differences among the operators of Jumbo Lemons and destroying the co-operation among said lessees and operators.

There is in the record the testimony of Chester Vaughan, the agent for the defendants who had first contacted the plaintiff, that a booth similar to the Jumbo Lemon booths had been operated by an outsider in San Diego county and was still operating, but it was conceded by the plaintiff that during his operation of said Jumbo Lemon booths there had been no other identical or similar booths operated in the territory granted to him by the leases. It also seems to be conceded that the plaintiff operated at a loss, and that this loss was occasioned rather by the lack of business than by any intrusion or encroachment upon his exclusive right to operate. It is apparent from a perusal of the findings that the judgment of the trial court rendered in favor of the defendants was predicated upon the theory that the protection afforded by the defendants, based either upon the copyright registration of a photograph of the structure, or a possible right based upon a prior user by the defendants, was an adequate substitute for the protection arising out of an ownership by defendants of a copyright of the structure itself, coupled with the additional fact that there had been no encroachment upon plaintiff's business by the use of any identical or similar structure by any competitor in plaintiff's territory. In other words, the trial court accepted the defendants' theory that no injury resulted to plaintiff by virtue of the fact that he had suffered no loss of income.

The trial court expressly found that "defendants did state to plaintiff prior to the execution of said lease and in said lease that the said lessors were the owners of the exclusive right to maintain and operate 'Jumbo Lemons' a form of roadside stand for mixing and dispensing nonintoxicating drinks, which Jumbo Lemon was a structure copyrighted by James Mills, Jr. (italics supplied) and that lessors were establishing a chain of said Jumbo Lemons throughout the State of California and other states, to operate the same through lease contracts and maintain a standard system of operation." There are also findings to the effect that the plaintiff "did take and accept" the leases from defendants set out as exhibits, and "did make certain payments therefor as provided in said leases," and that he did give the notice of rescission, setting it out in full. Then follows, however, findings which negative the claim that such representations were false and fraudulent and were knowingly made to deceive the plaintiff or did induce him to enter into said contracts. There is in addition the finding that "plaintiff took possession of said Jumbo Lemon as lessee thereof and as a licensee under defendants' copyright and other forms of lawful protection afforded by defendants and advantages secured as an operator in the so-called 'Jumbo Lemon' chain organization." There is a finding that plaintiff paid to defendants and in the operation of plaintiff's business a total sum of $6,646.69, and that he received from the operation for the seasons of 1927 and 1928 the gross sum of $4,969, but there is the further finding that "no person has interfered with his said right or infringed upon the same," and that plaintiff "has not sustained a pecuniary loss or injury in the sum of $1,667.69, or in any sum or amount whatever, or any manner whatever, by reason of any representations of defendants or either of them." The final finding is to the effect that "said copyright registered in the name of James Mills, Jr., was not and is not invalid, and that the said plaintiff had at the time prior to the execution of said lease ample opportunity and means of investigating and determining the rights of defendants to construct, own, lease and operate Jumbo Lemons and the protection afforded them under the law and by its copyright." It is apparent that the court in this final finding was dealing with the copyright of the photograph of the structure, rather than the copyright of the structure itself, and that, although it is true that "the copyright registered in the name of James Mills, Jr. [meaning the copyright of the photograph] was not and is not invalid," neither this finding nor the other findings squarely meet the issue of whether or not plaintiff was entitled to rescind by virtue of the failure of a material consideration—a copyright of the structure itself.

[1] We are of the opinion that plaintiff was entitled to rescind said contracts, and that the judgment based upon these findings cannot be sustained. There can be no doubt that the representation made was a material one and was the inducing cause of the plaintiff's entering into the contracts. If he would not have entered into the contracts if such a misrepresentation had not been made, he is entitled to rescind the contracts and be placed as nearly as possible in the same position as he was in before entering into the contracts. He was entitled to receive that for which he bargained and cannot be compelled to accept, in lieu thereof, "something just as good." Moreover, if he entered into the contracts by virtue of such misrepresentation, it cannot be said that he suffered no pecuniary loss because he suffered no loss of income. If he paid more for the right to operate a business protected by a copyright structure than he would have paid for the use of the structure without a copyright protection, as there can be no doubt he did, he suffered a pecuniary loss. And if, upon a resale of the business, he would be unable to secure as high a price for the business which was not protected by a structure copyrighted as he would for a business adequately so protected, he would undoubtedly suffer pecuniary loss. Moreover, we do not believe that he should be compelled to continue in the business under the apprehension of possible competitors after he learned that the business was not protected by a copyright of the structure against such competitors.

In this regard it should be stated that we see no good reason for distinguishing between those cases in which a purchaser is permitted to rescind by reason of the fact that by misrepresentation he has been induced to purchase something other or different from that which he intended to purchase, and a case such as the instant case in which the right secured by the plaintiff was a lease for a period of years with an option for perpetual renewal. In the instant case, the plaintiff invested money in the securing of a definite thing, the use of the structures and the right to an exclusive operation of the business, which right was represented to him to be protected by a copyright of the structure. He invested, not only in the use of the structures and the right to operate them, but in the sense of security that he would be undisturbed in his operation, and the possibility of selling his business at a profit because it was adequately protected.

[2-5] Upon an examination of the record we are convinced that the plaintiff has made out a good cause of action. The uncontradicted evidence in the case demonstrates the following facts: (1) The representation was repeatedly made to the plaintiff prior to the execution of the contracts that the defendants owned an exclusive right to the use of the Jumbo Lemon structures, based upon a copyright of the structure itself. Since this statement appears on the face of the contracts themselves, any attempt to deny the making of such representation would be useless. Moreover, three witnesses for the defendants, including James Mills, Jr., Robert A. Rankin, and Chester Vaughan, who first contacted the plaintiff, testified that they had represented to the plaintiff that the structure was copyrighted, and that no other person could use such structure in a competitive business. James Mills, Jr., in his testimony stated that he informed the plaintiff that they had copyright protection, and, while he did not use the words, "structure copyright," in his testimony, he stated that he intended the statement in the contract, "which is a structure copyrighted" as a representation to the plaintiff. Chester Vaughan, agent for the defendants, testified that: "In conversation with Mr. Pohl I stated that I had always been informed that we had structure copyright protection and no one could build or in any way jeopardize our operations." And Robert A. Rankin testified that: "I remember very distinctly I showed him the statement that the contract had in it. That was the most convincing and conclusive argument I had." In fact, the trial court expressly found that such a representation had been made. (2) The Jumbo Lemon structure was not in fact a structure copyrighted. The evidence is clear that the application for a copyright of the structure had been rejected by the copyright department. The procurement of a copyright registration of a photograph of one of the structures was obviously only a subterfuge and in the face of the rejection of the copyright of the structure itself obviously cannot be considered to be an equivalent to it. (3) The representation that the Jumbo Lemon was a structure protected by a copyright, and that the right to operate under a lease from the defendants was an exclusive right, and that there was no possibility of any one else engaging in a competitive business, was the inducing cause of the plaintiff's entering into the contracts. In De Garmo v. Petitfils Confitserie, 93 Cal. App. 261, 270, 269 P. 692, 695, it was said: "The representations made to appellant were ones calculated to induce him to buy the stock, and he did, in fact, make the purchase; therefore the presumption is that the representations induced him to do so, and, in order to take away his right to relief on the ground of fraud, it must be shown that he did not rely upon said representations. Troy, etc., Co. v. Drivers', etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 152-155, 111 P. 121; 12 Cal. Jur. 827." Moreover, the record clearly shows, from the testimony of the witnesses for the defendants themselves, that the plaintiff carefully inquired into the question of whether or not the structures were adequately protected by a copyright. As above noted, Robert A. Rankin testified that this was the "most convincing and conclusive argument I had." Entirely eliminating from consideration the testimony by the plaintiff that the representation that the Jumbo Lemon was a copyrighted structure was the inducing cause of his entering into the contracts, the record clearly shows that this was in fact the inducing cause, and that, if he had not been led to believe that the structure was copyrighted, he would not have invested his money in the business. (4) The plaintiff was not afforded an opportunity to examine the papers in connection with the copyright. James Mills, Jr., testified that, when plaintiff inquired about the copyright papers during the negotiations at Maxwell, he informed him that they were at Hamilton, or in the safe deposit box in the bank at Chico. It is apparent that it was impossible for the plaintiff to make an examination of the papers without the co-operation of the defendant, James Mills, Jr., and that such co-operation was not afforded him. In such a situation the doctrine of caveat emptor has no application. Bechtold v. Coney, 42 Cal. App. 563, 183 P. 841. In Ferguson v. Koch, 204 Cal. 342, 268 P. 342, 344, 58 A. L. R. 1176, it is said: "Where parties deal fairly or at arm's length, the rule of caveat emptor applies, but, where honest dealing is departed from by the vendor making false statements as of his own knowledge, the falsity of which is not known to the purchaser, such purchaser has the undoubted right to rely implicitly upon such statements, and the principle has no application. In other words, the vendor must stand mute, or at least refrain from making statements calculated to deceive."

[6-9] It is not necessary for us to determine whether or not the representations made to the plaintiff were made with the intent to deceive. In Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011, it is held that a defrauding party making statements which he knows to be untrue, or, having no grounds for believing them to be true, will not be protected by the absence of an intent to deceive. There can be no question that the statement that the Jumbo Lemon was a structure copyrighted was knowingly made. It would appear from the testimony of James Mills, Jr., that he was under the impression that a copyright of a photograph of one of the Jumbo Lemon structures was equivalent to a copyright of the structure. A copyright of a photograph only protects the owner from a reproduction or sale by others of the original photograph. Gross v. Seligman (C. C. A.) 212 F. 930. In Bleistein v. Donaldson Lithographing Co., 188 U. S. 239, 23 S. Ct. 298, 299, 47 L. Ed. 460, it was said: "Others are free to copy the original. They are not free to copy the copy." It is self-evident that a copyright of a photograph of one of the structures falls far short of being a copyright of the structure itself. And, in the face of the fact that defendant knew that a copyright of the structure had been refused, such substitute could not afford a reasonable basis for an honest belief that such copyright did in fact afford protection to the structure itself. At any rate, by virtue of the fact that he was aware that a patent of the design of the structure had been denied, and that the application for a copyright of the structure had been refused, it was incumbent upon him to disclose such facts to the plaintiff in order that the plaintiff should have an opportunity of arriving at his own conclusions and making his decision with reference to investing his money and entering into the contracts based upon the facts as they actually existed—not upon half truths. "Though one may be under no duty to speak as to a matter, if he undertakes to do so, either voluntarily or in response to inquiries, he is bound not only to state truly what he tells, but also not to suppress or conceal any facts within his knowledge which materially qualify those stated. If he speaks at all, he must make a full and fair disclosure." Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 226 P. 803, 805.

[10] It is apparent from the above discussion that all the elements necessary to establish plaintiff's case for rescission were adequately made out, and that a judgment in his favor should have been granted. It follows that the defendants' cause of action, based as it was upon the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to rescind said contracts, finds no support in the record.

Judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

In re HOWARD'S GUARDIANSHIP.

HOWARD et al. v. BANK OF AMERICA NAT.
TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N.
S. F. 14718.

Supreme Court of California.
July 31, 1933.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 30, 1933.

1. Trusts ⇨231(2).

Trustee is not permitted to purchase trust property or acquire any interest therein.

2. Guardian and ward ⇨62.

Guardian of estate of minor should be entirely disinterested person.

3. Guardian and ward ⇨25.

Relatives of minor held entitled to removal, as guardian of minor's estate, of bank which, as trustee under trust in which minor had remainder interest, had itself purchased trust securities without knowledge of remaindermen (Civ. Code, §§ 2230, 2234; Probate Code, § 1580, subd. 5).

The evidence indicated that bank, as trustee, in its report to adult remaindermen, had not disclosed that it was the purchaser of United States bonds of the trust estate which had been sold, and the adult remaindermen disaffirmed the transaction and brought action for accounting and removal of the trustee. It further appeared that the trust was for the benefit of the life beneficiary as well as for the remaindermen, and that the trustee's compensation was based on income derived from the trust.

4. Guardian and ward ⇨10.

Statute giving preference in appointment of guardian of minor to trustee of fund applied to minor's support applies only where trust is for minor's exclusive benefit (Probate Code, § 1407).

5. Guardian and ward ⇨25.

It is within power of appointing court to remove guardianship of minor from any antagonistic person or influence (Probate Code, § 1580, subd. 5).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Proceedings by Charles S. Howard and others against the Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association. From a judgment nonsuiting petitioners and dismissing the petition, petitioners appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

See, also, 24 P.(2d) 486.

Orville R. Vaughn, of San Francisco, Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Sullivan, Roche, Johnson & Barry, of San Francisco, Edmund Scott, of Redwood City, and Keyes & Erskine and Louis Ferrari, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Appellants, the father and brothers of Robert Stewart Howard, a minor, petitioned the superior court to remove the respondent bank as guardian of the minor's estate. The bank answered, and the proceeding was tried upon the issues thus joined. At the conclusion of petitioners' evidence, the bank moved for a nonsuit, which was granted. Thereafter, the court rendered a judgment of nonsuit and dismissal of the petition. This appeal followed.

Charles S. Howard, one of the petitioners, and his wife, now Mrs. Herrscher, had three sons, Charles S. Howard, Jr., Lindsay C. Howard, and Robert Stewart Howard, the two former being of age and engaged in business, the latter, a minor, attending school. On March 7, 1930, Charles S. Howard, the husband and father, one of the appellants, created a trust by the terms of which a trust company other than the respondent was named as trustee. To this trust, Charles S. Howard transferred United States government securities worth in excess of $2,100,000 and cash approximating $400,000, a total of $2,500,000. By the terms of the trust, the income was to go to Mrs. Howard as life tenant, with remainder to the three sons. There is a provision in the trust by which Mrs. Howard is given the right to withdraw $50,000 per year from the corpus of the trust, and provisions providing for failure of survivorship among the sons. Reinvestment of the trust funds was committed to the trustee, subject to the right of the life beneficiary, Mrs. Howard, to disapprove contemplated reinvestments. She was also authorized to change the trustee, and, if she elected to do so, she might appoint some third person whose approval of reinvestments by the trustee was also required. The power of sale, however, was vested solely in the original and successor trustees.

On or about the 24th of November, 1930, the mother was appointed guardian of the person of the minor, and the Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association, respondent here, and hereinafter referred to as the bank, was appointed guardian of the estate of the minor. After the appointment and qualification of the bank as guardian of the estate of the minor, the trustee of the trust was changed, and the bank was appointed trustee of the fund and assumed the trust. Almost immediately there occurred the events which are relied upon by the appellants as justifying the removal of the bank as guardian of the estate of Robert Stewart Howard, the minor. Mrs. Howard had, in the meantime, named Edmond E. Herrscher, an attorney, as the third person whose approval of reinvestments by the new trustee should be required. By the end of January, 1931, two months after the appointment of the bank as guardian, United States bonds, property of the trust, of the face value of $1,736,200, had been taken out of the trust account and disposed of. It is the contention of the appellants that this property was transferred from the trust estate and was actually sold and transferred to the bank itself, and that the transfer resulted in great loss to the estate of the ward. The respondent contends that the transaction was one in which, in the contemplation of banks and financial houses, the bank did not buy the bonds in the sense of an ordinary purchase and sale transaction, but that, as a convenience to its customer, they were changing one form of currency or money, to wit, Liberty bonds, into another form of money, to wit, cash at the prevailing rate of interest between them, but the record supports the contention of appellants. The proceeds were invested, with Herrscher's approval, in municipal, utility, and railroad bonds, which, at the time of the hearing on the petition for removal of the guardian, were worth $1,590,537. It is contended, and the evidence apparently shows, that at the time of the hearing the corpus of the trust was $110,000 less in value than it would have been had no United States bonds belonging to the trust been sold.

The life tenant, Mrs. Howard, was overpaid by the bank through its paying to her full interest on bonds bought at premiums, without amortizing the premiums as required by law, upon her agreeing that, if any claim were made by the remainder interests for the amount of such premiums, such demand should be a valid claim against her estate in the event of her demise. The bank subsequently restored to the trust fund the amount of money thus wrongfully paid to Mrs. Howard.

Under the terms of the trust, the bank's compensation was to be measured by the income of the trust. In the course of buying and selling securities, the bank from time to time bought and sold bonds between interest dates. In such cases, it received accrued interest as part of the price of the bonds sold, and paid accrued interest as part of the price of the bonds bought. In computing and collecting its own compensation, the bank included interest on bonds sold, and added the interest accruing on the bonds purchased from date of purchase and also the interest accruing and unpaid prior to that time. By this computation, it paid to itself as compensation, more than it was entitled to receive.

The bank admits the making of this error in computing its compensation, but explains it as having been made "through a simple mistake" by failure of a clerk to segregate accrued interest from interest on the bonds after their acquisition.

Appellants also contend that respondent's interest as trustee is adverse to its faithful performance as guardian of the ward's estate; that respondent cannot faithfully serve two masters, and that it may not legally do so. The foregoing are the principal facts relied upon by the appellants in seeking removal of the guardian.

In support of the judgment and order of the lower court, the bank contends that the question here is not whether the bank violated the trust or owes the trust estate anything, but whether or not the lower court was justified in refusing to remove it as guardian of the estate of the minor. It argues that the question of removal was one of discretion with the lower court, and, on the evidence, contends that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to remove the bank, and that, even if the minor's estate has suffered from any mistake, neglect, or unintentional wrong of the bank, the court should refuse to remove the bank as guardian, but surcharge its account with the loss, if any, suffered by the estate. We are of the view that the real question presented by the appeal is that suggested by appellants, and is whether or not the bank, as trustee, has such an adverse interest as to interfere with the proper discharge of its duties as guardian of the estate of the minor, and whether or not the foregoing facts, which the evidence supports, are sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the acts, either rightful or wrongful, of the bank show such antagonistic interest.

Neither a trustee nor any of his agents may take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he or any one for him who acts as agent has an interest adverse to that of his beneficiary, when, the beneficiary not having capacity to contract, the proper court, upon information of the facts, has not granted permission for such transaction. Civ. Code, § 2230. In this case, of course, the minor beneficiary had not the capacity to contract, and no application was made to the probate court having jurisdiction of his estate for the transfer and sale of property belonging to the trust estate in which the minor had a definite remainder interest.

[1] Every violation of these provisions is a fraud against the beneficiary. Civ. Code, § 2234. In one of the very early decisions of this court it was said "that one who is a trustee, or who stands in a situation of trust and confidence, cannot purchase or deal with the subject of the trust, * * * nor place himself in an attitude antagonistic to the trust." Page v. Naglee, 6 Cal. 241, 245.

This court also later declared that: "For the reason that it is against public policy to permit persons occupying fiduciary relations to be placed in such a position that the influence of selfish motives may be a temptation so great as to overpower their duty and lead to a betrayal of their trust, the rule is unyielding that a trustee shall not, under any circumstances, be allowed to have any dealings in the trust property with himself, or acquire any interest therein. Courts will not permit any investigation into the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, or allow the trustee to show that the dealing was for the best interest of the beneficiary, but will set the transaction aside at the mere option of the cestui que trust. [Citing authorities.]" Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 29, 28 P. 788, 790. Quoting from an accepted and approved authority, the court continues: "'So strictly is this principle adhered to that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of a contract so entered into. It obviously is or may be impossible to demonstrate how far in any particular case the terms of such a contract have been the best for the interest of the cestui que trust which it was possible to obtain. It may sometimes happen that the terms on which a trustee has dealt, or attempted to deal, with the estate or interests of those for whom he is a trustee have been as good as could be obtained from any other person; they may even at the time have been better, but still so inflexible is the rule that no inquiry on that subject is permitted.'" In another case the court said: "The philosophy of this rule is quite apparent and its inflexibility is the strongest safeguard which the law can offer for the protection of the interests of the beneficiary. The great purpose of the law is to secure fidelity in the agent. When one undertakes to deal with himself in different capacities—individual and representative—there is a manifest hostility in the position he occupies. His duty calls upon him to act for the best interests of his principal. His self-interest prompts him to make the best bargain for himself. Humanity is so constituted that, when these conflicting interests arise, the temptation is usually too great to be overcome, and duty is sacrificed to interest. In order that this temptation may be avoided, or, if indulged in, must be at the peril of the trustee, it has been wisely provided that the trustee shall not be permitted to make or enforce any contract arising between himself as trustee and individually with reference to any matter of the trust, nor will the court enter into any examination of the honesty of the transaction." Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 365, 78 P. 550, 554, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. We deem it unnecessary to quote further from or cite authorities on this subject, for, as was said in the case last cited, "so harmonious is the law on this subject that authorities might be cited indefinitely."

Considerable evidence was introduced by the respondent in explanation of its actions concerning the sale of the trust property; but we think that it definitely appears that, while Charles S. Howard, Jr., and Lindsay C. Howard must have known that the bonds were being sold (the minor, Robert Stewart Howard, not being chargeable with notice because his guardian was acting), the remaindermen did not know that the bank was selling the bonds to itself. The real facts of the situation do not appear to have been discovered by them until they were brought to their attention by accountants employed by them to examine the records of the bank nearly one year after the transactions took place. The reports made by the bank to the adult remaindermen, meanwhile, merely indicated that the United States bonds were no longer a part of the trust, but did not show to whom they were sold. The fact that Mrs. Howard, the life tenant, and Herrscher, whom she selected to represent her in dealings with the bank, may have had full knowledge of and consented to the transactions resulting in the sale of the securities, does not, in our opinion, alter the situation so far as it relates to the other beneficiaries, one of whom was the minor incapable of acting except through his guardian.

[2] The guardian of the estate of a minor should be an entirely disinterested person. Estate of Bedford, 158 Cal. 145, 147, 110 P. 302. This is essential in order that there may be no temptation, nor even suspicion of temptation, for him to abuse his trust. Barnsback v. Dewey, 13 Ill. App. 581, 584. The confidence reposed in a guardian rests upon the undivided loyalty that the law expects and requires the guardian to give to his ward's interest. In Matter of Stillman Infants, 117 Misc. 61, 190 N. Y. S. 495, 496, the court declared that because the father was the custodian of property belonging to the infant "renders it advisable, because of the possible adversity of interest, that some one other than the father be appointed general guardian of the infants' estate, as occasion may arise which may render it necessary that inquiry into the investment of such property should be made on behalf of the infants."

In Re Snyder's Will (Sup.) 136 N. Y. S. 670, 673, the court held that the appointing court should "designate a disinterested person, and not appoint the present petitioner to such position [as trustee], for the reason that she has already been appointed general guardian of the minor who is the beneficiary of one-third of the net income of the trust, and her appointment would place her in a position where her interest and duty might conflict." Along this same line see In re

[3] As guardian of the estate of one of the remaindermen of the trust here involved it is the respondent's duty to carefully supervise its conduct as trustee of said trust. Should the respondent as trustee negligently or deliberately credit amounts to income which belong in corpus, thereby benefiting the life beneficiary and itself (the trustee's compensation being based on the income derived from the trust), but at the same time depleting the estate of the ward, a remainderman, it would be the respondent's duty, as guardian, to detect its error or discover its malfeasance as trustee and thereupon compel restitution. That such a situation would prove embarrassing, if not fatal, to the proper discharge of the guardian's duties, must be admitted. Moreover, respondent, as trustee of a trust, created for several beneficiaries other than the minor, may be called upon to perform acts inimical to its discharge of the duties incident to its office as guardian of the estate of the minor, one of the remaindermen of the trust. The interest of the life beneficiary is to rack the property for present income at the expense of the inheritance. In re Myer's Estate, 205 Pa. 413, 54 A. 1093. In its desire to produce an adequate income for the life beneficiary, the respondent's activities as trustee might well prejudice and detrimentally affect its conduct as guardian of the estate of the remainderman.

The errors and improprieties in respondent's past management of the trust, briefly referred to above, tend to indicate that respondent, as guardian, has been derelict in its duty, and has wholly failed to exercise that supervision required of its conduct as trustee. The transactions by which the trustee transferred to itself approximately $1,700,000 of the Liberty bonds and treasury notes constituting a part of the corpus of the trust were, as already shown, in violation of the fundamental rule prohibiting a trustee from dealing with himself, and cannot be defended. The evidence tends to show that respondent did not disclose these transactions to the remaindermen or to the guardianship court. Upon discovery of the facts, the adult remaindermen disaffirmed and brought an action for an accounting and removal of the trustee, an action still pending. Necessarily, the minor's interests and rights are identical with those of the adult remaindermen, and should be protected by the guardian of his estate. To fully and properly discharge this duty owing to its ward it may be necessary for the respondent, as guardian, to bring suit against itself as trustee. Obviously, this would necessitate that respondent exercise inconsistent and antagonistic duties. Regardless of respondent's good faith in the premises, it would therefore appear necessary, in view of what has been said, that the minor have a guardian whose course of action cannot possibly be swayed or influenced by an inconsistent or hostile interest.

[4] Respondent cites us to section 1407 of the Probate Code as indicating an absence of conflict between the duties of trustee and guardian. The section reads: "Of persons equally entitled in other respects to the guardianship of a minor, preference is to be given as follows: * * * (3) To one who already stands in the position of a trustee of a fund to be applied to the child's support." We find nothing in this section opposed to the conclusion herein announced. In our opinion the section can have application only when the trust is for the sole and exclusive benefit of the minor, thus precluding the necessity for two officers where one can properly serve. The section was not intended as an exception to the rule prohibiting a guardian from having interests and duties that may be opposed to and in conflict with his duties as guardian. The history of the section bears out this construction. The code commissioners' notes to our former section 246 of the Civil Code, the counterpart of the present Probate Code section, indicate that the section was based on the New York rule to the effect that the trustee of a trust to be applied to the support and education of a minor, having substantially the same duties as the minor's guardian and exercising the same discretion and keeping the same accounts, might also serve as guardian of the minor's estate. Bennett v. Byrne, 2 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 216; Matter of McGuire, 114 Misc. 81, 186 N. Y. S. 243; sec. 127, Field's Draft, New York Civ. Code. Obviously, for one person to serve in both capacities in such a case would simplify matters. However, while recognizing and giving effect to this rule, the New York courts have held that the trustee of a trust in which the minor is only one of the beneficiaries is not a proper person to be appointed guardian of the minor's estate because of a possible conflict of interest and duty and because it may be required that the guardian inquire into the conduct of the trust in behalf of his ward. In re Snyder's Will, supra. We therefore conclude that section 1407, supra, can have application only when there can be no possible inconsistency or antagonism between the duties of the trustee and guardian. Such is not this case.

Subdivision 5 of section 1580 of the Probate Codes provides that a guardian may be removed "for having an interest adverse to the faithful performance of his duties." This principle finds expression in Windsor v. McAtee, 2 Metc. (59 Ky.) 430, 433, wherein it is said: "The law makes it the duty of a guardian to look after and protect all the interests of his ward, and emphatically condemns any act of his, or even the acquire-ment of any right by him, inconsistent with this duty. His fidelity to his ward forbids it. He cannot serve himself and his ward where their interests conflict. And this principle is applicable to all trusts of this character. Whenever a guardian assumes such an attitude towards his ward, it seems to us he then becomes unsuited for a faithful discharge of his trust, and should be removed and another appointed."

In Robertson v. Epperson, 78 Neb. 279, 110 N. W. 540, it is held that, "where a guardian places himself in a position with respect to the estate which brings his interests in conflict with those of his ward, he should be discharged and his letters revoked."

[5] It is within the power of the appointing court to remove the guardianship from any antagonistic person or influence. In re Dodson's Guardianship, 135 Wash. 625, 238 P. 610.

Under all of the circumstances above narrated, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in nonsuiting the petitioners and dismissing their petition for removal of the respondent as guardian of the estate of the minor. This being so, the order and judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed in accordance with these views.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Appellant, mother of the above-named minor, appeals from an order removing her as guardian of the person of said minor and an order appointing the respondent, father of the minor, in her place and stead.

After hearing, upon the petition for removal, the court below found that the minor was of the age of sixteen years; that appellant was appointed guardian of his person on November 24, 1930; that on October 7, 1931, the appellant removed from this state and went to Europe, where she remained until on or about May 10, 1932, a period of approximately seven months; that it was not necessary for appellant to go to Europe for her health; that from the date of her departure until January 25, 1932, when her powers as guardian were suspended by the court and temporarily vested in the father of the minor, there was no person in the state legally authorized to supervise the minor; that since her departure for Europe the appellant has "continuously failed to perform her duties as guardian of the person of said minor and at all of said times continuously neglected and violated her duties and obligations as such guardian, to the detriment of said minor"; that appellant "is incapable to perform her duties as guardian of said minor suitably under the present conditions"; that in May, 1932, the appellant remarried;

that such marriage was and is disapproved by the minor, who objects and refuses to live with the appellant and her present husband; that it is necessary for the best interests of the minor that appellant be removed as guardian; that the respondent, father of the minor, is a fit and proper person to be appointed guardian of the person of the minor; that the minor has in writing nominated his father to be his guardian; and that the minor is to be permitted to visit his mother at any and all times agreeable to them.

Appellant's principal contention is that a guardian may not be removed except on proof of one or more of the causes specified in section 1580 of the Probate Code. We find it unnecessary to here determine whether, as urged by appellant, the cited Code section furnishes the exclusive grounds for removal of a guardian. Even if this were so, a point we do not decide, the order in the present proceeding, under the evidence and findings in the record before us, would find ample support in that section. Under subdivisions 2 and 6 of section 1580, supra, a guardian may be removed for continued failure to perform his duties and for removal from the state. The evidence indicates, and the court found, that shortly after her appointment the appellant left the state for Europe, where she remained seven months, leaving her ward without the care and attention of any one legally authorized to supervise him. Appellant introduced evidence tending to show that during her sojourn abroad the minor was in attendance at a private school, where he was continually supervised and required to remain except on week-ends; that her home was left open with instructions to the housekeeper to look after the minor's wants on week-ends; and that steps had been taken to insure medical and dental aid should the minor require them during her absence.

[1] We are satisfied that the appellant made all arrangements which, in her opinion, were essential to the minor's welfare during her stay in Europe. However, this did not constitute a proper discharge of her duties as guardian. A guardian of the person of a minor stands in the place of a parent, whose duty it is to supply that watchfulness, care, and discipline which are essential to the young. Guardianship of Taylor, 3 Cof. Prob. Dec. 105; 13 Cal. Jur. 140, § 3. These are duties calling for the personal attention of the guardian. They cannot be indirectly discharged through the agency of others. During her stay in Europe there was, within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 1580, supra, a "continued failure" on appellant's part to perform her duties as guardian.

[2] Appellant attempts to justify her absence in Europe on the ground that it was indispensable to her health. The evidence on the point is incomplete and unsatisfactory. It consists solely of appellant's testimony to the effect that "Dr. Warren advised me to go away for my health, he said to get away from all the dirt and scandal, and my health would never be better until I did go away." In the face of this meager evidence on the subject, we cannot say that the court below erred when it found that appellant's absence from the state was not "necessary for her health." The court may well have concluded that her absence was induced by a desire to avoid all the "scandal."

[3, 4] There is an abundance of evidence in the record tending to indicate that the minor desires to be with his adult brothers and father, all of whom are associated in business and whose interests are more or less identical with those of the minor. Section 1408 of the Probate Code declares that, other things being equal, the father is to be preferred as guardian if the minor "is of an age to require education and preparation for labor and business." The order of removal and appointment of a new guardian appear to find support in sections 1580 and 1408, supra.

It should be added that the minor has expressed a dislike for the appellant's present husband and an unwillingness to live with him. While, as contended by the appellant, a minor having nominated a guardian of his person is not free, at his whim and caprice, to nominate another, the court is not foreclosed from considering his desires. At all times the court is to be guided "by what appears to be for the best interest of the child." Section 1406, Probate Code; In re Hawkins, 183 Cal. 568, 573, 192 P. 30.

[5] The power of the appointing court to direct, restrain, and control a guardian in the performance of his duties, and even to remove him and put another in his place, is settled beyond controversy. However, the removal of guardians is not an arbitrary or capricious, but a judicial, discretion, to be exercised with due regard to the legal rights of all concerned. Lord v. Hough, 37 Cal. 657, 664; De Greayer v. Superior Court, 117 Cal. 640, 645, 49 P. 983, 59 Am. St. Rep. 220. We cannot say that the record here discloses an abuse of that discretion.

The orders appealed from are, and each is, affirmed.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Alleging that the California Apiary Inspection Act (Stats. 1927, p. 1724, as amended; now part of Agricultural Code, Stats. 1933, ch. 25) is unconstitutional, plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the defendants, in their official capacities, from enforcing its provisions. The defendants demurred both generally and specially. Plaintiff appeals from an order and judgment sustaining the general demurrer without leave to amend and dismissing the action.

[1] On this appeal plaintiff urges that the act in question does not constitute a proper exercise of the police power, and that it contravenes the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The point is not well taken. In the exercise of its police power the state may prescribe regulations tending to promote the public health, safety, morals, and welfare of the people. It may also legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and promote its welfare and prosperity. People v. Associated Oil Co., 211 Cal. 93, 99, 294 P. 717. In its inception "the police power was closely concerned with the preservation of the public peace, safety, morals, and health, without specific regard for 'the general welfare.'" The increasing complexity of our civilization and institutions later gave rise to cases wherein the promotion of the public welfare was held by the courts to be a legitimate object for the exercise of the police power. As our civic life has developed so has the definition of 'public welfare' until it has been held to embrace regulations 'to promote the economic welfare, public convenience, and general prosperity of the community.'" Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 383, 38 A. L. R. 1479.

[2] Whether it is reasonably necessary, in the interest of health, safety, or welfare of the people, to invade property rights, is primarily a question for the legislative department of the government, and its determination, if reasonably exercised, is conclusive upon the courts. Hornblower v. Masonic Cem. Ass'n, 191 Cal. 83, 91, 214 P. 978.

As stated in its title, the act here under consideration was enacted "to promote the agricultural interests" of the state and "to prevent the introduction and spread of [bee] disease." Examination of its provisions indicates that they reasonably tend to the accomplishment of this purpose. In order to prevent the transmission of bee diseases from one location to another, provision is made in section 6 of the act (St. 1927, p. 1726, § 6, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2136, § 6) for inspection of apiaries by the county inspector, for notice to the owner to eradicate disease, if found, and for the eradication of American foulbrood by burning. This same section also declares all diseased apiaries to be public nuisances, makes provision for their abatement by the county inspector in the event the owner, after notice, falls to abate them, reserving to the owner a right to appeal the field inspector's diagnosis. These and other provisions of the act reasonably tend to promote the bee industry by lessening, if not precluding, the transmission of bee diseases, thereby adding to the welfare and prosperity of the state.

[3] This being so, there is no merit in plaintiff's contention that because the bee diseases which the act aims to eradicate are not such as are harmful to human beings, the act cannot be justified under the police power. As already indicated, the act tends to promote the public welfare, and therefore constitutes a proper exercise of that power.

[4] The act does no violence to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, for it is elementary that, "where the exercise of the police power is applicable, the provisions of the constitution declaring that property shall not be taken without due process of law is inapplicable." Ex parte Elam, 6 Cal. App. 233, 237, 91 P. 811. See, also, In re Gilstrap, 171 Cal. 108, 113, 152 P. 42, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1086.

Other statutes, analogous in principle and similar in purpose to the one here under review, which have been declared to constitute a proper exercise of the police power, are: An act providing for the abatement as public nuisances of orchards and nurseries infected with insect pests (County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 P. 202, 203, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217); an act providing for the destruction of cedar trees infected with cedar rust (Miller v. Schoene, 276 U. S. 272, 48 S. Ct. 246, 72 L. Ed. 563); an act providing for the destruction of diseased fruit trees (Carstens v. De Sellem, 82 Wash. 643, 144 P. 934); an act declaring certain trees when diseased with "yellows" to be public nuisances and providing for their destruction without compensation (State v. Main, 69 Conn. 123, 37 A. 80, 36 L. R. A. 623, 61 Am. St. Rep. 30).

In County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, supra, the following appears: "It is known that the existence of the fruit industry in the state depends upon the suppression and destruction of the pests mentioned in the statute. The act in question is therefore a proper exercise of the police power which the legislature has, under section 1 of article 19 of the constitution, to subject private property to such reasonable restraints and burdens as will secure and maintain the general welfare and prosperity of the state." See, also, County of Contra Costa v. Cowell Portland Cement Co., 126 Cal. App. 267, 14 P.(2d) 606.

[5] We perceive no excess of authority in those provisions of the act under consideration which have to do with the prompt and summary eradication of disease in apiaries. The efficiency of many police regulations depends upon their prompt and summary execution. From necessity, certain discretion must be given to the officers who are to make the regulations effective. County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, supra. As already indicated, the right to appeal the inspector's diagnosis to the director of agriculture is reserved to the owner by section 6 of the act, and, as indicated in the last above-cited case, "the acts of the commissioner are not clothed with that sanctity and protection which accompanies the judicial acts of courts and judges, and the commissioner would be liable officially and personally for wrongful acts done under the color of his office."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LANGDON, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendants from a decree in favor of plaintiff, enjoining defendants from soliciting the scavenger business of persons and firms who were customers of plaintiff at the time certain defendants were in the employ of plaintiff.

Plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the garbage and scavenger business in the city and county of San Francisco, its business consisting of the collection and disposal of refuse, waste paper, bottles, junk, etc. It operates through scavengers and drivers assigned to specific routes throughout the city, who use the vehicles furnished by plaintiff, and whose duties include solicitation of customers, picking up of the garbage and other waste materials, and in most instances the collection of charges.

Defendant Cavagnaro was president of plaintiff corporation from January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1923; superintendent from January 1, 1924, to March 1, 1928; and general manager from March 1, 1928, to February 1, 1929. Defendant Ponzini was secretary of plaintiff from January 1, 1924, to March 1, 1928. Defendant Wilkinson was bookkeeper and assistant office manager from March 1, 1924, to February 15, 1929. Defendant Chiapellone was a driver and scavenger for plaintiff from June 1, 1923, to January 1, 1924, and president from January 1, 1925, to January 1, 1929. Defendant De Martini was a driver and scavenger for plaintiff from June 1, 1923, to February 18, 1929. Defendant Neri was never in plaintiff's employ. Defendant Serv-U-Garbage Company was incorporated February 6, 1929, and commenced operations in the scavenger business February 21, 1929. It does business also under the fictitious name of Pacific Waste Paper Stock Company. The organizers were defendants Ponzini, Wilkinson, and Neri, who hold all of the stock. Defendant De Martini, upon leaving the employ of plaintiff, went to work for defendant company as a waste paper collector. The connection of defendants Cavagnaro and Chiapellone with defendant company is disputed, but there is abundant evidence that they were involved in and actively aided its formation and operations.

The trial court found, in substance, that plaintiff had, in connection with its business, certain valuable trade secrets, known to certain of the defendants; that these defendants entered into a conspiracy with others to solicit customers of plaintiff, using the said trade secrets for such purpose; that, in pursuance of this object, they organized the defendant corporation as a screen for their activities; and that they did, in fact, solicit such customers, and in some cases received the business of said customers. Judgment was thereupon rendered, permanently enjoining defendants Cavagnaro, Ponzini, Wilkinson, and Chiapellone, and their agents, from soliciting any garbage, junk, or other such commodities "from any of the customers of plaintiff with whom they became acquainted or of whose address, or identity, they learned, while in and by virtue of, and in the course of, their employment by or official position with plaintiff, or of whose identity or address they learned from any of their co-defendants or fellow employees who learned the same while in, and by virtue of, and in the course of employment by or official position with plaintiff." These defendants were further enjoined from receiving any such solicited garbage, or divulging to the defendant company names or addresses of customers, or other trade secrets of plaintiff, acquired while in its employ. Defendants Serv-U-Garbage Company, and Pacific Waste Paper Stock Company are permanently enjoined from soliciting garbage, etc., from customers through knowledge acquired or communicated by the individual defendants as aforesaid, and from receiving said solicited garbage. Defendants Neri and De Martini were given judgment in their favor and against plaintiff for their costs. The appeal of defendant Chiapellone was dismissed, and the remaining appellants are Cavagnaro, Ponzini, and Wilkinson.

[1, 2] Appellants contend that the evidence is wholly insufficient to support the findings and judgment. They call attention to certain well-settled principles governing the granting of equitable relief in cases of this character, with which principles this court is in entire agreement. The basic proposition is that equity will, at the instance of a former employer, enjoin competition by former employees when such competition involves the unfair or fraudulent use of trade secrets which constitute a valuable part of the good will of the employer's business. The equitable power thus to prevent a person from freely carrying on a lawful business will be exercised with great caution. If, for example, it appears that there were in fact no trade secrets or data regarded as confidential, or that such secrets existed but were unknown to the particular employee; or that no use was made of them by him in the solicitation of business, then no ground for an injunction exists. See, generally, Pasadena Ice Co. v. Reeder, 206 Cal. 697, 275 P. 944, 276 P. 995; New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, 174 Cal. 26, 161 P. 990, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1022; Avocado Sales Co. v. Wyse, 122 Cal. App. 627, 10 P.(2d) 485. Such would be the case where the customers are not scattered members of the public whose identities and addresses are generally unknown, but are retail dealers whose shops are recognizable by any one, who advertise their businesses openly, and whose identities and addresses can be readily ascertained by a total stranger, by simple observation, or by reference to telephone or business directories. See Avocado Sales Co. v. Wyse, supra; see, also, Newark Cleaning & Dyeing Works v. Gross, 97 N. J. Eq. 406, 128 A. 789.

[3] With these principles in mind, we turn to the record to discover whether there is evidence, first, that plaintiff owned valuable trade secrets known to those defendants who were its employees; and, second, whether, in soliciting business, defendants made use of these trade secrets. In our opinion the record sustains the findings and judgment of the court in this regard.

A number of witnesses, including some of the defendants, testified to the information concerning customers which had been compiled by plaintiff. It appears that plaintiff served some 30,000 persons and firms, through drivers and scavengers operating in various routes. The drivers kept "Black Books," in which were listed the names, addresses, rates, collection days, quantity of garbage and other waste material, accessibility of the refuse, its profitableness, etc. There were 52 of such books in current use. They were brought into the office periodically to be checked. The drivers were admonished to keep their contents secret. In addition to these collection books, there were similar records kept in the office, such as the "Bill Book" and "Cash Book," which contained names, addresses, and rates; the "Box of Cards" and "Recap Book," containing similar information. Most of these records were installed by defendants Ponzini and Wilkinson, and were at all times open to their inspection. Moreover, in many cases bills were mailed from the office, and checks were received there; complaints of customers as to rates or service were adjusted by telephone, mail, and personal interviews at the office. At corporate or drivers' meetings, general business was discussed, including details concerning desirability and character of different customers. In short, the record conclusively shows that all of the appellants had abundant opportunity to familiarize themselves with all of the important details concerning the customers of plaintiff, and in many instances had personal contacts with them.

Appellants assert that there was nothing confidential in any of the information or sources of information alluded to. They argue that, under the city ordinance, every one is required to secure scavenger service; that practically all persons in the districts served by plaintiff without competition are its customers; that the rates are fixed by the ordinance; and that, consequently, there is nothing confidential in the names, addresses, or rates. On the matter of customers, the evidence shows, and the court found, that in many instances people do not employ a scavenger, but dispose of their garbage in other ways, notwithstanding the ordinance. One scavenger estimated that on his route there were about 1,700 customers, and 2,000 non-users of the service. As to the rates, the ordinance prescribes a maximum, leaving the scavenger free to charge less if he desires, and in many cases, due to differentiating circumstances among customers, lower rates were charged by plaintiff. Besides, the ordinance rates are only applicable to "dwellings, households and apartment houses," and not, for example, to business firms.

Much more important, however, than the mere names, addresses, and rates of ordinary users of scavenger service, was the confidential information relating to the "preferred customers" of plaintiff. It appears that, from the refuse and discarded materials of some customers, a profit is made by salvage and resale of the commodities. Those customers who habitually offer waste paper and junk for collection are greatly prized, and the handling of their refuse constitutes the most valuable part of plaintiff's business. To some, very low rates are charged; to others, free service is given; and to others a bonus is paid for the privilege of removal. The facts concerning these special customers, the usual quantity and value of the waste material collected from each, the specially adjusted schedule of charges and bonuses, are treated as highly confidential. Appellants seek to show that this information also is generally known, for the reason that department stores and printing firms are the customers of such special value. There is evidence, however, that, while in general those businesses predominate in the list of preferred customers, not every department store and not every printing establishment is of equal value or is even a valuable customer; and that frequently other businesses are profitable sources of resalable waste material. There can be no doubt that the list of preferred customers, ascertained originally by continuous solicitation and investigation, and the specially arranged list of charges and bonuses, developed by long experience, constituted a trade secret of value. That this information was in great part known to defendants is indicated, not only by the fact that the data was always available to them, but by the further fact that contracts with some 150 of the important customers were in Cavagnaro's name, and a written list thereof, prepared by Wilkinson, was kept in the office of plaintiff.

On the issue of solicitation, the evidence likewise warranted the findings of the court. Plaintiff called 32 of its customers as witnesses, and with a few exceptions they testified that they had been solicited by some one of the defendants, and many did in fact leave plaintiff and become customers of the defendant company. It is noteworthy that defendants selected in nearly all cases preferred customers of plaintiff having valuable resale materials, chiefly waste paper; and that they uniformly underbid plaintiff, or offered free service for the privilege of removal. While they claim that they solicited the better prospects only by use of the telephone directory and other such means, there are several instances where it was shown that this was not so. Thus, in the matter of soliciting one Weisinger, a furrier, the witness testified that Wilkinson told him that he knew he was a customer of the plaintiff because of his (Wilkinson's) former position as bookkeeper. And in the attempt to secure a contract for the removal of materials at Fort Mason, Chiapellone, knowing of the value of this customer, obtained information from the driver as to the current bonus paid by plaintiff, and thereupon the defendant company made a lower bid. Other examples of the use of confidential information in their solicitation were before the court, and served to discredit the claim of defendants.

[4, 5] We need not go into detail on the further finding of conspiracy, although the record amply supports the trial court's conclusion that the defendants organized the Serv-U-Garbage Company as a cloak for their operations. Nor do we find any merit in the contention that plaintiff now has and is seeking to maintain a monopoly of the scavenger business in San Francisco. The facts, as disclosed by the testimony, show that, in the removal of garbage from dwellings and apartment houses, plaintiff operates without competition in a large number of districts, though, in others, it competes with several firms. To operate in this phase of the business, a scavenger must secure a permit from the board of health; and the ordinance requires the granting of such a permit whenever 20 per cent. of the residents of a district petition, alleging inadequate or improper service, or overcharging. But in the field of collecting waste paper, junk, and other resalable materials, there is no legal restriction, and plaintiff has numerous competitors.

A careful study of the record has convinced us that this case falls within the rules established by such decisions as Pasadena Ice Co. v. Reeder, supra, and not within the exceptions urged by appellants and discussed in Avocado Sales Co. v. Wyse, supra. The attack upon the findings and judgment is, we think, without substance.

The judgment is affirmed.

EDEN TOWNSHIP COUNTY WATER DIST.
v. CITY OF HAYWARD.
S. F. 14803.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 1, 1933.

1. Waters and water courses ☞143.

Extent of previous beneficial use is measure of city's prescriptive right to use underground water supply, and not city's future needs (Civ. Code, § 806).

2. Waters and water courses ☞143.

Greatest amount of water diverted by city from underground supply in any calendar year during prescriptive period held limit beyond which city could not claim (Civ. Code, § 806).

3. Waters and water courses ☞143.

To fix definite prescriptive right of city to underground waters, rate of pumping and amount taken over given period must be considered, and maximum daily rate and maximum amount taken in any calendar year during prescriptive period were measure of city's right (Civ. Code, § 806).

4. Waters and water courses ☞144.

Where city had prescriptive right to use certain amount of underground waters, use of part of water on lands outside water basin was immaterial.

5. Waters and water courses ☞ 143.

City could not claim intervention of public use in more water than it had actually taken from underground supply and beneficially used during prescriptive period, notwithstanding capacity of system was greater, where city never intended to use amount in excess of reasonable requirements (Civ. Code, § 806).

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by the Eden Township County Water District against the City of Hayward. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

Treadwell, Van Fleet & Laughlin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. W. White, of Hayward, and H. M. Wright, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice.

The sole question of importance on this appeal is the proper standard by which to measure the conceded prescriptive right in the city of Hayward to pump water and divert it for daily use from an underground or percolating water supply found in a basin in that vicinity. Plaintiff is a county water district acting pursuant to section 12 of the act of 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 1049 et seq.; Coachella Valley, etc., Dist. v. Stevens, 206 Cal. 400, 274 P. 538. Defendant is a municipal corporation of the sixth class.

The questioned provision of the judgment appealed from by plaintiff is as follows: "That the defendant City of Hayward is the owner of the right to and has the right to take, pump, divert and appropriate water from out of the bodies of underground and percolating water underlying certain lands by it owned and possessed (describing them) * * * by means of pumps and machinery owned by said defendant City of Hayward and located on its said lands above described and to carry the water by it so taken, pumped, diverted and appropriated off of and away from said lands and furnish and supply the same to the inhabitants of the City of Hayward and of territory surrounding and adjacent to the City of Hayward for domestic and other useful and beneficial purposes, including municipal purposes and for fire protection, to the extent and amount each day as the daily needs of the inhabitants of the whole territory served with water by said defendant through its municipal water system of necessity reasonably each day require, but not exceeding, however, in any one day more water than 828,000 gallons, and the said right of the defendant City of Hayward to so take, pump, divert and appropriate said water for said purposes is not limited as to any amount within said maximum quantity of 828,000 gallons per day which may be so furnished and supplied each day either east or west of Castro street, and that the said right of the defendant City of Hayward is a right superior and paramount to any right or rights of said plaintiff district or of any and all landowners within said plaintiff district."

The chief finding in support of this portion of said judgment is as follows: "The maximum quantity of water so pumped by defendant and so carried through said pipe line in any one day and so furnished and supplied to its consumers of water and so used by its consumers of water in any one day is 828,000 gallons per day, and the maximum average monthly quantity of water so pumped by said defendant and so carried through said pipe and so furnished and supplied to its consumers and so used by its consumers of water is 679,200 gallons per day, and the maximum average annual quantity of water so pumped by defendant and so carried through said pipe line and so furnished and supplied to its consumers and so used by its consumers of water is 500,400 gallons per day."

This cause was instituted May 7, 1931, the five years next preceding this date being the prescriptive period in question. From the above-quoted finding appellants contend that a daily maximum limitation of 828,000 gallons and a monthly maximum limitation of 679,200 gallons per day and a yearly maximum limitation of 500,400 gallons per day, must be fixed in order to properly define the prescriptive right. Respondent, on the other hand, insists that the only limitations properly imposed are the daily maximum rate of 828,000 gallons and the unmeasured, reasonable, daily, future needs and requirements of said city.

[1] It must be manifest, in the absence of an express definition and description of the present or prospective needs and requirements of the city, that this latter limitation is void for uncertainty. San Bernardino v. City of Riverside, 186 Cal. 7, 23, 198 P. 784. We thus have left merely the limitation of 828,000 gallons per day. This maximum could be used each day of the year without doing violence to said judgment. It is possible, under this situation, that respondent would be allowed 302,220,000 gallons per annum. It seems altogether possible that the increasing needs of the city might be such that in the near future such a continuous draft throughout the year might be beneficially used. In San Bernardino v. City of Riverside, supra, at page 31 of 186 Cal., 198 P. 784, 794, it is well said: "The judgment should not make any declaration of the right of any party to take in the future any water to which it has no present right." Again, all agree that the prescriptive period under section 806 of the Civil Code is measured by "the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired."

In Weil on Water Rights (3d Ed.) § 581, it is said: "The principle declared by these authorities is that the rights of a party who has acquired a prescriptive title, and the rights of one against whom said title is acquired, are mutual, and each is entitled to demand that the prescriptive right be exercised in the same manner that it was exercised while it was being acquired."

In Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) page 1895, § 1056, it is said: "The right acquired by prescription is only commensurate to the rights enjoyed during the full prescriptive period; and the extent of the enjoyment measures the permanent right. The rule declared by the authorities is that the rights of the party who has acquired a prescriptive title, either to a water right or to an easement for the same over the lands of others, 'and the rights of the one against whom the title is acquired are mutual, and each is entitled to demand that the prescriptive right be exercised in the same manner that it was exercised while being acquired.'"

This principle, under various sets of facts, has been uniformly applied in this state. On this basis, how can respondent city claim a right in excess of the water actually pumped and diverted for public use? The future need of the city is not a measure of the servitude upon the lands represented by plaintiff. The right of these lands cannot be made to decrease with the future increasing needs of the city. The only safe rule is that defendant be restricted to the maximum amount of water heretofore actually diverted and beneficially applied during a given period of time. In other words, the extent of its previous beneficial use is the measure of its existing right.

[2, 3] It seems clear also that the greatest amount diverted and used in any one calendar year of the prescriptive period should likewise be the limit beyond which the city may not claim. An hourly, daily, or monthly total would not seem to be so just or reasonable. During the year are witnessed all the seasons, and consequently the periods of peak or low requirements. To restrict respondent to such annual maximum is not to measure the right by averages, as contended by it, but is to measure it by the highest exact volume of water previously used. It seems plain that to fix a definite prescriptive right in these waters two factors, instead of one, must be considered: (1) Rate of pumping, and (2) amount taken over a given period. To fix a maximum rate of 828,000 gallons per day and to fix the maximum amount that may be taken in any calendar year, at the highest amount pumped during any year of the prescriptive period, is to satisfy both these factors.

To discuss the further subsidiary questions raised by counsel, it is necessary to say further that the said underground and percolating water is found in gravel strata over an area described as extending from the bay of San Francisco to the base of the hills east of Hayward in one direction, and from San Leandro creek on the north to Alameda creek on the southeast in the other; that the sources of said underground waters are a number of natural watercourses rising in the hills to the north and east of this basin. Plaintiff's lands overlie a part of this natural underground basin or reservoir; likewise the small area of lands belonging to the city of Hayward, upon which exist the five or more wells which are producing the water here in question, also overlie this underground basin and are situated near the town of Alvarado in Alameda county. Not only this, but all that portion of the city of Hayward itself lying west of Castro street therein overlies this water strata. That portion of said city lying east of said street is not over said basin.

Appellant insists that a distinction must be preserved between the right belonging to the lands of said city overlying the water basin and those beyond it; the idea being that the lands to the west of said street have an inherent right under the law in said underground waters and those to the east have no such right. The court in this connection found: "The court finds by reason of admissions made by the pleadings the fact to be that of said maximum daily quantity of 828,000 gallons of water so pumped by defendant and carried through said pipe line, 364,000 gallons per day was used by the consumers of water furnished water by defendant within the territory overlying said bodies of underground and percolating water, to-wit: within the territory lying to the west of Castro street in the City of Hayward and the balance of said water was used by the consumers of water furnished water by defendant on land to the east of said Castro street and beyond the land overlying said said bodies of underground and percolating water, and that of said maximum monthly average quantity of water so pumped by defendant and carried through said pipe line, to-wit: 679,200 gallons per day, a monthly average of 329,000 gallons per day was used by the consumers of water furnished water by defendant within the said territory overlying the said bodies of underground and percolating water and the balance thereof was used by the consumers of water furnished water by defendant on land to the east of said Castro street and beyond said bodies of percolating water."

[4] We are not impressed with the materiality of the particular place of use by the city of the water so taken by it. Such water, when taken and reduced to possession, is impressed with a public use, is carried to reservoirs of the city for distribution, and is there sold and used without reference to the underlying basin from which it was taken. This act of the city is that of a genuine appropriator, and when the prescriptive period runs the right is vested. To use the water, or any part thereof, on lands overlying the basin, is not to render to such lands a right to which they are by law entitled; likewise, to use more or less of the water on lands outside the basin is not to shift the place of use. The right of respondent in said underground waters, within the limits imposed, is plenary and without restriction as to place of beneficial use.

[5] Lastly, respondent insists that if a prescriptive right to the extent claimed cannot be sustained, nevertheless it may claim that a public use has intervened as to the amount of water fixed by the judgment, and for that reason an injunction must be denied and the individual landowners of plaintiff district relegated to a suit at law for damages suffered by this taking for public use. In this behalf we are likewise at a loss to see how respondent may claim the intervention of a public use in more water than it has actually taken and beneficially used of said waters. It is true that the capacity of its system of pumps has been enlarged at a considerable expense to carry the amount of 864,000 gallons per day, but the court expressly found that said city never intended to claim beyond 828,000 gallons per day nor any amount in excess of the reasonable requirements of said city. This amount it has had. These facts distinguish the instant case from Collier v. Merced Irr. Dist., 213 Cal. 554, 2 P.(2d) 790.

By the judgment as interpreted herein, and by the limitations fixed above, respondent will enjoy to the full extent its sustained claim to said waters. There is therefore no distinction in this cause between the amount to which a prescriptive right has attached and the amount as to which a public use has intervened.

Section two of the judgment (following the property description) is therefore modified by inserting after the word "gallons," in the phrase "but not exceeding however in any one day more water than 828,000 gallons," these words, "and not exceeding in any one calendar year more water than 182,646,000 gallons"; also by inserting after the word "day," in the phrase "within said maximum quantity of 828,000 gallons per day," these words, "and 182,646,000 gallons per annum." Section three of said judgment is modified by striking out the period at the close thereof and adding the words, "or in excess of 182,646,000 gallons in any one calendar year." And, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed; appellant to recover its costs on appeal.

COLORADO POWER CO. v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

Sac. 4565.

Supreme Court of California.

July 28, 1933.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨78, 133.

Seasonal storage of water for power purposes is not proper riparian use, but constitutes appropriation, which may ripen into prescriptive right.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨85.

Lower riparian owner, whose riparian use is substantially disturbed by upper riparian owner's seasonal storage of water for power purposes, may have injunction or damages.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨53.

Use of stream for power purposes, notwithstanding necessity of damming stream and temporarily detaining water, where water is presently returned to stream, is proper riparian use.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨87.

Finding that lower riparian owner, besides release of water impounded by upper riparian owner, was entitled to $1,000 damages, held not inconsistent with finding that former's land would be physically benefited.

From consideration of all findings, it appeared that monetary damage was allowed fairly to compensate lower riparian owner for difference in market value of its property, as distinguished from physical effects if water was actually released by upper riparian owner in accordance with its proposed plan of operation, and if such released water actually reached lower riparian owner's property.

5. Appeal and error ⇨907(2).

In absence of evidence on which findings were based, findings, fairly construable as consistent with each other, held conclusive on appeal.

6. Appeal and error ⇨907(3).

In appeal on judgment roll alone, appellate court must assume that evidence supported findings.

PER CURIAM.

Defendant appeals, on the judgment roll alone, from all but two specified portions of a judgment in an action brought by the plaintiff to enjoin defendant from interfering with the natural flow of the north fork of the Mokelumne river in violation of plaintiff's riparian rights. The action was tried before the court without a jury, and resulted in a verdict denying the injunction on condition defendant pay the plaintiff $1,000 as damages, and giving the plaintiff the further right to compel the defendant to release and discharge the waters involved, substantially in accordance with a plan submitted by defendant and pleaded as a special defense in its amended answer. The trial court retained jurisdiction of the cause for this purpose. Plaintiff does not appeal.

The judgment specifically provided: "If said sum of $1,000 and plaintiff's costs of suit, together with legal interest thereon from the date of entry of this judgment, shall not be recovered by, or paid to, plaintiff within ten days after the judgment herein shall have become final, then defendant, its successors and assigns, shall be and hereby are enjoined and restrained from impounding or storing" any of the waters in question.

The facts as found by the trial court and so far as pertinent here are as follows:

The plaintiff, a California corporation, is the owner of certain lands riparian to the Mokelumne river. These lands are located about ten miles downstream from Electra.

So far as defendant is concerned, plaintiff possesses the full riparian rights incidental to its ownership of these lands, subject only to certain vested appropriation rights of defendant, which rights were fully protected by the judgment in this case. The physical characteristics of plaintiff's lands are such as to admit of the economical construction and operation thereon of a low head hydroelectric power project. Plaintiff, for some time has been planning to construct such a plant on its lands, using the unregulated flow of the stream as motive power. The trial court found that the construction of such a plant was feasible, and was economically justified by the agricultural and industrial demands for electric energy in the territory adjacent to plaintiff's proposed project.

Defendant, also a California corporation, is the owner of a hydroelectric power plant located on the Mokelumne river at Electra, about ten miles upstream from plaintiff's lands. For many years, defendant, by means of reservoirs, ditches, and canals, has impounded a portion of the flow of the Mokelumne river for power purposes and for other public purposes. These water rights were gained by defendant by virtue of valid appropriations, and are not involved on this appeal, the judgment herein fully recognizing defendant's rights therein. Defendant owns certain other lands, upstream from Electra and riparian to the north fork of the Mokelumne river and some of its tributaries. The north fork is a tributary of the Mokelumne river and joins the latter a short distance upstream from Electra. For some time prior to the commencement of this action defendant has been in the process of constructing several large dams and reservoirs on these upper riparian lands for the purpose of impounding, storing, and regulating all of the usual, periodic, and natural flow of the north fork and some of its tributaries for power purposes. In anticipation of this proposed power development, defendant acquired certain permits issued by the state water commission, acquired a license from the Federal Power Commission, and a certificate from the State Railroad Commission to the effect that public convenience and necessity required the construction and operation of this project. It is defendant's plan to impound and store the water of the north fork and some of its tributaries in these proposed reservoirs annually, to their capacity, and, by means thereof, to regulate artificially the flow of the stream in the manner as specifically set forth in its amended answer, in a special defense. In this defense, defendant set forth that it was its intention to impound and store in its proposed reservoirs during the seasonal periods of high flow so much of the waters of the north fork and its tributaries as would be necessary to fill the reservoirs to their respective capacities, and to release the same in dry seasons of the year so as, at all times, so far as possible, to maintain a regulated flow throughout the year. It should be here mentioned that the usual and ordinary flow of the north fork is very irregular.

The trial court also found that the proposed storage would produce artificial changes in the natural and periodic flow of the Mokelumne river where it flows over plaintiff's lands; that such storage "would necessitate changes in plaintiff's present plans for the construction of a power plant, and the use of the waters of the Mokelumne river for the operation of such plant on plaintiff's said riparian lands, and would necessitate changes in plaintiff's proposed beneficial riparian use of the waters of said river, and would cause substantial damage to the plaintiff through the invasion and violation of plaintiff's riparian rights by the establishment of an artificial control of the principal tributary of the Mokelumne river above the lands of the plaintiff, adversely to plaintiff's right to the natural flow of said river."

The court also found that defendant, by means of its dams and reservoirs and gates and works to be installed therein, will have the power "to impound and store waters in said reservoirs to the capacity thereof, and to release and return the stored water to the river according to its will and convenience. There is no assurance, except such as is afforded by nature and by the law of the land, that the waters to be impounded and stored in said reservoirs and to be discharged therefrom, and to be used and returned to the Mokelumne river at or above the tail-race of Electra power plant by the defendant, will actually flow down to and over the lands of the plaintiff and other lower riparian proprietors."

The lower court also found that, "considered solely with reference to physical effects," the proposed storage and artificial regulation of the stream, if carried out as proposed by defendant, will not "interfere with any actual or anticipated beneficial use of the waters of the Mokelumne river by the plaintiff upon its said riparian lands, or damage or diminish the value of said lands" if defendant shall actually return the regulated waters into the Mokelumne river in accordance with its proposed plan, and if such waters so released actually shall flow down to plaintiff's riparian lands.

A portion of another finding reads: "[S]uch storage and defendant's proposed regulation of the natural flow of water in said North Fork by means of such storage and the discharge of stored water from the last mentioned reservoirs would constitute a violation and invasion of plaintiff's riparian rights, as owner of its said riparian lands, to the use thereon of the waters of the said Mokelumne river, as such waters would naturally flow, and, if continued for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations, would irreparably impair such riparian rights, and would thereby damage the plaintiff, and therefore ought to be enjoined, unless defendant shall pay to plaintiff just compensation for the damage to be caused by defendant's violation and invasion of plaintiff's said riparian rights."

Also a part of finding XXIV is as follows: "Plaintiff is entitled to recover from defendant just compensation for all damage suffered and to be suffered by reason of the violation and invasion of plaintiff's riparian rights by defendant's impounding and storage of waters in said Salt Springs, Deer Valley and Lower Bear River Reservoirs, and defendant's regulation of the natural flow of the Mokelumne river by means of such impounding and storage of water, and the subsequent discharge of stored water from said reservoirs, as proposed by defendant in its said additional defense. The amount of such just compensation is hereby ascertained and determined to be the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000), together with the right to compel defendant, its successors and assigns (a) to release and discharge [here follows the amount of water to be released and the conditions thereof]."

[1-3] The major contention of defendant is that under the facts of this case the seasonal storage of water for power purposes constitutes a legitimate riparian use. This point has been so recently before this court and so fully and completely disposed of adversely to defendant's contention that no necessity exists for a lengthy discussion here. Seasonal storage of water for power purposes is not a proper riparian use, but constitutes an appropriation, so that, if continued for the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, it will ripen into a prescriptive right. The lower riparian proprietor, in such a case, when such storage substantially interferes with any existing or prospective riparian use of the waters of the stream, is entitled to an injunction to restrain such use, or damages for the invasion of his riparian rights. The above propositions were fully and completely settled in Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co., 200 Cal. 81, 252 P. 607, and in Seneca Con. Gold Mines Co. v. Great Western Power Co., 209 Cal. 206, 287 P. 93, 70 A. L. R. 210. These two cases set at rest the question of whether an upper riparian owner can, in the exercise of a riparian right, dam the entire flow of a stream and hold the water from the wet season to be used in the dry season, and return the water to the stream at its own will and convenience. These two cases determined that such sequestration of the waters of a stream was not authorized by the riparian right and constituted an appropriation of the waters of the stream. In the Herminghaus Case, the action was by a lower riparian against an upper riparian owner who proposed to store seasonally and artificially the flow of the waters of the stream. The upper riparian owner contended that this was a proper riparian use. The point presented for decision was whether or not seasonal storage was a proper riparian use, and this court squarely held that it was not. An injunction in favor of the lower riparian owner was affirmed. In that decision this court recognized, and now recognizes, that the use of the stream for power purposes, even where it is necessary to dam the stream and temporarily detain the water, where the water so detained is presently returned to the stream, is a proper riparian use, but in no uncertain language held that rule had no application to seasonal storage, resulting in an artificial regulation of the entire flow of the stream.

If there were any doubt as to the holding and effect of the Herminghaus Case, it was fully set at rest by the decision of this court in the Seneca Case. In the Seneca Case, the upper riparian owner had stored the water for the period required by the statute of limitations. During this entire period the plaintiff, a lower riparian proprietor, had enjoyed the use of all the water of the stream which it needed for riparian purposes. The lower riparian owner complained that, so far as it was concerned, the storage by the upper riparian owner was in the exercise of the riparian right, and that therefore no prescriptive rights had been acquired by the upper riparian owner. The trial court, in effect, so held. In reversing the lower court, this court, following the reasoning of the Herminghaus and other cases, unequivocally held that seasonal storage was not a riparian use.

The reasoning used in the above two cases and the decisions therein, completely dispose of the contentions of appellant in the present case. It must therefore be held that seasonal storage is not a proper riparian use but constitutes an appropriation of the waters.

We do not find it necessary to discuss the question of whether an upper riparian owner may appropriate water when such water is in excess of all the reasonable present or prospective needs of lower riparian owners. In the present case the trial court found that the proposed storage would cause substantial damage to plaintiff.

[4-6] In accordance with the proceeding approved in Collier v. Merced Irrigation District, 213 Cal. 554, 2 P.(2d) 790, the trial court ordered the defendant as part compensation to release and return to the channel a minimum amount of "not less than 475 cubic feet of water per second, whenever conditions of rain and snowfall and storage shall permit," but the court was very patently of the opinion that such requirement did not fully or fairly compensate the plaintiff for the damage done by the defendant in asserting a right to withdraw from the stream a part of its natural flow, and that such compensation would not be complete until $1,000 additional was paid. The finding to this effect is not contrary to, or inconsistent with, the finding that, if defendant actually releases the stored water in accordance with its proposed plan of operation, and if the stored water so released actually reaches plaintiff's property, plaintiff's lands "considered solely with reference to physical effects" (italics ours) will not be injured, but benefited. From a reading and consideration of all the findings, together with the italicized words in the last sentence, it seems plain to us that the monetary damage was allowed to fairly compensate the plaintiff for the difference in the market value of its property as distinguished from the "physical effect" if the water is released and if it reaches plaintiff's property. The findings being fairly susceptible of such construction are conclusive upon the questions in the absence of the evidence upon which they are based. In fact, we are bound to assume that the evidence adduced before the trial court sustained the proposition that the difference in market value of plaintiff's lands with the natural flow of the stream and the flow commanded by the court was the sum of $1,000.

[7, 8] Defendant likewise complains of that portion of the judgment commanding it to operate its reservoirs in a prescribed manner. It contends that it was error thus to enjoin defendant in the absence of any finding that it intended to operate its reservoirs in any other manner. Defendant cites cases holding, in accordance with well-settled principles of equity, that a plaintiff cannot obtain an injunction against mere fancied wrongs nor against possible wrongful acts which the defendant has never attempted or threatened to do. See International Register Co. v. Recording Fare Register Co. (C. C. A.) 151 F. 199; Fackler v. Cincinnati, etc., Co., 229 Ky. 339, 17 S.W.(2d) 194; Lorenz v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 243, 31 P. 54. The rule of those cases has no application to the case at bar. In the instant case, the defendant in its answer, as amended to conform to proof, in a special defense to plaintiff's petition for an injunction, set forth in detail its proposed plan of storage and release of the waters, and prayed that the trial court ascertain and determine the respective rights of the parties. The defendant, in effect, asked the trial court to permit it to store the water upon its offer to release the water stored according to a certain plan. The right of plaintiff to compel defendant to release the waters substantially in accordance with this plan, which was granted by the judgment, was given to plaintiff as a part of the compensation for the damage to its riparian rights. This type of award is substantially in accordance with the procedure authorized by this court in Collier v. Merced Irrigation District, supra. Moreover, it is a fundamental principle of equity that, if circumstances will permit, the equity court will strive to determine the entire controversy, and will award full and final relief so as to bring all possible litigation over the subject-matter within the compass of one judicial determination. That principle applies with particular force to the instant case. Defendant, having succeeded in limiting the monetary award of $1,000, upon its announced intention to release the water in accordance with a proposed plan, is objecting to the force of the judgment binding it to so release the water, and would remit the plaintiff to a series of separate actions to protect the benefit which defendant offered plaintiff as a means of reducing the monetary compensation. The judgment as rendered was clearly within the powers of the equity court.

The other contentions made by defendant are so unsubstantial as not to require comment. For the foregoing reasons, those portions of the judgment appealed from are affirmed.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

This is an appeal from a final judgment in an action for the specific performance of the terms of trust deeds. The facts essential to an understanding of the contentions of appellants are as follows: On March 1, 1923, P. J. Van Loben Sels executed his promissory note for $600,000 to the Mercantile Trust Company of California, and to secure the same, and such additional advances as might be made, executed a trust deed covering 4,000 acres or more of land situated in the counties of Sacramento, Yolo, and Colusa. The name of the Mercantile Trust Company was subsequently changed to American Trust Company, and the American Securities Company was substituted as trustee. Advances were made until on February 14, 1928, the total sum secured by the deed of trust was $1,194,108.92. However, on March 3, 1927, P. J. Van Loben Sels died, and the real property mentioned, subject to the deed of trust, was distributed by a decree for that purpose to the appellant, Maurits Carel Constantyn Van Loben Sels, who, together with his wife, on February 14, 1928, executed a new note for the above-mentioned sum of $1,194,108.92 in favor of the American Trust Company, and secured it, and such further advances as might be made, by a trust deed in which the American Securities Company was named as trustee. This deed of trust expressly recognized the one executed in 1923, and recited that it was not in any wise to be considered as payment of the indebtedness secured thereby or as releasing the same. It further provided that the defendants and appellants should not be personally liable for the indebtedness. Further advances were made until the total sum amounted to $1,646,864.97. Both deeds of trust contained the following: "The trustee, its successors or assigns, may at any time, at its option, commence and maintain suit in any court of competent jurisdiction and obtain the aid and direction of said court in the execution by it of the trusts, or any of them herein expressed or contained, and may in such suit obtain orders or decrees, interlocutory or final, of said court directing the execution of said trusts." Both trust indentures contained provisions that in the event of default the trustee might either by itself or by a receiver appointed for the purpose take possession of the premises and perform such acts of repair or cultivation as might be necessary or proper to conserve the value thereof, and to collect and receive the income therefrom. In the second deed of trust there was also a provision authorizing the same to be foreclosed, at the option of the trustee, as a mortgage, and also empowering the trustee to "use, operate, manage and control said property and conduct the business thereon."

On February 10, 1931, this action was commenced, alleging the execution of the notes and deeds of trust, the accrued indebtedness, the default of the defendants, the provisions for taking possession by a receiver to cultivate and conserve the property and to collect and receive the income, the fact that defendants were released from personal liability; that the value of the property was less than $1,000,000; that the property was in immediate need of cultivation, such as the spraying of the pear trees, the plowing and preparation of the soil for annual crops, the care of an asparagus crop growing thereon, and attention to the drainage ditches; and that defendant Maurits Van Loben Sels had failed and refused and was without means to properly care for the same. Plaintiffs asked for decree for the specific performance of the provisions of the deeds of trust; that a receiver be appointed to conserve the property and the rents, issues, and profits thereof; and that defendants be restrained from interfering with any of the rights conferred upon plaintiff. Based upon this complaint and two affidavits which averred that the entire property was worth not more than $1,000,000, and that it was in immediate need of care and cultivation in order that it might produce the normal amount of crops, the court made its order ex parte appointing a receiver. Subsequently the defendants made a motion to vacate the last-named order, which motion was heard on May 4, 1931, and denied June 13, 1931. At the hearing the appellant Maurits Van Loben Sels testified that only about 150 or 175 acres were devoted to orchard, of which four-fifths or thereabouts was set to pears, all accessible from the county highway. Otherwise the motion was submitted upon the complaint, the two affidavits, and the argument of counsel. No appeal was taken from the order appointing the receiver nor was one attempted to be taken from the order declining to vacate the order appointing the receiver. Judgment was allowed to go by default and was entered July 28, 1931.

The appellants' attack upon the judgment really amounts to an assertion that the court was without jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, because the action is one at law, in ejectment, rather than one in equity. We might yield greater space to a discussion of the contention, but for the fact that recently we decided the case of Mines v. Superior Court, 216 Cal. 776, 16 P.(2d) 732, in which case we concluded that an action the same as the one now before us was equitable in character and that the appointment of a receiver was within the power of the court. The opinion therein concludes appellants' argument here.

The respondents contend that appellants are not entitled to have reviewed the order appointing the receiver or the order refusing to vacate the first-named order in this appeal from the judgment, because the first order is an appealable one under section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the record discloses that appellants had notice of it immediately after it was made at the time when they surrendered possession of the property to the receiver in deference to the order. We must agree that there is much merit in respondents' position, but, inasmuch as the appeal is properly before us, we may dispose of it upon the ground already mentioned, without deciding the question raised by respondents, which is not entirely free from doubt.

JEFFERY v. STEVENS et al.

Sac. 4743.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 22, 1933.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8).

In suit for injunction, evidence held not to show defendants acquired prescriptive right to have waters flow across plaintiff's land.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨152(1).

Where defendant allowed waste water from his lands to flow across plaintiff's lands, injunction was proper remedy to prevent defendant's gaining prescriptive right, even though no damage was shown.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Suit by Annie Jeffery against Warren Stevens and others. Defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Jerome D. Peters and Herbert Whitten, both of Chico, for appellants.

Bond & Deirup, of Chico, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought to enjoin defendants from permitting waste water from their lands to flow across the land of plaintiff. The essential facts are few. The Crouch ranch lies several miles northeasterly from the plaintiff's property. De Bock slough extends southwesterly through the Crouch property, then through several other lands until it reaches and goes through that of plaintiff. In 1926, defendant Stevens purchased a portion of the Crouch ranch, and defendants Estes and California Lands, Inc., each purchased portions constituting the remainder. The court found that water used by defendants for watering stock was allowed by them to flow into De Bock slough, and thence across plaintiff's land, to her damage. Judgment was given as prayed, enjoining defendants from permitting any water to run over the lands of plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

The position of defendants, taken by them in their answer and cross-complaint, is that the unauthorized drawing of waters complained of has continued openly and under claim of right for over five years, and that consequently defendants have acquired a prescriptive right or easement to have the waters flow in this manner.

Only a brief discussion is necessary, for there is substantial conflict in the relevant testimony on this issue. Defendants produced a number of witnesses who testified that quantities of water habitually flowed from the Crouch ranch through De Bock slough, for many years prior to the action. On the other hand, plaintiff's witness Murphy testified that De Bock slough was not a genuine water course, or even a well-defined slough, but was a system of little lakes and depressions. Nor does the evidence satisfactorily establish that the flow of water during this period continuously reached the land of plaintiff, several miles distant from the Crouch property.

The case of defendants is further weakened by the uncertainty surrounding the essential element of claim of right for the prescriptive period. Plaintiff testified that she herself had no knowledge of any such claim nor any knowledge of the fact that the water was being drained onto her lands. There is no contradiction of her testimony. Defendants assert that she should have known of such claim, but this suggestion is not convincing, in view of the uncertainty as to the source of the water—which might have come, not only from the Crouch ranch, but from other lands lying between it and plaintiff's property. Defendants also rely upon the purported knowledge obtained by plaintiff's son, C. L. Schwein, who managed the farm for her. This knowledge is said to be indicated in a conversation had by Schwein with one Cartwright, who told him that he had gotten stuck with his truck in the slough. Assuming that the knowledge of her said agent should be imputed to plaintiff, the difficulty with the testimony is that it does not clearly appear that the water, if any, came from defendants' lands, and not from others which drained into the slough.

Finally, the evidence shows that in 1926, and again in 1931, just prior to this action, defendant Stevens approached the plaintiff and sought to purchase the drainage right from her. Such action, taken prior to the running of the statute of limitations, offers a strong indication that the use was not adverse to the owner. See Lovell v. Frost, 44 Cal. 471; Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 P. 10; 19 C. J. 884, § 43.

[1] In short, the evidence introduced by defendants to establish the elements of adverse user was not sufficient to meet the burden which the law imposes upon an adverse claimant. See Grimmesey v. Kirtlan, 93 Cal. App. 658, 270 P. 243.

[2] Defendants suggest also that plaintiff has failed to show damage as a result of the drainage. The injunction, however, is proper to prevent the gaining of a prescriptive right or easement which in the future might hamper the use of or lessen the value of the land.

In the state of the record described above, we can see no reason for disturbing the conclusion reached by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 1, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 28, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇄854(3).

Order sustaining demurrer must be affirmed, irrespective of whether order states proper grounds therefor, provided demurrer is well taken as to any of grounds stated therein.

2. Pleading ⇄216(2).

Reference cannot be made on demurrer to superseded complaints to explain, vary, contradict, weaken, or strengthen allegations of last complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 452).

3. Pleading ⇄53(1).

Inconsistencies between alternative counts in complaint cannot be attacked by demurrer.

4. Appeal and error ⇄917(1).

Reviewing court assumes on appeal from judgment sustaining demurrer to complaint that facts are as alleged therein.

5. Appeal and error ⇄917(1).

Reviewing court on appeal from judgment sustaining demurrer is not concerned with plaintiff's ability to prove allegations of complaint.

6. Trusts $\S$ 371(2).

Complaint by borrower against finance company, as holder of deed of trust, and directors thereof, held sufficient to state cause of action for enforcement of promise to bid in property for plaintiff's benefit and hold title subject to redemption, notwithstanding allegations as to loan, notice of default and sale, and plaintiff's failure to obtain bidders.

7. Pleading $\S$ 18.

Uncertainty or ambiguity in pleading matters of inducement does not make cause of action demurrable.

8. Conspiracy $\S$ 13.

Representations of one of conspirators made in pursuance of conspiracy are binding on others.

9. Trusts $\S$ 63½.

Loan company's purchase of property for finance company holding deed of trust, after finance company had agreed to acquire title thereto for borrower's benefit, created resulting trust, not within statute of frauds, and borrower could recover from finance company value of property, less debt, where property had been conveyed to innocent purchaser.

10. Trusts $\S$ 361.

Borrower suing to recover value of property held under resulting trust, and conveyed to innocent third party, was not required to make demand before suit.

11. Trusts $\S$ 365(4).

Action brought by borrower against holder of deed of trust to recover value of property less debt held not barred by laches, where brought within ten months after defendant's repudiation of agreement to bid in property and hold it subject to redemption.

12. Usury $\S$ 142(2).

Action by borrower to recover treble interest on ground of usury held timely, where brought within year from date of sale of property under deed of trust (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

13. Usury $\S$ 137.

Defendants not actually receiving usurious interest held not liable under count of complaint seeking recovery of treble amount of usurious interest paid (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

14. Usury $\S$ 114.

It is always permissible to show that transaction ostensibly lawful actually constituted usurious loan.

15. Usury $\S$ 142(3).

In suit to recover treble interest for usury, facts from which usury appears must be pleaded (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

16. Usury $\S$ 56.

Exaction of commission from borrower by lender's agent will render transaction usurious if known to and authorized or ratified by lender (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

17. Usury $\S$ 56.

Brokerage fees must be considered as part of charge for loan, in suit to recover treble interest for usury, where lender required borrower to procure application from broker and divided brokerage fee (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

18. Usury $\S$ 42.

In testing transaction for usury, interest must be computed on actual sum advanced from date of advancement.

19. Usury $\S$ 42.

Where loan was available to borrower only in progress installments, and sum was held subject to conditions, some of which were not under borrower's control, any interest in excess of legal rate on sum actually available constituted usury (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

20. Usury $\S$ 137.

To recover treble interest, agreement for loan must be usurious in its inception (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

21. Usury $\S$ 42.

Transaction is usurious where excessive interest on loan is caused by contingency not under control of borrower.

22. Pleading $\S$ 12.

Less particularity is required in allegations of complaint, where facts stated are such that defendant, from their nature and his relation to them, has full information.

23. Usury $\S$ 142(3).

Complaint by borrower for recovery of treble interest for usury held not deficient for failure specifically to state dates and amounts of advances, where plaintiff alleged such facts were unknown to him and called upon defendant for discovery.

24. Usury $\S$ 42.

To determine usury, interest should be considered only for period of loan, and not after maturity (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3757, $\S$ 3).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Suit by William L. Penziner against the West American Finance Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with instructions.

For prior opinion, see 14 P.(2d) 810.

Bronte M. Aikins, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, of San Francisco (Christopher M. Jenks, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Pacific State Savings and Loan Co.

John A. Sinclair and A. Don Duncan, both of San Francisco, for respondents R. T. Harper, C. A. Gibson, J. E. Scully, and E. W. Milburn.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for respondent West American Finance Co.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Three demurrers, special and general in form, were interposed to each of the four counts of the third amended complaint respectively by (1) West American Finance Company (hereinafter called the finance company), (2) Pacific States Savings & Loan Company (hereinafter called the loan company), and (3) R. T. Harper, C. A. Gibson, J. E. Scully, and E. W. Milburn jointly and separately. All demurrers were sustained by an order, general in form, which did not specify the ground of the ruling nor grant leave to amend. Two days later a judgment, reciting that the court found the complaint did not state a cause of action, was rendered in favor of defendants for their costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, claiming that the demurrers were erroneously sustained.

[1-5] The following general rules govern our consideration of counsels' arguments. If a demurrer is well taken as to any of the grounds stated therein, the order sustaining it must be affirmed, irrespective of whether the order states no or an erroneous ground therefor. Haddad v. McDowell, 213 Cal. 690, 3 P.(2d) 550, Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 456, 98 P. 21. Section 452 of the Code of Civil Procedure commands that a complaint be liberally construed when passing upon a demurrer thereto. Terry Trading Corp. v. Barsky, 210 Cal. 428, 292 P. 474, 475. Reference cannot be made to superseded complaints to explain, vary, contradict, weaken, or strengthen the allegations of the last complaint. Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 P. 625; Dougall v. Schulenberg, 101 Cal. 154, 35 P. 635; Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 124 P. 1004; Maddux v. Mora, 99 Cal. App. 695, 279 P. 467. Inconsistencies between alternative counts cannot be attacked by demurrer, since each count stands on its own allegations, unaffected by those contained in other counts. Little v. Union Oil Co., 73 Cal. App. 612, 238 P. 1066. Since the effect of a demurrer is to admit all of the allegations of the complaint which are well pleaded, it must be assumed on appeal from the judgment that all of the facts are as alleged. Isert v. Riecks, 195 Cal. 569, 234 P. 371. Neither plaintiff's ability to prove the allegations of his complaint, nor seeming difficulty in making such proof, concerns the reviewing court. Mox, Incorporated, v. Woods, 202 Cal. 675, 262 P. 302.

The first two counts of the complaint charge all defendants except the loan company; the last two counts charge only the loan company, R. T. Harper and C. A. Gibson. Each count alleges the facts concisely narrated in this paragraph. The finance company and the loan company were corporations, the individual defendants being directors of the former, and R. T. Harper being its president. The finance company was engaged in the business of making construction loans to owners of real property for the improvement thereof under a plan whereby it advanced the amount of such loan in payment of labor and material as the work progressed, but exacted interest monthly in advance upon the whole amount to be advanced regardless of the amount then actually advanced. The First Mortgage Bond Company (hereinafter called the broker), occupying the same office, was engaged as agent for the finance company in soliciting applications for such loans, charging borrowers a fee therefor, and dividing such fee with the finance company. On August 15, 1927, plaintiff, desiring to erect on described land owned by him a nine-story class "A" apartment house, applied to the finance company for a construction loan of $150,000 to be used for such purpose, was requested by its president to procure from the broker a form of application, directed to the latter, but regularly used by the former, which application was signed and delivered to the finance company, which forthwith notified plaintiff of its approval. The application applied to the broker for a loan of $150,000 "for a term of one year at 7% interest per annum, payable monthly in advance from date of note and deed of trust, to be secured by a deed of trust on said lot," described the building to be erected, and provided that the loan was to be advanced, on plaintiff's order, in installments as the building progressed, at the times and in the amounts stipulated by the broker, in payment of labor and material, and that plaintiff was to pay a premium of 3 per cent. of the loan and to allow the broker to maintain fire insurance for the sum of $150,000. The next day plaintiff executed and delivered to the finance company his note for the principal and interest specified in the application, and to R. T. Harper and C. A. Gibson, as trustees, his deed of trust conveying his land upon the usual trusts as security for the loan. In the usual course of construction, one year was reasonably necessary for the erection of the apartment house, and therefore progress payments would be made at such times that interest on the full amount of the loan would exceed 12 per cent. on the actual sums advanced. The application was furnished for the purpose of enabling the finance company to obtain usurious interest, and at the making of the application and execution of the note and deed of trust plaintiff and defendants believed usurious interest would be paid, and the finance company intended to exact usurious interest. During the year ending August 16, 1928, the finance company advanced money in an amount which plaintiff is unable to state, but believes did not exceed $100,000. The finance company recorded, on August 17, 1928, notice of default, and caused the trustees to publish notice that they would sell the property on December 31, 1928.

The first cause of action alleges the following additional facts: Before the commencement of this action, the finance company, upon plaintiff's demand, rendered him an untrue account of its advances. On or about August 16, 1928, defendants combined and conspired to defraud and deprive plaintiff of his title to land and apartment house and of his interest in the proceeds of the sale. Pursuant to the conspiracy, the finance company recorded the above notice of default, caused the above publication of notice of sale, and purportedly assigned the note to the loan company for an unknown consideration, but with the understanding that the latter would bid in the property at the sale, obtain a deed therefor from the trustees, and thereafter convey the same to the former. Also, pursuant to the conspiracy, the trustees offered the property for sale as advertised, the loan company bid therefor $150,000, the trustees accepted this bid, and executed and delivered to the loan company a deed for the property which acknowledged receipt of the bid in gold coin. The loan company on or about March 13, 1929, conveyed to the finance company, and the latter conveyed to a third party for an unknown consideration and without first giving plaintiff an opportunity to redeem. Before the sale plaintiff received from a named person, who was ready, able, and willing so to do, an offer to advance the money necessary to pay the debt or to purchase the property at the sale for their joint account, and advised R. T. Harper of such offer. Thereupon, the latter, in pursuance of the conspiracy, informed him that it would be unwise to sacrifice his equity, and, without an intention of performance, represented that it would be unnecessary to carry out the offer, as the title would be bid in by the finance company, held for his protection, and reconveyed at any time upon payment of his debt. Relying upon these representations, plaintiff refused the offer, abandoned all attempts to raise the money to pay the debt or to bid, and permitted the sale without any bid on his behalf. In further pursuance of the conspiracy, R. T. Harper falsely represented to prospective bidders, who otherwise would have bid at the sale, that the property was to be bought in by the finance company for the benefit and protection of plaintiff. As part of the conspiracy, the finance company and the trustees agreed with the loan company that it would bid $150,000, and the latter so did. This was the only bid. When plaintiff, surprised at the sale to the loan company, reminded R. T. Harper of his representations, the latter, in furtherance of the conspiracy, stated the loan company took title for the finance company and he would still be permitted to redeem at any time upon payment of his debt. Daily, from January 2d to 11th, both inclusive, plaintiff offered R. T. Harper to pay his debt and to redeem his property, and inquired of him the amount of such debt and time of redemption, but R. T. Harper, in pursuance of the conspiracy, rejected the offer, failed to state either amount or time, and evaded questions, and on the last day informed plaintiff he could not redeem, and refused an accounting of the proceeds of the sale. The value of the property at the time of the sale was $450,000 without reference to the debt, and plaintiff has been damaged $350,000.

[6-8] The first count does not contain the elements, imperfectly and not separately stated, of several causes of action as defendants respectively contend, but sets forth but one cause, which seeks the enforcement of Harper's promise that the finance company purchase the property at the sale for plaintiff's benefit and hold title thereto subject to his redemption. The allegations as to the loan, the advancement thereof, the execution of the note and deed of trust, the notice of default and sale, the sale, and plaintiff's inability to get bidders, are matters of inducement necessary to a proper understanding of the wrong done plaintiff. The gist of this count is Harper's promise and its breach. Moropoulos v. C. H. & O. B. Fuller Co., 186 Cal. 679, 200 P. 601. Any uncertainty or ambiguity in matters of inducement does not make the cause of action demurrable in those respects. Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 22 P. 1137. The formation and consummation of the conspiracy is adequately and properly alleged. Moropoulos v. C. H. & O. B. Fuller Co., supra; Mox, Incorporated, v. Woods, supra. The representations of Harper were, therefore, binding upon the other defendants, and each is liable for their breach. Mox, Incorporated, v. Woods, supra. Hence it is unnecessary to consider the scope of Harper's authority, as its president, to bind the finance company, or the liability of the personal defendants as its directors.

[9-11] The purchase of the property by the loan company on behalf of the finance company, after Harper had represented that the latter would acquire title for plaintiff's benefit and hold it subject to his redemption, constituted a loan by the finance company to plaintiff of the purchase price, secured by the title, and the repudiation of this relation created a resulting trust which is not within the statute of frauds. Webb v. Vercoe, 201 Cal. 754, 258 P. 1099, 54 A. L. R. 1200; notes 42 A. L. R. 10, 78 and 54 A. L. R. 1198. Since the conveyance to an innocent third party rendered impossible the impressing of a trust upon the property, plaintiff was entitled to recover its value, less his debt. Price v. Reeves, 38 Cal. 457. The matter of usurious interest, which affects the amount of that debt, will be subsequently discussed. Since a demand before suit was unnecessary (Crozier v. Soquel, 101 Cal. App. 402, 281 P. 698), it will be needless to discuss the sufficiency of plaintiff's offer to pay his debt. An action to establish a resulting trust and to recover a money judgment instead of the trust property must be brought within four years of the repudiation of the trust. 16 Cal. Jur. 480; 25 Cal. Jur. 269, 271. The present action was brought within ten months after such repudiation. No fact is averred from which acquiescence can be inferred or which would render granting relief inequitable. The demurrer for laches therefore was not well taken. Stevenson v. Boyd, 153 Cal. 630, 96 P. 284, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 525, Varrois v. Gomet, 43 Cal. App. 756, 185 P. 1001.

The next three counts reiterate the facts common to all, as stated in paragraph 3 hereof. They fix the value of the property at $350,000, which would be the value of the equity under the first count, instead of $450,000, its value as given in the first count. They differ between themselves and the first count as to defendants, as above noted. They also differ among themselves as to the nature of the transaction by which the loan company acquired plaintiff's note, but otherwise in the main contain the same additional facts.

The second count alleges the following facts: On or about December 15, 1928, the finance company borrowed from the loan company $97,500, and, by way of security, pledged the plaintiff's note with the understanding that the loan company would purchase the property at the sale for the finance company, obtain a deed therefor from the trustees, hold the title in lieu of the note as security for the loan, and, upon repayment of such loan, would convey the property to the finance company. Pursuant to this understanding and under the direction of the finance company, the loan company, on behalf of the finance company, but in its own name, bid for the property the sum of $150,000, and the trustees accepted such bid, sold the property to the loan company, and executed and delivered to the loan company a deed conveying that property upon the understanding that the pledge was released, and that title, in lieu of the note, was to be held by the loan company for the finance company, subject to its lien for $97,500, together with interest. At the time of the sale, the finance company had not advanced in excess of $100,000, and, for the purpose of extorting interest in excess of 12 per cent. per annum, had charged as advances the following sums not in fact paid out: $10,500 for interest from August 16, 1927, to August 15, 1928; $4,500 for brokerage, $250 for inspection fee, $150 for appraisal fee, and $25 for drawing papers, totaling $15,425; also $3,937.50 for interest from August 15, 1928, to December 31, 1928. The finance company had also charged, as advances on principal, certain sums not in fact made which would bring the total advances to $150,000. These facts were known to all defendants, and the trustees, with the consent of all defendants, and under instructions of the two companies, neglected to collect the amount of the bid in cash from the loan company, but credited its amount upon the note in payment of both the actual and the fictitious advances. On information and belief, plaintiff alleges that interest on the amount advanced, computed at 12 per cent. per annum from date of actual advance to sale, did not exceed $8,600. Through the sale and conveyance to the loan company for the finance company, plaintiff paid the latter, and the latter extorted from him, for the loan, the sum of $19,362.50, which exceeds 12 per cent. per annum on $100,000, the amount actually advanced. The acts of the finance company were done with the advice, consent, and approval of all defendants.

The third count alleges that on or about December 15, 1928, the finance company sold and assigned to the loan company, for an unknown consideration, and with knowledge of the facts, plaintiff's note. The fourth count alleges that the loan company purchased the note, after maturity, with knowledge that it was to secure advances upon a construction loan, but failed to ascertain the actual amounts advanced.

[12, 13] In each of the last three counts, plaintiff seeks to recover, under section 3 of the Usury Law (Act 3757, Deering's Gen. Laws), treble the amount of interest paid. This section reads as follows: "Every person, * * * who for any loan * * * shall have paid * * * any greater sum * * * than is allowed to be received under the preceding sections, one and two, may * * * recover in an action at law against the person * * * or corporation who shall have taken or received the same * * * treble the amount of the money so paid * * * in violation of said sections, providing such action shall be brought within one year after such payment. * * *" (Italics ours.) The recipient of the interest alone is liable. See, also, 39 Cyc. 1035 and 1038. The interest was paid to and received by the finance company alone, by the application of the amount of the bid made by the loan company at the sale to the claimed debt due to the finance company by the trustees. Obviously, since the loan company as bidder, and Harper and Gibson, as trustees, did not receive the interest, neither of the last two counts states a cause of action. Likewise, since none of the individual defendants received the interest, the second count does not as to them state a cause of action. Since the statute allows, for the commencement of an action, one year from date of payment (Taylor v. Budd (Cal. Sup.) 18 P.(2d) 333; Rice v. Dunlap, 205 Cal. 133, 270 P. 196; Ames v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 210 Cal. 271, 291 P. 182), which in this case was the date of sale, to wit, December 31, 1928, the filing of the original complaint on November 1, 1929, was within time.

[14-17] Whether the second count states a cause of action against the finance company depends upon the sufficiency of its allegations to charge usury. The note provided for interest at 7 per cent. per annum monthly in advance upon the principal. The application provided that the amount of the loan was to be advanced on plaintiff's order in installments as the building progressed and in amounts stipulated by the broker, and that plaintiff was to pay a brokerage of 3 per cent. on the amount of the loan. On its face the transaction does not appear usurious. " * * * It is always permissible to show that a transaction, ostensibly lawful, actually constituted a usurious loan and was made with intent to evade the statute. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 616, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725." Terry Trading Corp. v. Barsky, supra. It is not sufficient to allege the conclusion that the transaction is usurious, but the facts from which usury appears must be pleaded. Mortgage Guarantee Co. v. Patch, 116 Cal. App. 584, 3 P.(2d) 35, 39 Cyc. 1049. The exaction of a commission from the borrower by the lender's agent will render the transaction usurious if such exaction is known to and authorized or ratified by the lender. Niles v. Kavanagh, 179 Cal. 98, 175 P. 462, 1 A. L. R. 831; Rice v. Dunlap, supra; notes, 21 A. L. R. 797, 850, 53 A. L. R. 743, 755. Since the finance company as lender required plaintiff, as borrower, to procure the application from the broker, who was its agent and who divided with it the brokerage, the brokerage, amounting to $4,500, must be considered as part of the charge for the loan. Fees for inspection, appraisal, and drawing papers, totaling $425, charged for the purpose of extorting usurious interest, must also be included in the amount paid for the loan. Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 254 P. 946, 62 A. L. R. 1341.

[18-21] In testing a transaction for usury, interest must be computed on actual sum advanced from date of advancement. Taylor v. Budd, supra. "While the mere fact that the whole sum loaned is not drawn promptly by the borrower does not render the loan usurious, provided the whole sum was held subject to the borrower's order, yet when such a result is in accordance with an agreement made at the time of the loan, the transaction is obviously usurious." 39 Cyc. 959. If the agreement contemplates that the entire loan shall be available to the borrower, mere delay in its payment to him, in the absence of intent to evade the Usury Law, does not make the loan usurious, but if, as a condition of the loan, the borrower is required to leave part with the lender, interest in excess of the legal rate on sum actually available is usurious. Note, 12 A. L. R. 1422. Here, as the application provided that the loan was only available in progress installments, and the entire sum was not held subject to plaintiff's order, and an intent to evade the law is alleged, the above rule is applicable. The agreement must, in its inception, be usurious, for it cannot become so by reason of the borrower's default. Sharp v. Mortgage Security Corp., 215 Cal. 287, 9 P.(2d) 819. Where the excessive interest is caused by a contingency under the lender's control, or not under the borrower's control, the transaction is usurious; otherwise when the contingency is under the borrower's control. 39 Cyc. 951 et seq. The application provided that the loan was payable in installments: (1) For labor and material as the building progressed, (2) upon plaintiff's order, and (3) in amounts stipulated by the broker. The time of payment was fixed by three factors, of which one only was controlled by the borrower.

[22, 23] The complaint alleges that a total of $100,000 only was advanced, but fails to specify the dates of the respective installments, which plaintiff states he does not know. Since the application provides for payment of installments on plaintiff's order, the finance company argues that he should know the date and amount of each installment, and that his failure to so state renders the complaint vulnerable to a general and special demurrer. Since the advances were made on plaintiff's order, he had the means of ascertaining the dates and amounts of such advances. However, the finance company has full knowledge of these facts. Less particularity is required in the allegations of the complaint where the facts in it stated are such that the defendant, from their nature and his relation to them, has full information concerning them. Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462. Plaintiff was not bound to allege the amounts as stated in the account of the finance company. McDermont v. Anaheim Union Water Co., 124 Cal. 112, 56 P. 779. Ordinarily such a complaint should specifically state the dates and amounts of payments, but where, as here, plaintiff alleges that such facts are unknown to him and calls upon defendant for discovery as to such matters, the complaint is sufficient. 39 Cyc. 1049.

[24] To determine usury, interest for the period of the loan and not interest after maturity should be considered. The aggregate of $10,500 for interest, $4,500 for brokerage, and $425 for inspection, appraisal, and drawing papers, totaling $15,425, is in excess of lawful interest at 12 per cent. on $100,000 for a year by the sum of $3,425. Obviously the excess would be greater, if legal interest could be figured on each installment from date of payment to maturity. On this basis it is alleged the interest amounted to $8,600. The second count therefore states a cause of action against the finance company.

From what has been said, it is apparent that the demurrers of the finance company to the first and second counts, and the demurrer of the individual defendants to the first count, were improperly sustained, and that the demurrers of the loan company to the third and fourth counts, and of the individual defendants to the last three counts, were correctly sustained. The judgment is affirmed as to the loan company and reversed as to the finance company and the individual defendants, with instructions to overrule the demurrer of the finance company as to the first two counts, and the demurrer of the individual defendants as to the first count, with leave to answer.

Justice's court held to have jurisdiction in buyer's action upon contract for conversion of automobile by seller, though contract provided for waiver of damages if seller repossessed automobile upon buyer's failure to make any payment.

Original application for certiorari by W. J. Mannix and others to review a judgment of the Superior Court, in and for the County of Sacramento and Martin I. Welsh, Judge.

Writ dismissed.

R. H. Schwab and Donald E. Wachhorst, both of Sacramento, for petitioners.

George E. McCutchen and Clifford A. Russell, both of Sacramento, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

An action upon contract was commenced in the justice's court, alleging the wrongful conversion of an automobile by defendant.

The answer was a general denial, and as a further defense the contract, by virtue of which plaintiff had come into possession of the automobile in question, was set forth wherein it was stipulated in effect if the purchaser failed to make any payment therein provided for, the seller could at his option, and without notice to the purchaser, declare all of purchaser's rights under the contract terminated, and immediately retake possession of the automobile. The contract also provided that the purchaser waived all claims for damages due to or connected with such taking. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff (the purchaser) in the justice's court, and, upon appeal to the superior court upon questions of both law and fact, judgment was again given in favor of plaintiff.

[1,2] Petitioner now seeks by a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the superior court, claiming the parties had by their contract stipulated that plaintiff had waived all claim to damages by reason of the taking of the automobile, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the parties by their contract having disposed of the question of damages. Petitioner also claims that the court committed error in ruling upon certain questions of law and evidence. As to that point we are not here concerned. The writ of certiorari cannot be used as a writ of error for the correction of mistakes either of law or fact. Certiorari goes only to the jurisdiction or the power of the court to act and can never be substituted for an appeal to review mere errors of a judicial tribunal.

[3-5] The first point suggested, however, that the parties had by their contract waived any right of action for damages for the alleged unlawful taking, merits some attention. Ordinarily where a party has a right of appeal certiorari will not lie, and it is equally true that once jurisdiction has been obtained over the parties and subject-matter of the action no error committed by the court can be corrected on certiorari. Where, however, it is claimed the justice's court was without jurisdiction an appellate court will examine into the question of jurisdiction to ascertain whether or not the lower court had the right to consider the subject (Denninger v. Recorders' Court, 145 Cal. 629, 79 P. 360), and, as was suggested in Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 112, 43 P. 580, and affirmed in McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 P. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691, while the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error it is nevertheless a means by which the power of the court can be inquired into, and for that purpose the review may extend not only to the record of the court below, but even to the evidence itself when necessary to determine the jurisdictional facts. A court cannot, by presuming to act, invest itself with jurisdiction. Therefore it is proper to inquire into the record, but solely to determine that question.

The question here to be determined is: Did the justice's court, in view of the provision of the contract as to the waiver of damages, have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action? We are of the opinion it had such jurisdiction.

[6-9] Upon the filing of the complaint in the justice's court, being an action for conversion and within the statutory limit as to amount, and no question being raised as to service on defendant, that court acquired jurisdiction. "Where a court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of the action such jurisdiction carries with it necessarily the authority * * * to decide the question submitted to it, incorrectly as well as correctly. Accordingly, error in exercise of its jurisdiction, however gross, cannot be annulled on certiorari." 4 Cal. Jur. 1036. The defendant's answer was a general denial, and also specially pleaded the contract whereby the entire controversy was presented to the court for determination. A court will not be ousted of jurisdiction of the entire matter by pleading a bar to a single issue only. Furthermore, it is the rule in California, as well as the almost unanimous rule in the United States, that the jurisdiction of a court cannot be ousted by a private agreement of individuals made in advance of the controversy; such contracts being void as against public policy. 7 R. C. L., p. 1046, and cases there cited. As jurisdiction cannot be conferred by contract, neither can it be taken away by that means.

We are therefore of the opinion that the writ of certiorari will not lie for the reason that the justice's court had original jurisdiction of the persons and subject-matter, and errors, if any, were reviewable upon appeal by the superior court, whose determination in the matter was final.

The writ is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Arthur L. Mundo, Judge.

Mrs. Allan B. Monks was convicted of having issued checks without sufficient funds, and she appeals.

Affirmed.

Edgar G. Langford, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Warner I. Praul, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., and John T. Holt, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for the People.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem.

Appellant and one Wiley L. Watson were jointly tried upon an amended information filed by the district attorney of San Diego county charging them with having issued checks without sufficient funds in violation of section 476a of the Penal Code. The information contained four counts, and the appellant was convicted on counts two and three. This is an appeal from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial. The grounds upon which appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial are as follows:

(1) That the evidence adduced at the trial is insufficient to sustain the appellant's conviction of the charge contained in count two of the amended information.

(2) That the evidence adduced at the trial is insufficient to sustain appellant's conviction of the charge contained in count three of the amended information.

(3) That the trial court committed prejudicial error in its rulings upon objections to the admission of evidence during the course of the trial.

(4) That the prosecuting attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct during the course of the trial.

It appears, in substance, from the evidence that the appellant at the time of the commission of the alleged offense was the wife of and living with one Allan B. Monks, the marriage ceremony having been performed December 19, 1930. Apparently Monks, at one time, had been a man of considerable attainments and education. However, at this time he had lost his reason to a degree bordering on idiocy, and he was under the influence of, and his person and acts were entirely controlled by, the appellant. Furthermore, the evidence showed that a trust fund had been established in Boston, Mass., for Mr. Monk's benefit, and from time to time moneys were deposited in that fund to his account in a Boston bank. The trustees of this fund ceased to make deposits, owing to uncertainty on their part as to whether Mr. Monks was still living. This case was prosecuted upon the theory that appellant procured Mr. Monks to draw the checks described in the information on the Boston bank and issue them knowing that there were no funds in the account. The check described in the second count of the information was evidently signed by Mrs. Allan B. Monks, while the check described in the third count of the information was signed "Allan B. Monks." The check which is the basis of the second count of the amended information, upon which the defendant was tried and convicted, was given by Mrs. Monks to one C. S. Dorman on or about February 16, 1932, and was in the sum of $400. The defendant received cash on this check in the amount of $223, and was credited on an old account she had with Mr. Dorman for the balance of the check. Dorman sent the check through the regular channels of business by cashing the same at his personal bank on the day of its receipt, and in due time the check came back to him unpaid by the bank upon which it was drawn. This check was introduced in evidence, together with a protest of said check; it being protested on the ground "account closed." Appellant concedes that the record shows that the protest was in proper form, being in full compliance with the statutes of California, Civil Code, §§ 3234, 3235, 3236, and 3237.

The check which was the basis of the third count of the amended information, upon which the defendant was tried and convicted, was given to Felix Morette, on or about April 1, 1932. It is for the sum of $875. This check likewise was sent through the regular channels of business and in due time the check came back to Morette unpaid by the bank upon which it was drawn. The check was introduced in evidence at the trial of this action, together with protest of said check. It was protested on the ground that there were "no funds." As with the Dorman check, it is likewise conceded that the protest was in proper form.

[1] Appellant complains because of the lapse of time between the issuance of the checks and their protest. The evidence shows that this condition was sought for and occasioned by the appellant's own acts at and shortly after the time the crime was committed in an attempt to hide the crime. The evidence further shows that the appellant also lulled her victim, Morette, by telling him to rest assured that the check had not been paid because of some mistake, and, this being so, she cannot be heard to complain of the condition which she deliberately created. The evidence shows that the defendant, after the check had been issued, fled to Long Beach, Calif., with her codefendant, Watson (who was acquitted by the jury) and a Japanese chauffeur, and her husband, and that the defendant there secured an apartment under a fictitious name. From this place in Long Beach, the defendant finally fled to San Francisco, and was apprehended there by police officers. She denied that her true name was Mrs. Monks, or that she had ever lived in San Diego.

Appellant's counsel cites numerous civil decisions regarding the presentment for protest of checks within reasonable time. In Ryckman v. Fox Film Corporation, 188 Cal. 271, 205 P. 431, 434, the court said: "The appellant makes the further contention that, the check in question having been made and delivered to Goldstein Company by the defendant on December 19, 1917, and not having been indorsed or delivered by its said payee to the plaintiff until March 7, 1918, the check was a stale check of which the respondent could not be held to be a holder in due course. In support of this contention the appellant cites us to sections 3134 and 3266b of the Civil Code, as re-enacted in St. 1917, pp. 1540, 1560, which require that instruments payable on demand should be negotiated within a reasonable time. No evidence was presented in this case by either party showing the cause of the delay in presentment of this check nor by the defendant offering any proof as to any loss occasioned to it by the delay."

The unpaid checks, with the said protests, were presumptive evidence of knowledge of the insufficiency of funds or credit with the bank upon which the checks were drawn. This rule of evidence is set forth in section 476a of the Penal Code as follows: "Where such check, draft or order is protested, on the ground of insufficiency of funds or credit, the notice of protest thereof shall be admissible as proof of presentation, nonpayment and protest and shall be presumptive evidence of knowledge of insufficiency of funds or credit with such bank or depository, or person, or firm, or corporation."

The rule has been approved in the case of People v. Jay Bullock, alias Jay McCanless, 123 Cal. App. 299, 11 P.(2d) 441, 442. The defendant in that case was tried on four counts of issuing checks without sufficient funds, and two counts of forgery. The court says: "* * * The prosecution, in all instances, to support this necessary element of the charges, introduced in evidence 'Protests' of the several instruments. This method of proof of this fact in actions of a civil nature has been sanctioned from time immemorial. It is recognized in such cases by both common law and statutory enactment. In matters involving criminal charges, section 476a of the Penal Code, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1940), made provision for this class of evidence. * * * Nor are we forced, in sustaining the legislation in the instant case, to go as far as courts may properly go, as was said in Yee Hem v. United States (268 U. S. 178, 45 S. Ct. 470, 69 L. Ed. 904), supra: 'If the effect of the legislative act is to give to the facts from which the presumption is drawn an artificial value to some extent, it is no more than happens in respect of a great variety of presumptions not resting upon statute.' [Citing cases.]"

[2, 3] The time that elapsed from the date of issuing the check until its protest merely goes to the weight of the evidence and not to its admissibility. While the check and the protest thereof may have made, because of the passage of time between the issuance and the protest thereof, but slight evidence of the corpus delicti, still when considered with the evidence of appellant's flight it was sufficient upon which to make the admissions and confessions of the defendant admissible. Pen. Code, § 1127c. In the case of People v. Hayes, 72 Cal. App. 292, at page 301, 237 P. 390, 394, the court sets forth as follows: "It is sufficient," as a basis for the offer of a defendant's confession or admissions, 'if there is some proof, or prima facie proof, or even slight proof of the corpus delicti.' 8 Cal. Jur. tit. Crim. Law, § 303."

The evidence shows that the appellant stated to a witness called by the people, that she knew before she passed the check in question set forth in the second count of the information that there was no money in the bank, and to the same witness appellant stated that she had passed bad checks on this bank after the commission of the offense for which she was tried.

[4, 5] Appellant complains, and assigns as error, the admission of evidence showing offenses of a similar character to the one that she was being tried for, i. e., issuing checks without sufficient funds; citing the case of People v. Schneider, 126 Cal. App. 749, 14 P.(2d) 1018, 15 P.(2d) 540. However, that case has no application here. The court does not hold that similar offenses of passing bad checks may not be proven upon a prosecution based on section 476a of the Penal Code. The general and prevailing rule is definite and certain that similar offenses to the one at bar may be proved to show guilty intent of the defendant. People v. Weir, 30 Cal. App. 766, 150 P. 442; People v. Hamby, 55 Cal. App. 37, 202 P. 907; People v. Bercovitz, 163 Cal. 636, 126 P. 479, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 667.

Appellant next complains and assigns as error that Allan B. Monks was called as a witness for the people. The record in this action shows that the appellant was not tried alone, but that Wiley L. Watson, no relative of Allan B. Monks, was a codefendant and tried with appellant. Watson was acquitted by the jury upon this trial. The testimony shows that Wiley L. Watson cashed a check for $180 with one Sam Loeffler. The check was signed by Allan B. Monks, dated March 8, 1932. Under the Penal Code, § 31, it is provided: "All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be felony or misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission * * * and all persons counseling, advising, or encouraging * * * lunatics or idiots, to commit any crime, * * * or who, by threats, menaces, command, or coercion, compel another to commit any crime, are principals in any crime so committed."

It was the contention of the people in the case at bar that Wiley L. Watson perpetrated the crime he was charged with, by counseling, advising, and encouraging a lunatic or idiot to commit the crime of issuing a check without sufficient funds therefor, and that then, after obtaining the check from the idiot or lunatic, willfully and feloniously cashed the same as charged in the information. It became highly important then for the prosecution to use Allan B. Monks as a witness, if possible to do so, for the purpose of showing that he had signed the checks while in a mental condition that showed him to be a lunatic, or idiot or insane, and that he was thus an innocent agency for the commission of the crime while under the influence and control of Wiley L. Watson.

It was also the contention of the people in the case at bar that the defendant, Mrs. Monks, under count three of the information, based upon the check given to Morette, which check was signed by Allan B. Monks, was guilty as a principal because she committed the crime as charged, by using the innocent agent, Allan B. Monks, whom she knew to be then insane, by advising and encouraging and counseling said insane person to write said check, and that the defendant, Mrs. Monks, willfully and feloniously gave the said check to Felix Morette.

[6, 7] It need not be argued that criminal guilt can be fixed when one secures another to perform a criminal act. The agent must be innocent. The cases all turn on the question of innocent knowledge or guilty knowledge. To simplify procedure, to do away with the technicalities of the common law, the Legislature obliterated the distinction between principal and accessory before the fact, and declared them to be principals, but even at common law, one who procured an innocent person to commit an illegal act was a principal. Thus it is apparent that it was not only proper but necessary for the people to prove that Allan B. Monks was insane at the time of the issuing of the checks referred to. It became necessary to prove by Allan B. Monks, as against the defendant Wiley Watson, that the said Wiley Watson had taken advantage of him during the period of Monk's mental derangement. It is apparent from the record that Allan B. Monks was called as a witness against the defendant Wiley Watson.

The evidence was overwhelming as against both the defendants that at the time of the commission of the crimes alleged Allan B. Monks was insane and both defendants knew of the insanity, and therefore the said Allan B. Monks was an innocent agent in the hands of the defendants.

[8, 9] The question whether or not a particular person is competent to become a witness is a question to be determined upon voir dire examination by the trial court, either in or out of the presence of the jury. The trial court, in this case, after conducting the voir dire examination, declared the proffered witness, Allan B. Monks, was incompetent to testify. Appellant insists that Allan B.

Monks was and is insane, and that therefore the presentation of the fact to the jury was error. However, the question of Allan B. Monks' insanity was a vital and proper question of fact for the jury to consider in determining the guilt of the defendant Wiley L. Watson.

[10] Appellant next complains of the admission of the testimony of Dr. H. F. Andrews, over her objection, and assigns it as error. The testimony is in the nature of a eulogy of Allan B. Monks. There is no question but that the trial court committed error in admitting the testimony. It had no place in the trial of the case at bar. However, it cannot be said that the testimony in any way prejudiced the substantial rights of the appellant or resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Appellant complains of misconduct of the district attorney, but an examination of the record fails to disclose any foundation for the claim.

After an examination of the entire record in this case, the evidence clearly points to the guilt of the defendant, and, even though there was error in the admission of evidence, the verdict of the jury cannot be disturbed upon appeal because it has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Constitution.

It follows that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed.

So ordered.

MARKS, Justice (concurring).

Appellant made numerous declarations against interest, some of them amounting to confessions, which, if taken as true, amply established her guilt. The real question on this appeal is whether or not the corpus delicti of each crime of which she was convicted was sufficiently proved to permit the introduction of these confessions in evidence.

The check given to C. S. Dorman was dated February 16, 1932, made payable to Dorman's Auto Equipment, and was protested on April 20, 1932, the reason given for nonpayment was "Account Closed." The Felix Morette check was dated April 1, 1932, and was protested July 29, 1932, the reason for its nonpayment being given as "No Funds."

We do not think it necessary in this case to lay down as a general rule without exception that the protest of a check several months after it was passed is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, especially when the protest states as a reason for nonpayment that the account upon which it was drawn had been closed.

The overwhelming evidence of the flight of appellant after passing each of the two checks, under circumstances showing a guilt ty knowledge on her part, should constitute sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti to permit the introduction of her confessions in evidence since the enactment of section 1127c of the Penal Code. "Full proof of the body of the crime, the corpus delicti, independently of the confession, is not required, says Nelson, C. J., in People v. Badgley, 16 Went. (N. Y.) 59, by any of the cases; and in many of them slight corroborating facts were held sufficient." * * * When the case is submitted for their verdict, the jury may consider all the evidence in the case, including the extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions of the accused, in determining whether or not all the elements of the offense charged and the connection therewith of the accused have been established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. If this were not the correct rule, proof of the extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions of the accused would have no utility except to connect him with the crime charged." People v. Selby, 198 Cal. 426, 245 P. 426, 430.

The check to Morette was deposited in a San Diego bank on the day it was written and sent through the usual channels to the Boston bank upon which it was drawn, and in due time returned unpaid. Morette then took the check to appellant, who told him "the money is there and the check has got to be paid." He again deposited it with his bank for collection. Upon its second return unpaid he attempted to find appellant, but could not, as she had disappeared. The check was then sent to Boston and protested. It is evident that appellant by her representations to Morette and her flight was responsible for a large part of the delay in protesting this check. She should not be permitted to profit by her own fraud and artifice.

The account in the Boston bank upon which the checks were drawn was maintained solely by deposits by trustees of a trust fund. The evidence shows that in December, 1931, appellant knew that the deposits in the account had been stopped and shortly thereafter that the funds in the account had been exhausted. An attorney representing the trust estate informed appellant on February 8, 1932, that the trustees would make no further deposits in the Boston bank until Allan B. Monks was produced in his office in San Diego, as the trustees questioned the fact of his being alive. Mr. Monks was not produced at this office. This evidence, together with the checks drawn thereafter, and coupled with evidence of her flight, was ample to establish the corpus delicti in each case and permit the introduction of the confessions in evidence. With the confessions in evidence the proof of guilt is convincing.

NOLAND v. PAYNE, County Auditor.
Civ. 9184.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
July 28, 1933.

Mandamus ⇨ 102(2).

Official reporter pro tempore of superior court held entitled to writ of mandate requiring county auditor to draw warrant on treasurer in payment of claims for services rendered as such.

Proceeding by Alfreda Noland for a writ of mandate to H. A. Payne, as Auditor of Los Angeles County.

Peremptory writ granted.

Daniel V. Noland, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

HOUSER, Justice.

Petitioner seeks from this court its writ of mandate by which respondent, in the regular course of his official duty as county auditor of the county of Los Angeles, shall be required to draw his warrant in favor of petitioner on the treasurer of said county in payment of each of two designated claims which petitioner has presented to said respondent on account of official services rendered by petitioner as a court reporter pro tempore while performing official duties as such in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles.

From the verified petition herein it appears that respondent is the duly qualified and acting county auditor of the county of Los Angeles; that during all pertinent times in question petitioner was a duly qualified and acting official reporter pro tempore of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles; that on each of two specified occasions petitioner was duly assigned to perform, and, in pursuance thereof, did perform, services as such court reporter, which fact was certified by a judge of said superior court, who thereupon made his order by which respondent was directed to draw his warrant on the treasurer of the county of Los Angeles in payment of such services; that the correctness of said claim was also certified by a deputy clerk of the county clerk of said county; that thereupon petitioner presented to said respondent each of the aforesaid orders respectively, and demanded of said respondent that he issue a warrant in favor of petitioner on the said treasurer in accordance with said order; but that said respondent then refused, and still refuses, so to do.

Respondent has filed no answer to said petition; nor has he at any time seen fit to file any objection to the demand of petitioner, or to make any argument, or to present any authority in opposition thereto. On the other hand, petitioner's position in the matter seems to be amply supported, not only by rule of the superior court, but as well by statute and by judicial precedent. This court knows of no authority to the contrary.

In such circumstances, it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

The defendant was found guilty by a jury of the crime of forgery, and upon denial of his application for probation was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. Thereupon his attorney gave oral notice of appeal and requested the preparation of a transcript, which was later prepared, certified, and filed, but since then he has done nothing in furtherance of the appeal. At the time it was called for hearing, oral argument was waived and time was granted to prepare a brief, but none has been presented or filed. We have, nevertheless, examined the record on appeal and are satisfied that no legal grounds exist for interference with the judgment of conviction.

The evidence shows that, while in the employ of a firm named Quong Sang Company, the defendant passed a forged check for $100 on one Moskowitz. The check was made payable to Wm. Quong and was signed, "Quong Sang Company, Lee Chew." The defendant claimed in his defense that the check was given to him by a friend who owed him money. The evidence further shows, however, that about the same time defendant passed another forged check purporting to have been signed by the same party, and also cashed two more checks made payable to his employer by forging the latter's indorsement thereon. His explanation for having indorsed and cashed these latter checks was that his employer owed him several hundred dollars for back wages.

It will be seen, therefore, that the most that can be said in support of the appeal is that the verdict of the jury is based on conflicting evidence; and, consequently, since nothing appears in the record indicating that the trial was not fairly conducted, or that the jury was not properly instructed, the judgment of conviction must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Defendant was accused of the crime of robbery, and by a jury found guilty of robbery of the second degree. In due time this appeal was taken and the cause submitted.

The transcript of the evidence is brief.

But three witnesses were called, the complaining witness, the arresting officer, and an eyewitness to the commission of the crime.

We find no errors, nor was any particular point of law presented or argued during the trial. An examination of the record discloses no error in the proceedings, nor does counsel indicate anything justifying a reversal.

Judgment on the verdict was entered March 7, 1933, and the transcript on appeal was filed in this court on March 14, 1933. The cause was regularly placed on the calendar for oral argument on June 12, 1933. CONREY, Presiding Justice.

In each of these actions the appeal is by the plaintiff, from a judgment of dismissal entered after the court had sustained the several demurrers to the amended complaint, and after the plaintiff had failed to further amend within the time allowed therefor. In each case there was filed an amendment to the amended complaint on the same day when the court ruled on the demurrers. Counsel have assumed, and we shall adopt that assumption, that the demurrers were presented and considered as upon the respective amended complaints as thus amended. The actions were brought to recover upon separate official bonds of the several officers named, to compensate for damages incurred by reason of the failure, neglect, and omission of each of the bonded officers to faithfully perform his official duties as required by law, all with resulting loss to the plaintiffs.

Defendant Walker held the office of state building and loan commissioner from January 6, 1927, to August 12, 1929; and defendant Whitmore occupied that office from August 12, 1929, to December 31, 1930. Defendant Dorothy was a duly appointed and qualified deputy state building and loan commissioner from October 1, 1927, to December 12, 1930; defendant Barnes, from June 28, 1927, duration of term not shown; defendant Stern from August 2, 1929, to December 12, 1930.

The said official bonds were the bonds required to be executed by and on behalf of such officers in accordance with the provisions of the Building and Loan Commission Act approved April 5, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 607), as amended, and especially section 4 thereof (St. 1921, p. 1573; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 982, p. 358), which reads as follows: "Before entering upon their duties, the commissioner and his deputies shall each execute an official bond in the penal sum of five thousand dollars, each of which bonds must be guaranteed by a duly authorized surety or bonding company, the premium on which shall be paid from the allowance for office expenses. Any bond executed under this section must be approved by the governor and filed and reported in the office of the secretary of state, and such commissioner and deputies must take the oath of office as prescribed by the Political Code for the state officers in general."

For a statement of the required condition of an official bond, and the breaches of condition whereby liability is incurred, we are referred to Political Code, §§ 954, 958, 959, 960. It is further provided (section 961) that an official bond is obligatory "for the use and benefit of all persons who may be injured or aggrieved by the wrongful act or default of such officer in his official capacity; and any person so injured or aggrieved may bring suit on such bond, in his own name, without an assignment thereof." As will be seen, we do not need to discuss the questions which have been argued, relating to these sections and the conditions to which they apply.

The Guaranty Building & Loan Association of Los Angeles was a corporation subject to the provisions of the Building and Loan Commission Act. Under the terms of that act, the building and loan commissioner is obligated to perform certain official acts of examination and supervision. Within a period of time stated in the complaint the said association became insolvent. The plaintiffs deposited money with the association after it became insolvent. As to each of said bonded officers it is alleged that, by reason of the failure and neglect of the officer to perform his official duties, the association was permitted to continue in business, at and after the time when the commissioner in the due performance of his official duty should have taken charge of the affairs and business of said corporation; and that, by reason of such failure and negligence, the plaintiffs were induced to deposit money with the association, with resultant loss to the plaintiffs. This is a statement, in general terms, of the facts relied upon by the plaintiffs as the source of their right to recover upon the said several official bonds.

[1] In the first action (Civ. No. 8572) the defendants are the Commissioner Walker and his surety, and the Deputy Commissioner Dorothy and his surety. In the second action (Civ. No. 8573), the defendants are the same as in the preceding action, together with Commissioner Whitmore and his surety, and the Deputy Commissioners Barnes and Stern and their sureties. The demurrers of the several defendants in each case were made upon several different statutory grounds of demurrer, including the claim that the complaint did not state a cause of action, and the claim that several causes of action were improperly joined, and that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. For example, the defendant Walker demurs upon the ground that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant, in that defendant Walker, as principal, and his surety, upon a separate and distinct bond, are joined in the same action with other defendant principals and their sureties upon other and separate bonds. He also demurs upon the ground that several causes of action are improperly joined, in that the alleged causes of action against defendant Walker and his surety, upon a distinct and separate bond, are united with alleged causes of action arising upon other and distinct separate causes of action arising upon different, distinct and other bonds. In their argument in support of their proposition that there is no misjoinder of causes of action, appellants rely upon section 427, Code of Civil Procedure (subd. 8), under which a plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint where they all are "claims arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action. * * *" In their argument in support of their claim that there is no misjoinder of parties defendant, they refer particularly to sections 379a, 379b, and 379c, Code of Civil Procedure, which relate to certain stated circumstances under which persons may be joined as defendants in an action.

As to the misjoinder of the causes of action, we think that the demurrers were properly sustained. These being actions at law to recover upon separate and unrelated official bonds, it is clear that the alleged liabilities on these separate bonds are not liabilities arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action. We think that the decisions referred to by appellants in their briefs, on this point, are not applicable to this case.

[2] With respect to the misjoinder of parties defendant, we are further of the opinion that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the decisions cited by defendants do not sustain the contention of appellants that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer as to misjoinder of parties defendant.

Being of the opinion that for the reasons above stated the demurrers were properly sustained, we find it unnecessary to discuss any of the other questions presented and argued on these appeals.

In each case the judgment is affirmed.

W. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles (L. V. Peterman, of counsel), for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richter, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Defendants were jointly charged with the crime of murder, to which charge each pleaded not guilty. At the first trial defendants Sonoqui were apparently found guilty; the action having been dismissed as to their co-defendant Martina Ruiz. Motions for a new trial were granted and the cause was again set for trial, before another judge, at the conclusion of which both were found guilty of murder in the first degree; the verdict fixing the punishment at life imprisonment. Defendants' motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were denied. Each has appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment entered upon said verdict.

[1-3] Appellants contend: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict and judgment; (2) that the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence was adjudicated by the action of the judge presiding at the first trial in granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict; (3) that the district attorney conducted himself in a manner prejudicial to appellants; and (4) that the court erred in admitting certain exhibits in evidence.

(1) Vicente Ruiz, who at the time was living with his wife and daughter, was killed on September 15, 1928, in Azusa, Calif., as the result of a gunshot wound in his abdomen, caused by a .22 short bullet. His daughter, Mrs. Dorothy Sierra, testified that she had known defendants Sonoqui for two years before her father's death—that they lived about two blocks from the Ruiz home; that about a month before her father was shot he came home in the middle of the afternoon and found defendant Remigio Sonoqui at their home; that said defendant had been there all morning and afternoon, and when her father arrived her mother was in the dining room and Remigio was in the living room playing the phonograph. Evidence showing quite a different picture just preceding the arrival of Ruiz was excluded by the court. Ruiz asked Remigio what he was doing there, to which the latter replied, "Nothing, nothing, just playing the phonograph." Ruiz then said, "You had better stay away from this house, I don't want you here any more." About the same time, according to the testimony of the daughter, she heard a conversation between Remigio Sonoqui and her mother. Asked as to what was said, she testified: "Well, Remigio told my mother that he loved her and my mother said, 'I love you too.' He said, 'Shall we run away?' My mother says, 'If I run away I will lost my property and my children both.' He said, 'I will fix that.'" Mrs. Sierra further testified that she retired on the evening of the murder at about 9:20 p. m. Later she heard a noise at her bedroom window and saw defendant, John Sonoqui outside, about four feet from the house; that shortly thereafter she heard her father go to the kitchen for some coffee; that he returned to his bed and immediately took a lantern and went outside. A few minutes later she heard two shots fired, and on running to the window she saw two men running across a vacant lot next to their home and recognized them as the defendants Sonoqui. Ruiz was taken to the hospital and the witness was taken to the Sonoqui home. Later, when Mrs. Ruiz returned from the hospital with John Sonoqui, she went to the Sonoqui home also. When defendant Remigio arrived, according to Mrs. Sierra, he was crying and pulling his hair, and Mrs. Ruiz said to him, "Don't cry, don't be a coward."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the daughter played a very important part in making plaintiff's case, and she was the only one who testified to seeing defendants, or either of them, at or near the scene of the murder at the time it occurred. It is true that certain investigating officers testified to tracing the tracks across the lot and to a point directly across the street from the Sonoqui home, in the direction of which they pointed, and that such tracks showed that the men ran from the scene of the murder. Defendants were taken by the officers over soft ground and the tracks so made compared in size to those made by the men fleeing from the scene of the crime. There was other evidence which tended to point to appellants as the perpetrators of the act. Their conflicting stories of their whereabouts on the evening in question, told to the officers, did not sound good. There is ample evidence to justify the verdict. The principal contention of appellants is that the testimony of the daughter is unworthy of belief. She testified at the inquest that she saw no one in the yard that night and had no idea who shot her father. She told no one that she saw appellants running from the scene of the murder, or that she saw John Sonoqui near her bedroom window, until she told her husband about it some two weeks before the preliminary hearing, which was held November 18, 1932. However, she had an explanation as to why the story was not told before, which was believed by the jury and which, with other facts in the case, would seem to make it sufficient as an explanation.

The matters above referred to go but to the weight of the evidence, which it is the function of the jury to determine in the first instance and the trial court on motion made after verdict; "and before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal" upon the ground herein discussed, it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 326, 184 P. 389. Under the evidence in this case, even in the face of the contention of appellants as to the testimony of the daughter, we cannot so say.

[4] (2) Nor can we see any merit in appellants' claim that the ruling of the judge presiding at the first trial, in granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, established the law of the case on that question in the second trial, even assuming that the evidence might be substantially the same. To so hold would mean that there could be no new trial. Instead of granting a motion on that ground the court should make some order finally disposing of the case, which of course it has no jurisdiction to do. In few cases is there any very substantial change in the evidence on the new trial. Such order was not a final judgment, and yet that is the effect appellants claim for it. The cases cited show that the phrase "law of the case" arises out of a final determination of a question of law on appeal. City of Los Angeles v. Oliver, 102 Cal. App. 299, 283 P. 298. It is true the judge presiding on the first trial with brutal frankness, but without judicial poise, branded the daughter as a "liar"; but an equally honest man might come to an entirely different conclusion in that regard.

[5] (3) Appellants urge that the conduct of the district attorney in his opening statement in the trial in chief and in his argument to the jury was calculated to and did prejudice the rights of defendants and prevented them from having a fair trial. While we must admit that some of the things complained of could well be classified as examples of how a prosecutor should not conduct a trial, we are of the opinion that if any prejudice resulted at all it must have reacted in the minds of intelligent and fair jurors rather against the case of the people than in its favor. The record shows, however, that appellants either did not object, or if objection was made the court admonished both the district attorney and the jurors in such a way that we fail to see how prejudice could have resulted; and we must presume that the jurors followed such admonition and instruction, in the absence of an express showing to the contrary in the record before us.

[6, 7] (4) In the investigation of the case appellants were asked by the officers if they had any guns or shells of .22 caliber, to which they replied that they did not. This was after the officers had found some .22 short caliber shells at the scene of the homicide. Subsequently in the Sonoqui home the investigators found a rifle and revolver of .22 caliber, as well as some .22 short caliber shells. Asked as to why they said they had no guns in the house except two shotguns, they responded that it was because they "didn't want to get mixed up in this murder of Ruiz." The lantern being used by Ruiz when he was shot was found with a nick in the handle, as though made by a bullet, and an irregular piece of lead smaller than a bullet was found near by, which might have been a piece of the bullet cut off and deflected after striking the lantern handle. These were all introduced in evidence over appellants' objection that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and no proper foundation laid. The guns and bullets found in the home of appellants were properly introduced in connection with the evidence of their finding, in rebuttal of the statement made to the officers denying possession of any such articles. Being the same size and caliber as those used in perpetrating the crime, they were also competent evidence showing that appellants had the means at hand to commit the offense charged against them. People v. Mooney, 177 Cal. 642, 171 P. 690. The lantern and piece of lead found were necessary to show a complete picture of the physical surroundings of the crime as a part of the people's case and as furnishing a circumstance bearing upon the charge, "whether directly or remotely" being "for the jury to decide in view of all the other facts and circumstances." People v. Mar Gin Suie, 11 Cal. App. 42, 51, 103 P. 951, 956.

[8] A letter written by appellant Remigio Sonoqui to Martina Ruiz, wife of decedent, was admitted in evidence against said appellant and over his objection. The missive was dated at San Quentin, Calif., Wednesday, July 23, 1930, some nineteen months after the crime charged, and it might well be characterized as a fervent love letter. It was introduced in connection with a statement made by Remigio to Officer Morrell, in the course of which he was asked if he was ever in love with decedent's wife, to which he replied, "No, I was not." He was then asked if he ever wrote her any love letters, to which he answered, "Well, that one you had [referring to the letter in question] is the only one, because I didn't know who she was." The letter was addressed to "Miss Margaret Sonoqui." When first asked if he wrote to Mrs. Ruiz under the name of Sonoqui, Remigio denied it and said, "That is a forged letter." After admitting in the statement that he wrote the letter he stated that he did not know it was Mrs. Ruiz, but that it was in reply to a letter signed by the same name which he received and thought came from a cousin of his. It was stipulated that defendant Remigio Sonoqui was either in jail or prison from the day following the homicide up to the time of writing the letter in question, and that he did not visit Mrs. Ruiz during such time. The particular objection appellants' counsel seem to have to the letter is that it was dated at San Quentin. After the stipulation above referred to was made the court instructed the jury that the fact as to defendant Remigio Sonoqui being in custody was not for their consideration except to show his inability to have personal relationship with Mrs. Ruiz, and that they were not under any consideration whatsoever to allow the fact of some other offense having been committed to enter into their deliberations, which admonition was stated to be satisfactory by appellants' counsel. It would seem, however, that with the evidence already before the court as to the love existing between such appellant and the wife of decedent prior to the murder, the fact that it could endure in spite of bars from the day after the murder until the date of the ardent letter had a very material bearing on the depth of such affection and as to whether or not it was deep enough to motivate an act such as that here in question. Furthermore, the fact that the correspondence with Mrs. Ruiz was carried on under an assumed name might evidence a desire to keep the relationship secret, and to some degree at least point to a guilty conscience on Remigio's part.

Action by Robert V. Nitzsche, by his guardian ad litem, Helmer E. Sanner, against C. D. Stevens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal or affirm the judgment.

Motion granted, and judgment affirmed.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles W. Cradick and Clarence W. Hull, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This matter has been submitted on motion of respondent for an order dismissing the appeal or affirming the judgment; the motion being made pursuant to section 3 of rule V.

The plaintiff's injuries were received by reason of an automobile collision caused by the negligence of defendant. The sole ground of appeal, as stated in the brief for appellant, is that under the evidence the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. A brief inspection of the record, together with a reading of the few pages of testimony shown in the supplement to appellant's brief, is sufficient to show that there is evidence sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court in favor of the plaintiff on said issue of contributory negligence.

The motion is granted, and the judgment is affirmed.

[1] After having initiated and caused to be perfected the within appeal from a judgment of conviction of second degree burglary and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, counsel for appellant, to all intents and purposes, abandoned the same; oral argument having been waived and no brief having been filed.

[2] An examination of the record shows that the place burglarized was a so-called sandwich shop located at 199 Fremont street in San Francisco. The glass in the front door had been smashed so as to allow the bolt on the inside to be thrown. According to the testimony given by the police officers who detected the burglary and arrested appellant, two men were seen emerging from the place about midnight, each carrying a sack partly filled with something. When called upon to stop they started to run. A pistol shot was fired at one, and he fell to the street. A shot was then fired at the other, and he dropped the sack, but continued his flight, turning the corner and disappearing from the view of the pursuing officer. The officer then blew his whistle, and appellant was captured by another officer a few blocks from, and taken back to, the sandwich shop. In the meantime the other man, who had fallen in the street, had disappeared, abandoning the two sacks, which were found to contain cigars, cigarettes, etc., belonging to the sandwich shop. The officers further testified that as soon as appellant was brought back to the sandwich shop he was searched in the presence of several officers and certain documents stolen from the cash register were found on his person, and that in explanation of his connection with the burglary he stated to them that he had been hired by a man to help move the goods out of the sandwich shop and that not knowing the place had been burglariously entered he accepted the employment. At the trial, taking the witness stand in his own behalf, appellant denied ever having been in or near the sandwich shop, or of ever having made the statement attributed to him. He also denied that any stolen documents were found in his possession. He claimed that he had been visiting a barroom on Third street and was on his way to his room when arrested; and that after being taken back to the sandwich shop he saw the officers themselves remove the documents which they claimed to have found in his possession from the drawer of the cash register.

In view of the foregoing conflict in the testimony it was the exclusive province of the jury to determine the truth of the matter, and obviously the evidence adduced by the prosecution is legally sufficient to sustain its decision. Moreover, the record shows that appellant was given a fair trial, and that the jury was properly instructed.

On motion for new trial appellant produced a prisoner from the county jail under sentence to the penitentiary for first degree robbery, after having pleaded guilty thereto, and against whom other charges of robbery were pending, who claimed that he and a friend, not the appellant, committed the burglary. But on cross-examination circumstances were developed which fully warranted the trial court in disbelieving his testimony.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

YORK, Justice.

This is an appeal under the so-called alternative method from a judgment rendered in favor of defendant and respondent and against plaintiff and appellant.

[1] In connection with the first-stated ground of appeal there is incorporated in the brief of appellant a certain notice of motion with two affidavits of respective counsel, and a certain notice of motion to vacate the setting and set the action for trial before a jury, and certain other affidavits of counsel. However, although they are all set out in the reporter's transcript, the certificate does not show that they were used in connection with any proceeding before the trial court. The record is not sufficient to furnish a basis upon which this court properly may consider the same in reference to this appeal.

[2] The first ground of appeal is that "The court erred in granting the respondent a jury trial." But there is nothing in the record to show that there was any objection by the plaintiff to the jury trial, either at the time of trial or in connection with any motion for a new trial.

As to the second ground of appeal stated by plaintiff, an examination of the record itself discloses that there was a substantial and direct conflict in the evidence upon the issues relative to the principal questions urged by the appellant in support of this second ground of appeal. Appellant states his second ground of appeal as "Insufficiency and total absence of evidence to justify the verdict and the judgment rendered thereon." The record discloses sufficient evidence to justify the verdict.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

[1] Defendant was convicted of burglary, and the appeal is from the judgments of conviction and order denying a new trial. It appears from the evidence that defendant resided at the home of one Mrs. Briney, who was the mother of one James Lankford. The defendant and James Lankford occupied the same room in the Briney home. Lankford testified that he and the defendant entered four different garages after night and that each took from the garages certain personal property which they took to the room which he and the defendant were occupying. Among other things that the witness and defendant took were a hack saw and Stillson wrench.

The defendant had a small sewing machine motor which he told Lankford he obtained from one garage, stating there were other tools there, and they went together to this garage and got the tools. At no time did they have permission to enter the garages or obtain the property. James Lankford is an admitted accomplice. It was proper to prove the corpus delicti by the accomplice. People v. Richardson, 161 Cal. 552, 563, 120 P. 20; People v. Frazer, 80 Cal. App. 464, 468, 252 P. 633. Defendant attacks the judgments on (a) errors in instructions to the jury; (b) insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdicts, which is a claim that the accomplice was not sufficiently corroborated; (c) errors in admission of evidence.

[2] In corroborating the story told by the accomplice, evidence was offered of the following facts: (a) A portion of the stolen property was found in the room occupied by defendant and the accomplice. (b) That he moved some of the property from his room to the home of his own mother, which was in another part of town. (c) That some of the property was placed in the basement of the house belonging to his mother. (d) That a certain hack saw was taken by the defendant from his room to his mother's place. (e) That when arrested and asked about this hack saw he said that it belonged to his sister. (f) When defendant was on the stand he stated that he never made such statement respecting the hack saw, and that his sister did not purchase nor own it. (g) That he had the sewing machine motor around the home of Mrs. Briney and offered to sell it to a person by the name of McIntyre. (h) That, when Mrs. Briney asked him where he got the motor, defendant said he got it down the street. After his arrest he made an escape from the officers and fled, and on the stand the defendant had denied having moved the tools to his mother's house, and denied telling Mrs. Briney that he took them to his mother's house, and denied that he had ever seen the sewing machine motor. We think that this evidence, independent of, and in no way dependent on, the testimony of the accomplice, sufficiently connects, or tends to connect, the defendant with the commission of the crime to satisfy the requirements of Penal Code, § 1111, and the rule of corroboration as laid down in the case of People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, on page 473, 229 P. 40.

[3,4] On cross-examination, defendant's counsel asked Mrs. Briney: "You are not particularly friendly to Mr. Sandow are you, Mrs. Briney?" To which she replied: "A. As far as being friendly I am friendly but then we never did get along very good—he has a couple of children by my daughter but was never married to her." Defendant's counsel moved to strike the last sentence as a voluntary statement of the witness without the issues of the case and on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and not called for by the question, which motion was denied. This he assigns as reversible error. We are of the opinion that, when a question is asked, the answer to which naturally calls for a state of mind, and the purpose of which is to draw inferences of bias, prejudice, or motive from the answer, generally, evidence which may counteract or justify such inferences is admissible. This principle which we announce seems to have support in People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 P. 622. In that case a police officer had testified for the prosecution that he had taken quite an active part in the defense. In rebuttal he was asked his reason for the interest, and stated that on investigation he believed the defendant innocent. The answer was on motion stricken out. On page 293 of 106 Cal., 39 P. 622, the court said: "The prosecution having proven that the witness had an interest in the result of the litigation, for the purpose of weakening the effect of his testimony, we see no valid reason why opposing counsel had not the right to show generally what that interest was for the purpose of counteracting the effect of the former evidence."

[5] Counsel for defendant asked Mrs. Briney, a witness for the prosecution, certain questions in laying a foundation for her impeachment, as follows:

"Mr. Nelson (To Witness): Are you acquainted with Genevieve Lan Franco? A. I am.

"Q. Do you remember some time the last part of February, 1932, of having a conversation with her, at your home in your bedroom, at which time you and she were present and no one else? A. We might have, she stayed at my place at that time, lived there.

"Q. And in which you stated in substance that you would like to see Jack Sandow back in prison, that he was always butting into your affairs, and you would do anything you could to send him back, or that in substance? A. I did not.

"Q. Never made such a statement? A. No."

It was established elsewhere in the evidence that the witness at the time of the crimes and trial was residing at 202 West Washington, and the term "at your home" may have referred thereto. Thereafter, in due course, defendant called Mrs. Lan Franco for the purpose of impeaching Mrs. Briney, and she was asked:

"Q. Now, did you, some time in the month of February, the latter part of February, in 1932, did you ever have a conversation with Mrs. Briney relative to the defendant, Jack Sandow? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Where did that conversation take place? A. It took place at 801 North Ross, Santa Ana, at her home, in the bedroom.
* * *

"Q. Now what was said by Mrs. Briney at that time, relative to the defendant, Jack Sandow?

"Mr. Kaufman: Just a moment, we object to that on the ground that it is too remote, no proper foundation having been laid for it.

"Mr. Nelson: The foundation has certainly been laid, because I asked the witness as to time, place, those present and if the conversation, which will be testified to, was in substance had. How can I lay any better foundation?

"Mr. Davis: If my memory is right, Mr. Nelson asked the witness Mrs. Briney if this conversation took place in her bedroom at 202 West Washington. This is the first witness that has mentioned 801 North Ross.

"The Court: "I don't think this is impeaching a conversation that you laid the foundation for, Mr. Nelson.

"Mr. Nelson: I would like to recall Mrs. Briney, if the Court please.

"The Court: Very well.

"Mr. Nelson: Maybe she can answer right from there.

"The Court: You may recall her to the stand.

"Mr. Kaufman: This is your witness now.

"The Court (To Mr. Nelson): She is your witness if you call her.

"Mr. Nelson: I just want to lay my impeaching foundation.

"The Court: Very well, you may call her to the stand, but you are making her your witness. Mrs. Margaret Louise Briney again resumes the stand, Mrs. Lan Franco being withdrawn by Mr. Nelson.

"Mr. Nelson (To Mrs. Briney): "Q. Mrs. Briney, I asked you with reference to a conversation which you had with Mrs. Lan Franco, in which I am laying a foundation. I asked if you had such a conversation at your home in 202 West Washington Street. Now, I will ask you the same question and ask you if you had such a conversation with her at 801, at your home at 801 North Ross Street? A. No, I did not.

"Mr. Nelson (To Witness): That's all.

"Mr. Nelson: Mrs. Lan Franco, you may resume the stand. (Mrs. Jennie V. Lan Franco thereupon resumes the stand for further direct examination by Mr. Nelson.)

"Mr. Nelson (To Witness): Q. Now, I will ask you to state the conversation.

"Mr. Kaufman: At this time, Your Honor, we object, no proper foundation laid on the ground that this conversation, if the conversation was had, was too remote; on the further ground that counsel cannot impeach his own witness. This woman you put on the stand, Mr. Nelson, is now your witness.

"Mr. Nelson: She was recalled for the purpose of correcting my cross-examination. She is not my witness in any sense of the word.

"Mr. Kaufman: The Court advised you she was your witness.

"The Court: Yes, the Court said she testified as to a conversation on Washington Street, and you had a right to lay a foundation to anything she testified to, to impeach her which had been testified to on her direct examination. As to North Ross Street, a conversation, the Court said, 'if you put her on, you put her on as your own witness.'

"Mr. Nelson: I recalled her, if the Court please, simply for the purpose of correcting the location.

"The Court: I understand, but that wouldn't be cross-examination, there was nothing said to her about North Ross Street. Sustained.

"Mr. Nelson (To Witness): That's all."

While the impeaching question is not in proper form, this record discloses that the court ruled that he would not permit the impeachment of the witness regardless of the form of the question and it would have been useless, almost a contempt of court, for defendant's counsel to attempt to frame further questions along this line, in view of the ruling. We do not think that defendant made the witness, Mrs. Briney, his witness, when he recalled her for the purposes indicated, regardless of the comment of the court to that effect. People v. Lee Chuck, 74 Cal. 30, 15 P. 322. It is to be particularly noted that, in the question to Mrs. Briney, the conversation was laid at her home, and in the question to Mrs. Lan Franco it was at her home at 801 North Ross street. It is only to reference elsewhere in the record that we find that the home of Mrs. Briney was 202 West Washington. The probabilities are that she had moved from one address to the other, and the location of the conversation at her home in the bedroom is definite enough in itself to lay the proper foundation.

The evidence sought to be obtained was admissible.

[6] "It is elementary law, supported by all authority, that the state of mind of a witness as to his bias or prejudice, his interests involved, his hostility or friendship towards the parties, are always proper matters for investigation, in order that truth may prevail and falsehood find its proper level. If the inner workings of a witness' mind are actuating his testimony, and the workings of that mind are brought forth to the light and held up in full view before the jury, results will be obtained much more in accord with truth and justice than though the witness' testimony is weighed and measured by his words alone. * * *'" People v. Pantages, 212 Cal. 237, 258, 297 P. 890, 899.

[7] The elementary rules of cross-examination have been recently stated by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Alford v. United States, 232 U. S. 637, 51 S. Ct. 218, 219, 75 L. Ed. 624, and among other rules lays down the following:

"Cross-examination of a witness is a matter of right. * * * Prejudice ensues from a denial of the opportunity to place the witness in his proper setting and put the weight of his testimony and his credibility to a test, without which the jury cannot fairly appraise them. * * * In this respect a summary denial of the right of cross-examination is distinguishable from the erroneous admission of harmless testimony. * * *

"The trial court cut off in limine all inquiry on a subject with respect to which the defense was entitled to a reasonable cross examination. This was an abuse of discretion and prejudicial error."

While these and other rules in the Alford Case were applied to a different state of facts, the fundamental reasoning is the same in that the defendant was denied the right to put on evidence, which all the authorities hold he has a right to produce, and on the ground that he was impeaching his own witness, which we have indicated is in no sense tenable.

[8] It remains to determine whether or not this error has in the instant case resulted in the miscarriage of justice. To determine this matter we have given very careful consideration to the entire transcript of the evidence and have arrived at the conclusion that the proof of the guilt of the defendant is established beyond a reasonable doubt. His own testimony is so inherently improbable as to, in itself, make us feel that it was deliberately false. Having arrived at this conclusion, we feel that the judgments must be affirmed in accordance with the requirements of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

The judgments and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Actions by Thompson Ramsey Tipton against Florence Katherine Tipton and others and by Florence Katherine Tipton against Thompson Ramsey Tipton, were consolidated. From adverse judgments, Thompson Ramsey Tipton appeals.

Affirmed.

Clarence L. Belt and William G. Randall, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Koenig & Brunton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

The above causes were consolidated for trial and also for the purposes of the appeals.

We will first consider the appeal in the case of Florence Katherine Tipton v. Thompson Ramsey Tipton. This is an action for divorce. At the former trial the plaintiff was granted a decree of divorce from the defendant on grounds of desertion and extreme cruelty. The court allotted all of the community property of the parties, which consisted of real estate of the value of $2,500, and also an automobile, to the defendant husband, who was the offending party. Thereupon the plaintiff appealed on the judgment roll from that part of the interlocutory decree which awarded all of the community property to the defendant. The Supreme Court held that, where a decree of divorce was granted on the ground of desertion, there was no discretion vested in the trial court but to divide the community property equally between the spouses. Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 2. When such a decree was granted on the ground of extreme cruelty, the community property must be assigned "in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just." Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1. From the section the Supreme Court also held that it was contemplated that the nonoffending party was entitled to a greater proportion of the community property than a moiety. It also appearing that all of the community property had been awarded to the defendant, who was the offending party, the judgment was reversed as to the disposition made of the community property. Tipton v. Tipton, 209 Cal. 443, 288 P. 65. The cause was again tried upon the issue as to the rights of the respective parties to the community property. At the conclusion of the trial, the court found that the real estate was the sole and separate property of the plaintiff, subject to a community interest of the parties to the extent of $800, and awarded that portion of the community property to the plaintiff. The court further found that a certain Essex automobile of the approximate value of $400 was also community property, and it was awarded to the defendant.

[1, 2] The first trial was held before Hon. J. Walter Hanby and the second trial before Hon. C. P. Vicini. The evidence taken at the first trial was not introduced upon the second trial, and no evidence of specific acts of cruelty were introduced at the last-named trial. It is said in appellant's opening brief that: "The jurisdiction of Judge Vicini upon the second trial of this case was plainly limited to the disposition of the 'sole question' which remained for determination as stated in the opinion, that is, the division of the community property." In this we quite agree with counsel. The court found that the real estate was the separate property of the plaintiff, subject to a community interest of $800, which was awarded to the plaintiff, who was the injured party. The court also awarded a $400 community interest in one Essex automobile to the defendant, who was the offending party. We are of the opinion that, when the Supreme Court returned the cause to the lower court to retry the issue of the rights of the parties in the community property, it became the duty of the court to determine what constituted the community property of the parties, and to divide it. Reid v. Reid, 112 Cal. 274, 44 P. 564; Central Sav. Bank of Oakland v. Lake, 201 Cal. 438, 257 P. 521. We do not believe that it was necessary for the court to receive in evidence the testimony taken at the former trial. The court had a right to examine and use the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment in the former trial, bearing on the question of extreme cruelty, which had become final. In addition, it was also found on the second trial "that the plaintiff is in a weak physical condition, and is unemployed and not in good health," which finding is not attacked. It was not necessary to retry the entire issue of cruelty. Chandler v. People's Savings Bank et al., 73 Cal. 317, 11 P. 791, 14 P. 864, 2 Am. St. Rep. 812; Duff v. Duff, 101 Cal. 1, 35 P. 437. Furthermore, had this appellant desired to have the testimony taken at the former trial before the court on the second trial, he had the privilege of offering it in evidence. Upon the subject the following colloquy took place between the parties:

Question by Mr. Belt, counsel for appellant: "Q. Now, then, Mrs. Tipton, according to your divorce complaint, almost immediately after you and Mr. Tipton entered marriage he treated you in a cruel and inhuman manner? A. He did.

"Q. And did that continue until the date of the separation? A. It did.

"Mr. Brunton [counsel for defendant]: You are not going into the marriage and divorce?

"Mr. Belt: No, far from it."

These questions and answers of themselves disclose cruelty.

We are of the opinion that there is no merit in the claim of appellant, and that this judgment should be affirmed.

Thompson R. Tipton v. Florence K. Tipton: This action was brought for the purpose of quieting plaintiff's title to the land which was determined in the divorce action to be the separate property of the defendant in this action, and also to establish the existence of a lost deed from the defendant through which plaintiff claims title to said land as his separate property. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

[3] Appellant claims that certain material allegations of his complaint were not denied by the answer, and, as we construe his contention, the findings and conclusions of the court and the judgment based thereon are contrary to these admissions. Without analyzing the various points advanced in support of this contention, it is sufficient to say that the case was tried upon the theory that the material allegations of the complaint were denied; evidence for and against the various claims of the respective parties as though all of the allegations of the complaint were denied was received without any objection; findings and judgment were entered; and the insufficiency of the denials of the answer are now raised for the first time. The following rule, appearing in volume 2, California Jurisprudence 246, § 73, is applicable to such a situation: "It is a general rule that where, notwithstanding the fact that the denials in an answer are not as broad as the allegations of the complaint or are otherwise insufficient to put the allegations of the complaint in issue, the answer is treated as putting the material facts in issue, the plaintiff cannot for the first time on appeal object that such denials were insufficient for any purpose."

This rule has been followed in Schuh v. R. H. Herron Co., 177 Cal. 13, 18, 169 P. 682; Zimmer v. Kilborn, 165 Cal. 521, 132 P. 1025; Kuhn v. Dickey, 66 Cal. App. 227, 225 P. 867.

The point is without merit.

[4] It is also advanced as a ground for reversal that the court's finding numbered 2 is not sustained by the evidence. The criticized finding is to the effect that between February 1, 1927, and February 15, 1928, while the plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife, the defendant made, executed, and delivered a grant deed of the property which is the subject-matter of this litigation to the plaintiff. The court further found in this connection that the said deed contained a condition precedent wherein said deed was not to become effective and was to be null and void unless the sum of $200 was paid to the defendant's father on or before one year from the date thereof, which said sum was not paid within the time specified, and said deed thereby became of no force or effect, and the court further found that no consideration was ever paid the defendant for the execution of said deed.

It is claimed by the appellant that this finding is not sustained by the evidence. The evidence discloses that the deed itself had never been recorded and was lost. Oral evidence of its contents was admitted. In answer to a question propounded by her counsel, defendant testified that she had a condition put in the deed to plaintiff that a debt owed by the plaintiff and defendant to the latter's father, in the sum of $200, should be paid by plaintiff. She testified: "That this deed will be made null if the sum of $200 is not paid on or before February 1, 1929, to H. Meinker." She further testified that the $200 was never paid; further that she had never received any consideration from the plaintiff for the execution of the deed.

This evidence, if believed by the court, and apparently it was, is sufficient to support that portion of the finding attacked by plaintiff. The testimony of the witnesses relied upon by the plaintiff merely raised a conflict.

It is a further contention of the appellant that the court was in error in finding that the payment of $200 to defendant's father was a condition precedent to the taking effect of the deed because the language used by the defendant was that the deed "will be made null and void" if the money was not paid. Whether the condition annexed was precedent or subsequent is immaterial, for the reason that the money was never paid and the time for the payment has, under either condition, long since expired.

[5] Appellant admits that no consideration was paid respondent for the deed given him, but he contends that the fact that the property was the separate property of the respondent and she was a joint maker with him on the note which was given for the purchase price of the property furnished a sufficient consideration. However, a promise by one to fulfil his own contract with another is no consideration for a promise by a third party. 6 Cal. Jur. 179, § 122; Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 542; Parrino v. Rallis et al., 116 Cal. App. 364, 2 P.(2d) 515.

Appellant also says that the court's finding that the allegations of paragraph V of the plaintiff's complaint are true fixes the time of the delivery of the deed by the respondent as occurring during the month of February, 1927. The facts are that the allegation of the complaint, found by the court to be true, alleged that the deed was delivered between November, 1927, and February 15, 1928. During the progress of the trial, the plaintiff asked leave to amend this part of the pleading by alleging the delivery between February 1, 1927, and February 15, 1927, which amendment was allowed by the court, although it was never inserted in the complaint. The finding of the court is that the allegation of paragraph V of the complaint is true and not paragraph V as amended. However, we cannot see where this finding as to the exact date of delivery is material, in the face of the other findings of the unperformed condition of the deed and that it was given without consideration. Further, the defendant testified that the deed was delivered in February, 1928, and the time for the fulfillment of the condition was one year later, which was more favorable to plaintiff than a delivery thereof in 1927. It is clear from the record that only one deed was given.

The court's finding No. IV is attacked. This finding is to the effect that at all times since March 15, 1927, plaintiff was in the possession of the property and had paid all taxes and assessments against the property and all interest charges upon incumbrances against the same. But it was further found therein that such possession was with the consent of the defendant and the aforesaid payments were made in accordance with an agreement of the parties, which payments were to take the place of the value of the use and occupation of the premises.

Conceding that this finding is without support in the evidence, we cannot see, nor has it been pointed out, what effect it has upon the ownership of the property, which has been found by the court to be the separate property of the defendant. It is an immaterial finding.

The court further found that the defendant, in executing the deed to the property in dispute, did not intend to divest herself of the ownership of the property, but conveyed it to the plaintiff so that he could borrow money thereon for the purpose of making improvements on the house situated on the premises. This finding was amply sustained by the evidence, but it is claimed by appellant that the intent with which a deed is executed cannot be testified to. In Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 9, 171 P. 1066, 1067, where the dispute was whether or not certain land was conveyed to a husband and wife as community property or because of the insistent demand of the wife that she should have a separate interest in the property, the court says: "The intent accompanying the act is to be inferred by the court or jury from all the circumstances, and the party's own testimony that he did not intend to make a gift, while competent, is not conclusive."

But, irrespective of this point, we are again confronted with the fact that the plaintiff failed to keep the condition requiring the payment of the money to defendant's father, and, further, that the deed was given to plaintiff without consideration, and either one of these facts constituted a defense to the plaintiff's judgment quieting his title to the property.

So far as the restoration of the lost deed is concerned, under the state of the record, the property belongs to the defendant, and its restoration would be an idle act.

We believe that what has already been said disposes of the appeal in each case. Therefore each one of said judgments is affirmed.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

The defendant and a number of other persons, including Ralph Sheldon and Jimmie Doolen, were jointly charged by indictment with the crime of kidnapping for the purpose of extortion and robbery. Sheldon and others were convicted in an earlier trial. The charge against Doolen, an admitted accomplice, was dismissed so that he might testify on behalf of the prosecution. After trial, a verdict of guilty resulted, and this is an appeal from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Defendant concedes there was sufficient evidence to establish the fact that a Mr. Caress, his wife, and their Japanese servant had been kidnapped and held for ransom. He contends, however, that there was insufficient evidence, independent of the accomplice Doolen, to connect, or tend to connect, him with the offense charged.

It appears that on the night of December 20, 1930, Caress, his wife, and the Japanese servant were kidnapped and taken to a house, where they were kept prisoners, and a demand was made on Mr. Caress for $50,000 ransom. He drew four checks and handed them to one of the persons who held them captive. He then suggested one Les Breuneman as a person likely to assist the kidnappers in cashing the checks and talked to Breuneman over the phone, requesting him to try and cash the checks at one of the gambling ships off Long Beach, and arranged an appointment for Breuneman to meet some one or more of the kidnappers. This was late on the afternoon of December 21, 1930. Later that same day a Dodge sedan carrying four passengers came to a stop on a road near one of the docks in the vicinity of Long Beach. Two police officers in a patrol car, upon seeing the automobile parked at such a place, pulled up alongside and began questioning the occupants. During the course of the questioning some one started shooting, and a somewhat extended pistol duel between the occupants of the car and the officers ensued. Two of the occupants of the sedan, namely, Ralph Sheldon, who gave his name as Ralph Sherman, and Les Breuneman were captured, but the other two escaped. Upon being searched, it was found that Les Breuneman was in possession of the four checks before referred to. The witness Doolen gave a detailed account of the defendant's participation in the kidnapping.

[1] The question presented is what evidence, independent of the witness Doolen, connects, or tends to connect, the defendant with the kidnapping? Evidence of the following facts, independent of, and not dependent upon, the testimony of witness Doolen in any way, were before the jury: (a) The automobile in which the four persons were seated when the police officers started to question them in Long Beach was registered in the name of defendant Joseph P. Baillie. (b) The ignition key used in the sedan was attached to a key case, and one of the other keys in this case fitted the lock on the front door of the house in which Caress, his wife, and their Japanese servant were then being held prisoners. The lock was in evidence, and the key was actually used in court to lock and unlock it. (c) The automobile was taken to a garage in Long Beach, but was never claimed by the defendant. Near the end of July, 1931, the wife of defendant appeared and claimed the car, and it was delivered to her. (d) The address on the registration certificate of the sedan was the residence of defendant. On discovering this fact, the officers immediately rushed to the house, arriving about midnight, found defendant's wife home and that the defendant was not at home. (e) The defendant's wife testified on his behalf, stating he had been sick in bed with the flu and asthma for five days preceding December 20th; that he had stayed home all the night of the 20th and the morning of the 21st; that on Sunday, the 21st, he had gone out to get some air; that, when the officers arrived about midnight of the 21st and asked for her husband, she thought it was he who was seeking admittance. All that night and for several days thereafter police officers remained at the Baillie home continuously, but defendant did not put in an appearance. (f) During the latter part of December and in January, defendant was seen working on a ranch which belonged to Ralph Sheldon, one of the defendants. (g) When an investigation was made of the house in which Caress, his wife, and the Japanese servant had been held prisoners, there was discovered in the fireplace a piece of burned paper which consisted of a duplicate tag or receipt issued by a shoe company at its place of business in Hollywood, located about three or four blocks from the residence of defendant, and on which ticket was written the name "Bailey." (h) The defendant was apprehended in Balboa, Panama Canal Zone, and was extradited. On the trip back he stated to the police officers that he had traveled from Los Angeles to New Orleans by bus, had then gone to Belize, British Honduras, and after a stay there had gone to Panama City and then to Balboa.

[2,3] We think this evidence, standing alone, and in no way dependent upon the testimony of the accomplice Doolen, is sufficient in itself to connect, or tend to connect, the defendant with the commission of the crime, and is squarely within the rule in California, which may be stated as follows: The corroborative evidence required by Penal Code, § 1111, need be neither strong nor convincing; it may be such that if it stood alone would be entitled to but little weight. It need not extend to all facts and details covered by the statements of the accomplice. It is sufficient if, standing alone, it connects or tends to connect, the defendant with the commission of the crime. The courts announced this rule in many cases, and have very clearly expressed it as follows: "It has been held that to corroborate an accomplice the evidence need not establish the actual commission of the offense, nor extend to every fact and detail covered by the statements of the accomplice, or to all the elements of the offense, nor prove that the accomplice has told the truth. The corroborative evidence must tend in some slight degree, at least, to implicate the defendant. While it need not be strong, more is required by way of corroboration than a mere suspicion. It is sufficient if the corroborating evidence tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, though if it stood alone it would be entitled to little weight. It is not necessary to corroborate the accomplice by direct evidence. If the connection of the accused with the alleged crime may be inferred from the corroborating evidence in the case, it is sufficient." People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452 on page 473, 229 P. 40, 49.

[4] The defendant urges that the trial court committed reversible error when it refused to allow him to make a plea of once in jeopardy. The circumstances surrounding this contention are as follows: After a jury had been impaneled to try the case and the district attorney had made his opening statement, a juror stated that the statement of the district attorney had recalled certain matters to her mind which made her feel that she could not act as a fair and unbiased juror. When the juror made this statement, the following took place in the courtroom:

"The Court: Mr. Fainer (counsel for defendant), what is your pleasure in the matter?

"Mr. Fainer: Your Honor, at this time I make a motion that this trial be declared a mistrial because of the fact that one of the jurors has made the statement after she has been sworn as a juror and the opening statement has revived something she has heard and discussed, and she could not be a fair juror in the matter; so I move at this time that this matter be declared a mistrial.

"The Court: Mr. Baillie, * * *

"Q. You have heard the statement and motion made by your counsel, that the court declare this a mistrial? A. Yes, your Honor.

"Q. Is that entirely agreeable to you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And do you stipulate that the court do order a mistrial? A. Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: Mr. District Attorney, is there anything you have to state in the matter?

"Mr. Veitch: We join in the stipulation, and we suggest this: That the stipulation be broadened to the extent that it include this jury, under that order, shall be discharged, and that a new jury shall be impaneled to try the case.

"Mr. Fainer: So stipulated, your Honor.

"The Court: Is that your stipulation, Mr. Baillie?

"Defendant Baillie: Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: You agree to that?

"Defendant Baillie: Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: Very well. For the reasons stated by the juror, Mrs. Lucas, and because of the reasons set forth in the motion of counsel for the defendant, and upon the stipulation of the defendant himself made in open court; likewise upon stipulation of the District Attorney; and good cause appearing therefor to the Court, it is now ordered that a mistrial be had in this case."

The jury was then dismissed and the case reset for trial. When it was called several days later, one of the attorneys for the defense asked leave to interpose the additional plea of once in jeopardy. In asking for such permission, he stated that he wished to enter such plea because of the dismissal of the first jury sworn in the case without such jury having reached and rendered a verdict predicated on the proceedings as hereinbefore set forth. The court refused permission to defendant to interpose such plea. With this state of the record we do not see how defendant could claim that he had been once in jeopardy or how his rights were prejudiced by a refusal to permit such claim. It must be borne in mind that all of the facts on which he desired to predicate the plea were admitted and were before the court at the time it refused him the right to make the plea. In the case of People v. Curtis, 76 Cal. 57, 17 P. 941, the defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted, and asked at the new trial to be allowed to plead once in jeopardy and former acquittal. On appeal, the Supreme Court said on page 59 of 76 Cal., 17 P. 941, 942: "As the jury was discharged with the consent of the defendant, without rendering a verdict, it must be held that there was no jeopardy and no acquittal. * * * Therefore the court did not err in refusing to allow defendant to plead former jeopardy and former acquittal. * * *" People v. Kelly (Cal. App.) 22 P.(2d) 526, lays down the rule as follows: "It is equally well settled that where a defendant has consented to the discharge of a jury before a verdict is reached, the plea of once in jeopardy is not available to him." Whatever may be the mechanics employed in the trial court in disposing of such a matter, it certainly cannot be urged as reversible error to deny defendant the right to make a plea of once in jeopardy under the facts as presented by the record in this case.

The claims by defendant that the admission of certain evidence is prejudicial error we think are disposed of by the decision in the case of People v. Frank (Cal. App.) 22 P. (2d) 792, 795, which was decided on the same indictment as this case. While the evidence objected to was not identical, the following statement in that case disposes of appellant's contention in this case adversely to him:

"Rulings of the court assigned as error relate to: (a) The admission of testimony concerning the stolen auto; (b) the purchase and delivery of a radio; (c) pistols being carried in a car; (d) conversations between Doolen and Wagner; (e) the burning of stolen clothing and a house; (f) the testimony of Wagner; (g) the testimony of Slaughter, Schack, Coit, and Mittwer in connection with the Long Beach occurrence.

"While the objections to these different elements of the testimony do not rest upon identical grounds, running strongly through them is the common ground that they have no possible relation to the issues of this case and are introduced by the state to create an atmosphere of general criminality on the part of defendants of crimes unrelated in character to the crime here involved and must have influenced the jury prejudicially against the defendants. An examination of the record as to each and all of these assignments of error indicates that the evidence had a fair tendency in every instance to show the relation existing between the defendants, to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice Doolen, and to support the theory of a conspiracy."

The claim of prejudicial misconduct on the part of the district attorney is answered by our holding that the evidence complained of was properly admitted in evidence, for it was on this conduct of the district attorney, in eliciting competent evidence, that the defendant charges him with misconduct.

Defendant was charged by information with the crime of murder, tried before a jury, found guilty, with recommendation of life imprisonment, and judgment was pronounced. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for new trial.

It appears from the evidence that the deceased, Antonio Celis, a young Mexican, had been living at North Cucamonga, at the home of defendant's father for a short time prior to his death, which occurred on December 5, 1932. Defendant likewise lived in this village, living a part of the time at his father's home and a part of the time at the home of a woman by the name of Mary Rodriguez. At about 5 o'clock on the morning of December 5, 1932, the defendant and the deceased went into the pool hall of Francisco Lopez, remained a few minutes, and bought a package of cigarettes, after which deceased and defendant walked out of the pool hall together. This is the last time the deceased was seen alive. On the afternoon of December 5th the body of deceased was found in a pepper grove about a mile from the pool hall, with his head crushed in. At about 7:30 or 8 o'clock on the morning of December 5th defendant was seen walking in the vicinity of and away from the place where the body was found. Between 8 and 8:30 o'clock of the same morning, he went to the home of Mary Rodriguez, changed his shoes, and left a shirt, on which was found human blood.

Mary Rodriguez testified that the defendant left her house about 2 o'clock on the morning of December 5, 1932, and returned about 8 or 8:30 on the same morning. He there changed his shoes, and, when she asked him why he changed his shoes, he stated that he was going to water the lawn. Investigating officers, on going to the spot where the body was found, located two pair of footprints leading into the pepper grove and one pair leading away, which were followed for a distance, and that some of the footprints contained the word "Light." The officers went to the house of Mary Rodriguez, found a pair of shoes which fit the defendant's feet, and on the rubber heels were the words "Light Wear" in raised letters. These were the same shoes identified by Mary Rodriguez as belonging to defendant.

An officer testified that he followed tracks leading out of the pepper grove from the place where the body of deceased was found to the home of Mary Rodriguez; that in a conversation with him defendant denied being at Lopez' pool hall with deceased, and denied that he had ever been with the deceased at all; that defendant denied ownership of the shoes and shirt which were found in the home of Mary Rodriguez, and declared that he had spent all night at the home of Mrs. Rodriguez, had gone to bed early on the night of December 4th, and did not get up the next day until about 9 o'clock. Other corroborating circumstances were in evidence. Defendant offered no evidence, and the verdict was based on the prosecution's case as presented.

[1, 2] While the evidence is naturally circumstantial, it is clear and convincing and clearly sufficient for the jury to determine beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant was guilty. All intendments favor upholding the judgment and the action of the trial court, and the evidence is to be viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution. People v. Dukes, 90 Cal. App. 657, 266 P. 558.

[3] A green shirt which, when tested, disclosed human blood stains, was offered as people's exhibit for identification. It later developed that it did not belong to the defendant. It was not offered in evidence other than for identification, and no motion was made to strike it from the record. If it was error to so offer the shirt, it was waived by defendant's failure to move to strike it out. People v. Balmain, 16 Cal. App. 28, 32, 116 P. 303.

[4, 5] The district attorney made two statements as follows: "All of the circumstances that point unquestionably towards the guilt of this defendant. And, what is the other side of the picture? Well, the State's case stands absolutely unchallenged. * * * All of these facts stand before you uncontradicted and undenied and unchallenged. No explanation by any sworn testimony. There is no denial of any of the substantial facts in this case." And: "Mexicans are peculiar, they are a stoical race. They can face death unflinchingly, the average Mexican can, and perhaps that is why they can take other lives unflinchingly and quite calmly." Objection was made to this, and the making of said statements is claimed by defendant to be prejudicial error.

That the first statement is not prejudicial error is decided by the following cases: People v. Wademan, 38 Cal. App. 116, 133, 175 P. 791; People v. McLeod, 30 Cal. App. 435, 438, 158 P. 506.

That the last remark, relating to the nationality of the defendant, was not prejudicial error, is decided in the cases of People v. Frost, 37 Cal. App. 120, 174 P. 106, and People v. Piazza, 84 Cal. App. 58, at page 77, 257 P. 592.

A careful and full investigation of the record convinces us that there were no substantial errors in the admission of evidence, that the jury was fully and fairly instructed, and that defendant was convicted after a full, fair, and impartial trial.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Evidence held to sustain court's finding that operator of crane, hired by contractor, was employed by owner, so as to render latter liable to contractor for compensation paid its employees for injuries sustained through operator's negligence (St. 1917, p. 854, § 26, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1213).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by the Llewellyn Iron Works, a corporation, against Lisle Smith, individually and doing business under the fictitious firm name of Smith Bros. Truck Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Harry William Elliott, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Justice.

The plaintiff and respondent Llewellyn Iron Works was engaged in erecting tanks for the Dominguez Chemical Company. Prior to the date of the accident which was the cause of the controversy, the respondent hired a crane belonging to defendant and appellant Smith to assist in this work, together with two of the employees of appellant, defendant A. Stratton, who was the operator of the crane, and defendant Norris Bakko, who was the driver of the truck. Norris Bakko, at the time of the trial of this case, was found free of negligence, and the case as to him was dismissed, with his costs. The respondent's cause of action is of the nature known as a derivative one, which arose by virtue of subrogation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. An award was had under the Workmen's Compensation Act against the Llewellyn Iron Works; this action being brought under authority of section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 854, Amendment St. 1927, p. 1213). Under this section the respondent became obligated to pay workmen's compensation on account of injuries sustained by respondent's employees through the negligence of appellants, and became subrogated to the rights of these injured employees against appellants. The respondent's cause of action, therefore, was a derivative one; that is, the cause of action which the respondent's employees had against the appellants, and which, by virtue of said section 26, was by said section in effect assigned to the respondent.

The trial court found that at the time in question Stratton was in the sole employ of appellant Smith, a general employer, and that Smith's right of control and supervision over Stratton by virtue of such general employment had not been relinquished to respondent. (Findings I and VII, Clerk's Trans., pp. 18, 22; Supplement 1, fols. 33 and 45.) Although the principal question to be determined is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support these findings, the appellants also claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's finding of negligence, and that the court erred in excluding certain testimony. There was some conflict in the evidence, but there was sufficient evidence to sustain the trial court's finding as to the employment of Stratton and as to Stratton's negligence.

[1] As to the findings as to the employment of Stratton, the evidence showed that the control of Stratton and his control of the crane and truck which caused the injury was somewhat similar to the control of the elephant and its trainer in the case of McComas v. Al. G. Barnes Shows Co., 215 Cal. 685, 12 P.(2d) 630. The plaintiff in that case was injured by reason of some defect in the fastening of a howdah, which turned and caused plaintiff to fall from the elephant rented to the Wm. Fox Studio by the Alliance Investment Company, whose trainer handled and was expected to control the elephant, which was brought there for the use of the Wm. Fox Studio in the taking of a certain motion picture.

But the way in which the trainer was to prepare the elephant and its equipment for such use, including the way the howdah was placed on the elephant so as to carry the plaintiff, was left entirely to such trainer. The plaintiff was injured by reason of the slipping of the howdah and the lack of proper handling of the elephant by such trainer. This is similar in this, that in the instant case the crane, by reason of the careless handling of the same, and not by reason of the nature of the work directed to be done by the plaintiff, in fact contrary to its express orders, caused the injury. The way in which the instrument was handled, in the one case the crane and truck, and in the other the elephant, was left to the operator of the crane in the one case and the trainer of the elephant in the other. The operator was not told how far to swing his crane, or derrick, in picking up any steel, except the warning that there was a high-tension wire overhead. And in the McComas Case, supra, no instruction was given by the Fox Studio as to how the trainer was to make the elephant move over to where it was to work, and no instruction as to how the howdah was to be held in place on the elephant when it was doing the things expected of it by the Fox Studio. The operator of the crane or derrick "was employed by appellant on account of his peculiar skill and knowledge in the handling" (quoting from the McComas Case, supra) of the crane or derrick. In the McComas Case, supra, page 693 of 215 Cal., 12 P.(2d) 630, 633, the Supreme Court said: "In the case of Stewart v. California Improvement Company, 131 Cal. 125, 131, 52 L. R. A. 205, 63 P. 177, 179, 724, the city of Oakland had hired from the California Improvement Company a steam roller together with an engineer to operate the same. The steam roller was used by the city in rolling and leveling its streets. While the engineer was in charge of said steam roller, steam escaped from its engine through the safety valve in front of plaintiff's horse. The horse became frightened, 'wheeled short around and tilted over plaintiff's cart, and the plaintiff, without any fault on his part, was thrown out and dashed violently upon the ground.' In an action to recover for the injuries so sustained, the question arose as to whether the engineer at the time of the accident was in the employ of the city or of the defendant, California Investment Company. In deciding that question this court held as follows: 'The test in all these cases is, Who conducts and supervises the particular work, the doing of which, or the careless and negligent doing of which, causes the injury or damage? Here the city simply hired the use of the street roller outfit from the defendant company—to wit, the roller, engine, and the engineer to manage the same—for so much a day. The city's agent—foreman of the street superintendent—only directed or supervised how and where the street should be rolled. He did not have the control or management of the engine; this was subject entirely to the judgment of the engineer, the servant of the owner, the defendant company, who had selected and employed him for that special purpose, paid him his wages, and had the sole right to discharge him. We think the conclusion of law deduced by the court below from the facts found that the defendants are liable, and not the city of Oakland, is correct.'"

[2] The objection as to the introduction of evidence is directed principally against the refusal of the trial court to allow a witness to give his conclusion instead of stating the facts upon which he based such conclusion. We find nothing in the record that justifies a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY

Civ. 9026.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

July 25, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Sept. 21,
1933.

1. Eminent domain ☞76.

Court ordering city in eminent domain proceedings to deposit in court money required as security to property owners had positive duty to enforce its order requiring deposit of sum court determined as value of property (Const. art. 1, § 14).

2. Eminent domain ☞76.

City in eminent domain proceedings, availing itself of immediate possession, had absolute obligation to deposit in court amount of money determined as necessary to give property owners adequate security (Const. art. 1, § 14).

HOUSER, J., dissenting.

Petition by the G. H. Deacon Investment Company and others for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and others.

Writ granted.

Oliver O. Clark, Victor T. Watkins, and David Fulwider, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., and Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

Following the commencement of an action by the city of Los Angeles for the condemnation for public highway purposes of certain property of which the petitioners were the owners, the city deposited with the court the sum of $4,243.84 as security to the owners for the payment to them of just compensation, etc., for the property proposed to be taken. This was done pursuant to an order obtained upon ex parte application made by the plaintiff, in accordance with the permission given by section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution of California. That section contains the following provisions, pertinent to the questions now before us in this case: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner; * * * provided, that in an action in eminent domain brought by the state, or a county, or a municipal corporation, * * * the aforesaid state or political subdivision thereof or district may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposited as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, * * * as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings. * * *"

Thus having paid into court said sum of $4,243.84, the city immediately took possession of said property. Thereafter, and on the same day on which an interlocutory judgment was made and entered by which the value of the property and interest thereon was determined, the respondent court made its order by which the said city was directed to increase the amount of its deposit in said action in the additional sum of $75,750. Without complying with said order, the city filed its notice of appeal from the judgment. Thereupon, in pursuance of a hearing before the respondent court on an order to show cause why the city of Los Angeles and certain of its officers should not be held in contempt of court for their failure to comply with the order of said court by which the said city of Los Angeles was so directed to increase the amount of its deposit in the action, the respondent court made the following order:

"In the above entitled cause defendants filed a petition and secured an order to show cause why plaintiff, its officers, agents and representatives should not be punished for contempt, for non-compliance with an order made by the Court herein on January 30th 1933. The order last above referred to required plaintiff to deposit with the County Clerk of Los Angeles County forthwith certain monies as an additional amount to secure the immediate payment to defendants as compensation for taking of their property. The plaintiff has not complied with the order. Upon making said deposit by plaintiff the defendants can immediately draw down said money, and there is no provision of law to recover same in the event a new trial is ordered on an appeal, and a lesser amount awarded. This practically prevents plaintiff from having an appeal from the awards made by the Court. It is not the intent or desire of the Court to prevent plaintiff proceeding with an appeal, and it appears to me unjustified to do so.

"Therefore, it is hereby ordered that plaintiff be, and hereby is, relieved of complying with the order of the court dated January 30th, 1933, requiring it to deposit certain monies with the Clerk of the Court, that it be purged of contempt and the petition dismissed."

Following the entry of this order, the defendants in the action procured from this court its alternative writ of mandate by which the respondent court was directed to enforce its former order by which the said city of Los Angeles was required to increase the amount of its deposit in the action as aforesaid; or that respondent court appear and show cause why it has not enforced its said order. The writ was directed to all of the respondents named in the petition, including the city and certain of its officers; but it will be sufficient for us to consider, as our principal subject, the duty of respondent court.

Respondents have replied both by demurrer to the petition and by answer. The facts alleged by petitioner are admitted, in all essential particulars. Therefore the case presents for decision the single question: On the facts as stated, does there rest upon respondent court a positive duty to enforce the order requiring that said money be deposited in court as security for the owner?

[1] Referring to the provisions of the state Constitution, quoted above, we find that the city is given the privilege to take possession of the defendants' property, in advance of actual payment therefor, only by first depositing in court such amount of money as the court has found to be "reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation," etc., as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court, by its order altering the amount of such security, has fixed and determined the amount of the deposit to be made. The right of the defendants, thus determined, is derived directly from the Constitution, and not from any allowance thereof by the court. It is the court's duty to determine the amount to be deposited, and to make its order accordingly. But the court is not vested with any discretionary authority to grant or withhold the security to which the defendants are entitled.

[2] The provisions of the statute in relation to the right of the plaintiff, in a condemnation case, to abandon the proceeding, have no relation to the present matter. The plaintiff here has not abandoned the proceeding. On the contrary, plaintiff has taken the property and has actually made the proposed improvement and opened it to public use. Whatever right of election it had, with respect to availing itself of the "immediate possession" provisions of the Constitution, the plaintiff has exercised. There remains the absolute obligation, correlative with the owner's constitutional rights, to deposit in court the amount of money which has been determined to be the amount necessary to give adequate security.

It has been suggested, as justification for the failure of plaintiff to deposit said money that, if it does make the deposit, the plaintiff will have a right to withdraw the money, and that then the appeal from the judgment will be dismissed on the ground that it has become a "moot case." Whether this consequence would follow, or whether such withdrawal of the funds while the appeal is pending could be controlled by the superior court, are questions which we think are not relevant to the matter now before us for decision. At all events, it is the present duty of the city of Los Angeles to deposit in court the amount of the required security, and it is the present duty of the respondent court to enforce its order in the premises.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Appellant's wife, Rose Mary Christianson, and his minor daughter, aged six, were killed instantly in a collision between a train operated by the respondent railroad company and an automobile driven by Mrs. Christianson, which occurred about 9 o'clock on the morning of December 3, 1930, in Palo Alto, at the Churchill avenue crossing; and by reason thereof appellant brought these two actions for damages. They were consolidated for trial, and at the conclusion of the evidence the trial court held as matter of law that negligence on the part of appellant's wife contributed proximately to the happening of the accident, and accordingly the jury was instructed to find for the respondents. Such verdicts were returned, and from the judgments entered thereon this appeal is being prosecuted.

There is no conflict as to the essential facts. The Christiansons lived in Palo Alto, on the west side of and approximately 200 feet from the main line double tracks of said company, where the accident occurred; and from their home they had a clear view of said tracks and knew of the operation of trains thereover. It was customary for Mrs. Christianson to drive her daughter to school every morning, and in order to reach the school it was necessary to cross the railroad tracks at the Churchill avenue crossing. At this crossing the railroad company maintained an automatic wigwag signal, which, besides swinging forward and back, rang a bell and displayed a red light as a warning of the approach of trains from either direction. The tracks on both sides of the crossing were straight and the view thereof unobstructed for a long distance. A south-bound passenger train (No. 78) and a north-bound passenger train (the Lark) passed each other every morning usually near the Churchill avenue crossing; and Mrs. Christianson was familiar with all these conditions. On the morning of the accident there was a heavy low fog, but, as will hereinafter appear, the approach of the north-bound train which collided with the automobile could be seen for a distance of at least 200 feet from the crossing. As Mrs. Christianson drove up to the crossing the wigwag signal was swinging, the bell operated thereby was ringing, and the red light was displayed, and she brought her automobile to a stop near the tracks, on the westerly side thereof. About the same time two other automobiles, one driven by Herbert E. Browning and the other by Professor Harris J. Ryan of Stanford University, approached the tracks from the opposite (easterly) direction and stopped on the easterly side thereof, diagonally across from Mrs. Christianson; and almost immediately the south-bound train, No. 78, passed by. As soon as it had cleared the crossing and while the automatic warning signal was still in full operation, Browning crossed the tracks, Mrs. Christianson attempted to do likewise, but as her automobile reached the easterly track it was struck and demolished by the on-coming north-bound train, and Mrs. Christianson and the child were killed.

The foregoing facts were established mainly by the testimony of Browning, Professor Ryan, and a Mr. Burke. In this regard, Browning testified that, as soon as the south-bound train passed he started across the tracks; that when his automobile reached the first rail he heard a train whistle, and looking to the south, he saw the headlight of the engine of the north-bound train as it emerged from the fog; that he continued on, and as he reached the other side of the right of way he passed Mrs. Christianson's machine which had not then started across the tracks; that almost immediately after passing her he heard a crash, and looking in the "rear-view" mirror on the windshield of his car he saw flames underneath the train; that he stopped at once and went back to the scene of the accident. Professor Ryan testified that he saw the automobile operated by Mrs. Christianson drive up to and stop on the opposite side of the crossing just as the south-bound train approached the crossing; and that about the same time the car operated by Browning drove up alongside of him and stopped; that, as soon as the south-bound train cleared the crossing, Browning started up and crossed the tracks; and that, although the crossing signal was still in full operation, Mrs. Christianson's car "was getting under way, with some hesitation" to cross the tracks; that at that moment he heard the whistle of the north-bound train, and looking to the south saw the headlight of the engine as it came out of the fog; that the engine was then about 200 feet south of the crossing; and that immediately following the crash occurred. Burke's testimony was substantially the same as that given by Professor Ryan. He was approaching the crossing in an automobile from the easterly side, on Churchill avenue, as the south-bound train passed. He saw the Browning car cross the tracks immediately after it had passed, and also saw Mrs. Christianson start across from the other side, after the whistle of the north-bound train had been sounded and the headlight of the engine appeared through the fog, and notwithstanding that the automatic warning signal at the crossing was in full operation. He further stated that when he first saw the headlight of the engine through the fog the train was just passing Colorado avenue, which was 400 feet from the Churchill avenue crossing.

There were two other witnesses to the accident, one of whom merely saw the impact from a window in a house some distance from the crossing. However, he saw and heard the operation of the automatic warning signal at the crossing after the south-bound train had passed, indicating the approach of the north-bound train. The other witness was a considerable distance from the crossing when the impact took place, his testimony as to the distance being uncertain. He was driving an automobile in a southerly direction toward the crossing along a street on the easterly side of and running parallel with the tracks. He stated that he heard the train whistle and saw the headlight of the engine as it came out of the fog, and he, too, fixed the location of the train at that time at some distance beyond the point fixed by Professor Ryan.

The speed of the train at the time of the accident was not definitely established. Its average running time between San Jose and Palo Alto was between forty and fifty miles an hour. However, the locomotive fireman, who was watching the track ahead from the left side of the cab, testified that when they were about 150 feet south of the crossing he saw the Christianson car start across the track in front of the train; that he instantly called to the engineer to "hold the train," meaning to shut off the steam and apply the emergency brakes; that this was done instantly, bringing the train to a stop as soon as possible. Both the fireman and the engineer corroborated the testimony of the other witnesses that on approaching the crossing the whistle was sounded, stating that two long blasts, one short, and one long, were given; furthermore, they stated that the locomotive bell was ringing constantly from the time the train left San Jose.

[1] In view of the foregoing undisputed facts, the trial court was fully justified, in our opinion, in holding, as matter of law, that the accident was proximately caused by the negligence of appellant's wife in failing to give heed to the obvious signals of danger there present. As shown by the positive uncontradicted testimony of Browning, Professor Ryan, and Burke, she started to cross the tracks after the engineer of the north-bound train had sounded the whistle more than an eighth of a mile south of the crossing, and after the headlight was plainly visible from the crossing. And even accepting the theory that she did not hear the whistle, or, if she did hear it, that she believed it was sounded by the south-bound train, it is evident that she did not take the precaution to look in that direction before attempting to cross the tracks, because manifestly, if she had so looked, she, like the witnesses mentioned, would have seen the headlight of the engine. Moreover, and aside from the warnings given by the train whistle and the headlight, the evidence shows positively that she attempted to cross the tracks in the face of the warning given by the full operation of the automatic crossing signal.

The legal rules by which the conduct of a traveler about to cross a railroad track are to be governed are well established by a long line of decisions in this state, and it seems wholly unnecessary to restate or discuss them here. Most of the cases upon the subject are reviewed at length in the recent case of Koster v. Southern Pacific Co., 207 Cal. 753, 279 P. 788; and a still later case involving a situation more closely resembling the present one in its facts is Vilhauer v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 118 Cal. App. 240, 4 P.(2d) 960; and when those rules are applied here it becomes manifest that the trial court did not err in holding as matter of law that the contributory negligence of appellant's wife bars recovery in both actions.

[2] Appellant emphasizes the point that the view of the approaching train was obscured by the heavy fog, all of which may be true; but it has been held, in substance, that, where, as here, a traveler is familiar with a railroad crossing and the operation of trains thereover, and his view is obscured by a dense fog, he should observe even greater caution in crossing the tracks than he would if the atmosphere were clear; and that damages for injuries sustained may not be recovered, if, under such conditions, he attempts to cross without the exercise of due caution to look and listen for approaching trains. Hoffman v. Southern Pacific Co., 84 Cal. App. 337, 258 P. 397; Id., 101 Cal. App. 218, 281 P. 681.

The judgment in each action is affirmed.

Motion granted, and judgment affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Moote & Longcroft, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, Justice.

Under the provisions of rule V of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, the respondent has presented to this court his motion to dismiss the appeal herein, or to affirm the judgment from which such appeal is taken.

The judgment was the outcome of an action for damages which resulted from a collision, alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the driver of a truck of which the defendant was the owner, with an automobile which at the time when the accident occurred belonged to and was being operated by plaintiff.

Each of several points presented in the opening brief of appellant for a reversal of the judgment is founded upon the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff, and is predicated upon the claim that at the time when the accident occurred the brakes of plaintiff's automobile were not in the condition required by the terms of section 94 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2115, § 27), which, among other things, provides that "it shall be unlawful for any person to operate on any public highway any motor vehicle * * * unless equipped with brakes adequate to bring such motor vehicle * * * to a complete stop when operated upon dry asphalt or concrete pavement surface where the grade does not exceed one per cent, and when operating at speeds set forth in the following table, within the distances set opposite such speeds: * * * 15 miles per hour, 20.8 feet; 20 miles per hour, 37 feet. * * *

[1, 2] In that connection, in effect the specific contention by the appellant is that since by the undisputed evidence it appears that immediately preceding the time when, and at a distance of fifty feet from the point where the accident occurred, plaintiff was driving his automobile at a speed of between fifteen and twenty miles per hour, at which time and place he realized the imminence of danger, "slapped on his brakes and tried to stop the car in the shortest possible space," in consideration of the statutory provision to which reference just has been had, together with the fact that within the space of fifty feet he failed to stop his automobile, the deduction must be that, as required or defined by the terms of the statute, the brakes on said automobile were inadequate, and for that reason plaintiff was guilty of a violation of the law which contributed proximately to the happening of the accident. But it is well-established law that in an action for damages arising from the alleged negligence of the defendant therein, where for a defense thereto he relies upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the burden is on the defendant to establish that conclusion of law or fact. By reference to the statute controlling the instant situation, it will be noted that as conditions precedent to the establishment of the adequacy of the brakes of an automobile it should appear both that such automobile was "operated on dry asphalt or concrete pavement," and that "the grade does not exceed one per cent." And since appellant makes no pretense that either or any of such requirements was or were respectively complied with or established by evidence introduced on the trial of the action, it necessarily results that he has failed to sustain the burden which the law casts upon him. It is manifest that, notwithstanding the inability of plaintiff to stop his automobile within the prescribed distance, if the surface of the highway was neither "dry asphalt (n) or concrete pavement, or if the grade of the highway exceeded one per cent," in such circumstances the statutory inadequacy of the brakes on plaintiff's automobile was not established; nor as a consequence of such inability on the part of plaintiff could his contributory negligence legally be presumed. It follows that, as shown by appellant's brief, none of defendant's several points which are dependent upon the asserted contributory negligence of plaintiff can be sustained.

[3] Appellant's brief fails to disclose the existence of evidence which necessarily would lead to the conclusion that plaintiff's injuries were the result of his failure to exercise ordinary care. In that regard, the findings of fact by the trial court, based upon sufficient evidence, are conclusive.

With respect to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the several findings of fact relating especially to the amount of the damage suffered by plaintiff, an examination of the statement of facts contained in the appellant's brief affords ample foundation upon which to rest the award by the trial court.

Although an inspection of the record reveals the fact that in summing up the several items of damage an error in addition thereof was made, with the result that judgment was ordered in favor of plaintiff for an amount greater than that to which he was entitled, nevertheless it also appears from the record that on the ruling on the motion for a new trial such error was corrected by order of the trial court, which correction was accepted and adopted by plaintiff.

Since it is apparent that "the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument" (rule V), it follows that the motion should be granted, and that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

J. P. Bernhard and Frank Kauke, both of Fresno, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the respondent tax collector of Fresno county and his surety in an action for damages resulting from the giving of a defective tax deed to appellant. The complaint contains two causes of action. The first alleges that the tax collector failed and refused to execute and deliver to appellant any deed after he had become the purchaser at a tax sale. The second alleges that the tax collector gave appellant a void deed which conveyed no title to him, and refused to give him a correction deed after the defects in the first deed were discovered.

Joseph L. Chevalier owned the property in question, and failed to pay the second installment of taxes for the fiscal year 1921-1922. The tax collector sold the property to appellant in 1927 and gave him a deed to the property. Appellant then started suit to quiet title to the property, which resulted in a judgment in favor of Chevalier upon the payment of $42.70 into court for appellant, the amount of the taxes, penalties, costs, and interest. This judgment was affirmed on appeal September 16, 1929. Carter v. Chevalier, 100 Cal. App. 567, 280 P. 706. The court held the tax deed void. On November 22, 1929, appellant received the $42.70 from the county clerk, and on December 4, 1929, the further sum of $126.99 from the county of Fresno; this being the balance of the sum he had paid at the tax sale. About March 4, 1929, appellant made demand on the tax collector for the execution of a correction tax deed, which demand was refused. This action was commenced on November 27, 1929.

From the view we take of the case, it is not necessary for us to discuss the possibility of liability on the part of a tax collector to respond in damages for the execution of a tax deed so defective in form that it is void.

It is elemental that, to recover, the appellant must prove that he suffered damage as a result of the defective tax deed. Conversely, if the tax deed had been legal in form, he still would suffer no damage, unless it would vest in him some interest in the property it purported to convey. On this question the evidence shows he proved the execution of the void deed and the market value of the property and nothing more.

[1] An owner may defeat the effect of an apparently valid tax deed by proving that the land was not assessed as required by law (De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 653, 30 P. 1, 28 Am. St. Rep. 151); that the tax sale was not made at the proper time or as required by law (Bernhard v. Wall, 184 Cal. 612, 194 P. 1040); that notice thereof was not properly given (Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 P. 527). In Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 P. 920, 922, it was said: "It may be regarded as settled that the legislature may make a tax deed conclusive evidence of a compliance with all provisions of the statute which are merely directory of the mode in which the power of taxation may be exercised, but that it cannot make it conclusive evidence of those matters which are essential to the exercise of the power; that as to those steps which are jurisdictional in their nature, and without which the power of taxation cannot be called into exercise,—such as the listing or assessment of the property, a levy of the tax, some notice of its delinquency, and that the property will be sold therefor,—the legislature cannot deprive the owner of the right to show want of compliance. Mr. Cooley says (Const. Lim. p. 452): 'A statute which should make a tax deed conclusive evidence of a complete title, and preclude the owner of the original title from showing its invalidity, would be void, because being not a law regulating evidence, but an unconstitutional confiscation of property.'"

[2] This being an action for damages resulting from the giving of a void tax deed, and the deed having been held void by the courts of the state, appellant should have introduced evidence to establish the legality of the proceedings upon which the deed was based in order to support the conclusion that by the defects in the deed he lost the value of an interest in the property which it described.

[3] Appellant urges that the tax collector should have acceded to his demand of March 4, 1929, and have given him a correction deed, valid on its face. In 24 California Jurisprudence, 371, it is said: "When a tax deed does not conform in its recitals to the facts, the tax collector may, without special statutory authorization, execute a second and corrected deed, but he has no power to execute a deed which misstates the facts respecting proceedings prior to its execution." There is no evidence in the record which would justify the conclusion that the facts of the tax proceeding were such that the tax collector could have executed a valid correction deed without misstating these facts. This he is not required to do.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Mandamus actions by Patrick T. Dooley and by Fred L. Edwards against James Hervey Johnson, Assessor of San Diego County. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

Fred A. Steiner, of San Diego, for appellants.

Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., and Frank T. Dunn, Chief Deputy, both of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

These two cases were consolidated for the purpose of trial. The plaintiffs each joined the United States Navy early in 1919 and continued to serve in the said Navy until 1923, when they were honorably discharged from said service. Each of them in the time required by law made application to the defendant, who was then the duly qualified and acting county assessor of the county of San Diego, Cal., for a veteran's tax exemption for the year 1932 as provided for by section 1¼ of article 13 of the Constitution of this state. The said assessor having denied to each of said plaintiffs the said exemption provided for by said section of the Constitution, they each filed a petition for an alternative writ of mandate praying that said assessor be directed to grant the said tax exemption to each of said plaintiffs. At the hearing of said petitions, the trial court entered a judgment denying each of them, and from this judgment plaintiffs have appealed.

Section 1¼ of article 13 of the Constitution of this state in part provides that the property to the amount of $1,000 of every resident of this state who has served in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps or Revenue Marine Service of the United States in time of war, and has received an honorable discharge therefrom, shall be exempt from taxation, with certain exceptions that have no application to the cases now under consideration.

Section 3612 of the Political Code as it stood in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 351) contained four subdivisions. Subdivision 1 provides for the procedure for tax exemptions of veterans. Subdivision 2 requires affidavits by the applicants for exemptions. Subdivision 3 provides that the assessor may require proof in addition to the affidavit of the applicant before granting the exemption, and subdivision 4 contains a list of the recognized wars within the meaning of the said constitutional provision. Subdivision 4 was amended in 1919 by adding thereto the words "War with Germany-Austria, April 6, 1917" (St. 1919, p. 305), and again amended in 1929 by adding the words "to and including November 11, 1918" (St. 1929, p. 441). An armistice was entered into on November 11, 1918, between the belligerent nations, and thereafter hostilities were not renewed. On July 2, 1921, peace between the United States and Germany and Austria was declared by joint resolution of congress.

The sole question presented for determination on this appeal is whether or not one who served in the United States Navy after the Armistice was in force and before peace was declared and who was honorably discharged is entitled to the exemption provided for in section 1¼ of article 13 of the Constitution.

Section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution prohibits the Legislature from passing local or special laws in certain enumerated cases, of which the following: Subdivision 19: "Granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity."

It is admitted that appellants possessed all the requirements entitling them to the said exemptions, provided they had served in time of the war that existed between the United States and Germany-Austria. Appellants contend that, although hostilities had ceased between the nations on November 11, 1918, by virtue of the Armistice, nevertheless a state of war continued to exist until peace was declared on July 2, 1921; that therefore that part of subdivision 4 (u) of section 3612 of the Political Code, which declares that the said war ended on November 11, 1918, is unconstitutional and void so far as it affects the rights of veterans who served in the Navy after the date of said armistice, but before peace was declared on July 2, 1921.

[1] Bouvier defines an armistice as being "an agreement between belligerent forces for a temporary cessation of hostilities. The condition of war between the parties continues in all other respects and produces its usual effects." 1 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, third revision, 238, 239.

"A truce or suspension of arms," says Kent, "does not terminate the war, but it is one of the commercium belli which suspends its operation. * * * At the expiration of the truce, hostilities may recommence without any fresh declaration of war." 1 Kent's Commentaries (14th Ed.) pp. 160, 161. An armistice effects nothing but a suspension of hostilities. Commercial Cable Co. v. Burleson (D. C.) 255 F. 99; Weisman v. United States (C. C. A.) 271 F. 944; Ex parte Sichofsky (D. C.) 273 F. 694.

The Supreme Court of the United States holds that a war does not end at the date of an armistice, but continues until peace is declared. Hijo v. United States, 194 U. S. 315, 24 S. Ct. 727, 48 L. Ed. 994; Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries Co., 251 U. S. 146-165, 40 S. Ct. 106, 64 L. Ed. 194. However, in Scott v. Commissioner of Civil Service, 272 Mass. 237, 172 N. E. 218, the court, in construing a statute (St. 1919, c. 150, § 1) defining the word "veteran" as used in said act, held that it meant any person who had served in the Army or Navy of the United States prior to the Armistice and had been honorably discharged. This statute provided that a veteran was one who had enlisted in the Army or Navy of the United States in time of war and had been honorably discharged. Petitioner had enlisted in the United States Navy on November 13, 1918, and had been honorably discharged. In the course of its decision, the court said that it was doubtless true, as claimed by petitioner, that, strictly speaking, the Armistice is not the end of the warfare, but is a temporary suspension of hostilities, but all warfare ceased when the Armistice was signed, and hostilities were not thereafter renewed; that it is common knowledge that upon the Signing of the Armistice the war was actually at an end, and was so regarded by everyone, and that therefore it cannot be rightfully held that it was still in existence after November 11, 1918.

[2, 3] We are of the opinion that the weight of authority upholds petitioners' contention that the said war did not terminate at the date of the Armistice, but continued until peace was declared on July 2, 1921, and that the words "in time of war" as used in section 1¼ of article 13 of the Constitution have reference to the date when peace was declared between the said belligerent nations. This being true the act of the Legislature fixing the date of the ending of said war as of November 11, 1918, is therefore in violation of the Constitution and void.

In Franchise Motor Freight Ass'n v. Seavey, 196 Cal. 77, 235 P. 1000, 1002, the court said: "It is well settled that the authority and duty to ascertain the facts which will justify classified legislation rests in the first instance with the Legislature. Every presumption is in favor of the validity of the legislative determination, and its decision as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant the classification will not be overthrown by the courts unless it is palpably arbitrary. Anastasion v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 93, 227 P. 762; People v. Monterey Fish Products Co., 195 Cal. 548, 234 P. 398 [38 A. L. R. 1186]. It is equally well settled that a statute makes an improper and unlawful discrimination if it confers particular privileges upon a class arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the privileges granted, and between whom and the persons not so favored no reasonable distinction or substantial difference can be found justifying the inclusion of the one and the exclusion of the other. 5 Cal. Jur. 825, and cases cited."

The tax exemptions granted by the Constitution to veterans applied to all who had served in time of war and not to a selected class. The attempt of the Legislature to limit the said exemptions to the veterans who served prior to the armistice was an arbitrary classification, not founded upon a reasonable distinction or a substantial difference justifying the exclusion of the veterans who served after the Armistice and prior to the declaration of peace.

[4] The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. This equal protection clause makes but one demand upon the state, and gives the state but one right. It is that the state shall make and execute and interpret its laws without discrimination. It must not grant rights to one which under similar circumstances it denies to another. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Garrott, 42 Cal. App. 152, 183 P. 470; 5 Cal. Jur. 792.

Section 1¼ of article 13 of the Constitution has been amended several times; once in 1922 and again in 1926; but no change has ever been made in that part of it that refers to service in time of war.

[5] It is a general rule, in construing the provisions of the Constitution, that the natural and ordinary meaning of the words employed is to be accepted, unless they are technical or ambiguous, or except where the meaning has been established by statute or by judicial construction. San Francisco v. McGovern, 28 Cal. App. 491, 152 P. 980; City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 192 P. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425; San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 161 Cal. 610, 119 P. 1073, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 686; Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462, 14 P. 27, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67. The words "in time of war" are neither technical nor ambiguous. They have, in effect, received judicial construction by the highest court in this country. That construction we cannot do otherwise than follow.

The judgment is reversed.

WENDLER v. PICKWICK STAGES SYSTEM.
Civ. 4581.District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 2, 1933.

1. Trial $\S$ 139(1).

Weight to be given to evidence, and where preponderance thereof lies, is question of fact.

2. Carriers $\S$ 318(3).

In action by passenger for injuries sustained on auto stage when defective rim caused blow-out, based on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, evidence held not to sustain defendant's allegation that accident was caused by latent defect (Civ. Code, $\S$ 2100).

Evidence disclosed that defendant's employee inspected tires on day of accident, that the tire which blew out had no cut and was not worn very badly, and the rim seemed to be all right so far as he could observe with naked eye, that he looked rims over to see that lugs were on and that lock rings were on each of them, that it was impossible to observe condition of rim without removing tire, and he did not remove tires, that he did not sound out rims with hammer, and defective rim was not produced at trial.

3. Carriers $\S$ 320(1).

Whether operator of auto stage exercised due care to discover defect in wheel which caused accident and injury to passenger was question for court trying action without jury (Civ. Code, $\S$ 2100).

4. Carriers $\S$ 318(3).

Evidence warranted finding that examination of rims of wheels on auto stage was insufficient as respected liability for injuries to passenger when tire on stage blew out (Civ. Code, $\S$ 2100).

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; T. H. Selvage, Judge.

Action by Mary H. Wendler against the Pickwick Stages System. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Nelson & Ricks, of Eureka, for appellant.

A. G. Bradford, of Eureka, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while riding as a passenger on an auto stage owned and operated by the defendant who was a common carrier. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Findings of fact were entered in favor of the plaintiff, and she was awarded a judgment in the sum of $4,362.45. From the judgment the defendant has appealed to this court.

Plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The answer alleges as a special defense: "That the tire-rim on one of the wheels of defendant's said automobile, which caused the tire to blow out on said automobile stage of defendant became broken and disconnected and was defective, thereby rendering further control of said automobile stage by the operator thereof impossible; that defendant used all reasonable precaution and diligence and the highest degree of care by way of inspecting the said automobile stage, and especially the wheels and tire-rims and tires on said automobile stage immediately prior to the accident referred to in plaintiff's said complaint, but that said defect, or defects, were latent and not susceptible to discovery and that said accident was wholly unavoidable on the part of this defendant."

The evidence discloses that the plaintiff was riding as a passenger in the defendant's auto stage from Eureka to Trinidad, in Humboldt county, Cal. At a point near McKinleyville, the stage suddenly plunged from the highway into a ditch where it turned partly over against an embankment. The plaintiff was thrown violently from her seat in the stage to the floor. Her knee and back were injured. She was taken from the auto stage through a window and hurried to a hospital in Eureka, Cal., where examinations disclosed a very severe sprain of the right knee. The knee was very much swollen and extremely painful. She remained in the hospital twenty-three days and was removed from there to her daughter's home in Eureka, where she was under treatment for her injuries for a long period of time. The trial of the action was held nearly two years after the accident, and the plaintiff was still under treatment and suffered very severe pain, and was unable to walk, except with the aid of a crutch or cane. She has also developed what is called "climatic arthritis" and she will always be an invalid. Plaintiff established that she had paid her stage fare in advance, and it was admitted that defendant was a common carrier of passengers for hire.

It is well settled that common carriers for hire are required to use the utmost precaution and diligence for the safety of their passengers. Section 2100, Civ. Code; Kline v. Santa Barbara, etc., Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 741, 745, 90 P. 125; Drury v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 102 Cal. App. 58, 63, 282 P. 525; Jianou v. Pickwick Stages System, 111 Cal. App. 754, 757, 296 P. 108.

[1, 2] It is contended by the defendant that, irrespective of the doctrine of res ipsa loqui-

tur and the inference deducible therefrom that the accident was caused by the negligence of the defendant, the latter having offered evidence to show how the accident happened, the effort made by it to keep its stages in good and safe operation, and to prove that the accident was not caused by any negligence on the part of the defendant or any of its employees, but was, in fact, due to the existence of a latent defect which the defendant knew nothing of and could not by the exercise of the utmost care and diligence have anticipated and, there being no rebuttal of such evidence offered by them, the evidence does not sustain the findings of negligence made by the court. In support of this theory, defendant has offered many citations of authorities to show that irrespective of proof sustaining the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the plaintiff is not relieved of the burden of proof, and defendant need only meet the plaintiff's case by evidence of equal weight. Scarborough v. Urgo, 191 Cal. 341, 346, 216 P. 584; Scellars v. Universal Service Everywhere, 68 Cal. App. 252, 228 P. 879; Valente v. Sierra Railway Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 P. 481. While this is a correct statement of the law and sustained by the above authorities, we do not deem it applicable to the facts of this case. The weight to be given to the evidence, and where the preponderance thereof lies, is always a question of fact for the court or jury. The only evidence offered by the defendant as to the inspection of the wheel admitted by the defendant to be the cause of the accident, is that of one Shirley Callahan that it was his duty to "air up" the tires, inspect all the tires upon all the busses, make all changes of the tires off of the rims, remount the tires on the rims that go on the wheels, check the alignment of the front wheels, and keep a log of the tires that were running on the Pickwick Stages System; that he remembered the particular stage upon which the plaintiff was riding and examined the wheels thereon at about 1:30 in the afternoon of the day of the accident; that he found the tires to be all right. The tire that blew out had no cuts in it and it was not worn very badly, and the rim seemed to be all right so far as he could observe with the eye. He saw no crack or split in the rim. It did not appear to be rusted or defective. There was nothing to indicate that it was not safe to leave on the stage for further operation. He had been working in that particular line of work for three years, and on the day of the accident he checked all tires on the stage for air pressure. He had the front end of the car jacked up and checked the toe-in on that particular day. He looked the rims over to see that the lugs were on and the lock rings were on each of them. He looked over the front tires for cuts that might have been in them to cause a possible blow-out. He did not get underneath the car. He did not remove the tires from the rims. He further testified that it was not possible for him to observe the condition of a rim without removing the tire. All he could see from looking at it from the front was the condition of the edge of the tire rim. He knew of no other way of detecting any possible flaw or defect in the rims, without actually taking the tire casing off, other than the examination he had made. He covered the examination entirely by the eye. He did not sound out these rims with a hammer or anything like that to find their condition. It further appears that the defective rim was not produced at the trial.

Jlanou v. Pickwick Stages System, 111 Cal. App. 754, 296 P. 108, was an action involving personal injuries to another passenger who was injured in the same accident. The following language taken from pages 758 and 759 of that opinion in 111 Cal. App., 296 P. 108, 110, applies with equal force to the facts of the case at bar, and we deem it decisive of this case:

[3, 4] "Having admitted that the accident was caused by a defective or broken rim of a wheel, the question as to whether the defendant exercised due care to discover and repair this defect, and thus avoid the accident, was a problem for the court to determine from the evidence adduced. By the rendering of the judgment against the defendant, its affirmative allegation that an adequate inspection of the wheel was made must be assumed to have been found against the defendant. * * *

"It is fair to assume from the foregoing testimony that Shirley Callahan was employed to examine the rubber tires and see that they contained the proper amount of air. All that he did to inspect the metal rims was to observe the portion which was visible as he turned the wheels around. He does not even pretend to have critically examined the rims. He was busily engaged in looking at the rubber tires for incisions or worn places. Absolutely nothing of real value was done to detect any flaws or defects in the metal rims. A little hammering with a mallet might have detected a crack or defect in the rim from the vibration or sound. The court was warranted in holding this superficial examination of the rims was insufficient to constitute adequate inspection thereof. If it be true, as the defendant alleges, that 'the tire-rim on one of the wheels * * * (was) broken and disconnected and defective' so as to cause the blowing out of the tire, it would seem that a casual inspection should have disclosed the defect. At least the evidence regarding the inspection of the wheels fails to furnish that degree of 'utmost care and diligence' required of a common carrier of passengers to insure their safety. The broken wheel was not even produced at the trial. Its production might have disclosed a crack in the rim which had existed for some time prior to the accident.

We are of the opinion the evidence is ample to support the findings."

We think the foregoing also disposes of the point raised by the appellant, that the defect in the rim was a latent defect.

No further question has been presented for our consideration. The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨616(1).

Copies of unauthenticated documents incorporated in judgment roll cannot be considered on appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 670).

2. Mortgages ⇨548.

Purchaser at sale following foreclosure of mortgage is entitled to rents of property sold (Code Civ. Proc. § 707).

3. Injunction ⇨123.

Allegation of answer that defendant acted solely as attorney constituted denial of allegations of complaint that he personally had prevented payment of rents to plaintiff, and presented issue which should have been determined before injunction was issued against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, a corporation, as executor of the will of Frank R. Kingman, deceased, against W. S. Staley and Clara H. Nicoll, also known as Clara H. Staley. From judgments in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Judgment against first defendant reversed. Judgment against second defendant affirmed.

W. S. Staley, of San Diego, for appellants.

John A. Hewicker, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, Acting Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from judgments granting permanent injunctions restraining appellants from "collecting or attempting to collect any and all rents from the tenants and future tenants on the real property hereinafter described, and from interfering with the collection of said rents by plaintiff herein, its successors and assigns, and from going upon said premises, speaking to said tenants and/or from serving any papers of any kind on any of said tenants and future tenants, and from writing any letters to said tenants or future tenants, coercing, intimidating or in any manner molesting said tenants in their peaceful and quiet possession of said premises."

[1] The appeal is taken on the judgment roll, in which copies of affidavits and other documents which form no proper part of such a record are incorporated. Section 670, Code Civ. Proc. These are not authenticated as required by law, and cannot be considered on this appeal. Johnson v. Johnson (Cal. App.) 23 P.(2d) 780; Salinas v. Riverside Finance Co., 126 Cal. App. 675, 14 P.(2d) 1025.

On July 24, 1924, Grace Rood Rueda executed a promissory note, due five years after date, in the principal sum of $10,000, payable to F. R. Kingman, secured by a mortgage on real estate in the city of San Diego. The title to this property passed to Clara H. Nicoll, also known as Clara H. Staley, on April 2, 1932.

Kingman died testate on October 24, 1930, and respondent became the executor of his last will and testament. The note was not paid, and an action was instituted to foreclose the mortgage, with Clara H. Nicoll named as one of the defendants. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the property was sold by a commissioner to the heirs and devisees of the estate of Frank R. Kingman, deceased, for $12,406.99, the full amount of the principal, interest, and costs. A commissioner's certificate of sale was issued to the purchasers on October 29, 1932.

Respondent, as the representative of the purchasers, went into possession of the property, which was improved with several dwellings, and proceeded to collect the rents. It is alleged in the complaint that appellants represented to the tenants that they were the owners of the property and entitled to the rents; that Clara H. Nicoll caused a written notice to be served directing that the rents be paid to no one other than herself and declaring her intention of having the dwellings vacated on or before January 1, 1933; that the real estate was worth not more than $8,000; and that the maker of the note had been adjudged a bankrupt.

[2] It is the settled law in this state that the purchaser at a sale following the foreclosure of a mortgage is entitled to the rents of the property sold. Section 707, Code Civ. Proc.; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Pfennigshausen, 57 Cal. App. 655, 207 P. 927; Fowler v. Lane Mortgage Co., 58 Cal. App. 66, 207 P.

919; Fahrenbaker v. E. Clemens Horst Co., 209 Cal. 7, 284 P. 905. This would seem to dispose of the appeal of Clara H. Nicoll and require the affirmance of the judgment against her.

The appeal from the separate judgment against W. S. Staley presents a somewhat different situation. He filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and then filed an answer, to which a general demurrer and motion to strike were interposed. On December 19, 1932, the court overruled the demurrer and denied the motion. These orders were vacated the next day and the matters set down for further hearing on December 22, 1932. On that day the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, the motion to strike portions of the answer granted and judgment rendered against Staley. While the answer contained glaring defects, still two of its allegations require attention. Staley disclaimed any interest in the real estate, and alleged that in his connection with the transaction he had acted only as an attorney at law representing his client, Clara H. Nicoll.

The activities of Staley in question all took place prior to the filing of the complaint, which contains, as exhibits, copies of a notice which had been given the tenants, and another to the caretaker of respondent. The notice to the tenants was signed "Clara Nicoll, title holder, by W. S. Staley, her attorney," and the one to the caretaker "Clara Nicoll, title holder of said property, by W. S. Staley, her attorney."

[3] We are of the opinion that the allegation of the answer that Staley had acted in the matter solely as an attorney at law representing his client was a virtual denial of the allegations of the complaint that he, as an individual and personally, had interfered with the tenants and prevented the payment of rents to respondent. It presented an issue which should have been determined before the injunction was issued against him. He disclaimed any interest in the property. If his sole activities were confined to advising and acting for his client in good faith prior to the date of the restraining order against her, no matter how faulty the advice might be, we cannot conclude that such a situation would make him a party to the action or that an injunction should have been issued against him. Kircher v. Pederson, 117 Wis. 68, 93 N. W. 813; 32 C. J. 301, note 90 (a).

Respondent cites the case of Houser v. Superior Court, 121 Cal. App. 31, 8 P.(2d) 483, which holds that an attorney having knowledge of a restraining order may be punished for contempt of court if he advises his client to disobey its terms. This case announced a well-recognized principle of law, which gives respondent protection against any wrongful act of Staley taken after he had notice of the restraining order against his coappellant. There is nothing in the record even remotely hinting at any violation of any of the terms of this order by Staley.

The judgment against Clara H. Nicoll, also known as Clara H. Staley, is affirmed. The judgment against W. S. Staley is reversed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 7, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 6,

1. Evidence ⇨458.

In action against landlord for failure to furnish water, his oral declarations prior to execution of lease, interpreting clause that he was not liable for failure or shortage of water, and as to where water would be delivered, and testimony that landlord could have purchased water from creek from which canals carried it to land, held admissible.

2. Evidence ⇨458.

Circumstances under which contract was made, and understanding of parties, and their declarations during negotiations at and before time of execution of contract may be shown.

3. Evidence ⇨417(7).

In action for failure to deliver water under lease silent on point of delivery and source of supply, canal and point of delivery which parties had in mind when discussing lease could be identified.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by C. A. Bayles and Daniel Bayles, doing business under the firm name and style of C. A. & Daniel Bayles, against J. W. Browning. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Seth Millington, of Gridley, and Rutledge & Rutledge, of Colusa, for appellant.

Armfield & Eddy, of Woodland, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Respondents and the appellant entered into a lease and agreement whereby respondents rented from appellant two tracts of land, one containing approximately 400 acres and another 70 acres, for the growing of rice. The controversy here revolves around the obligation of the parties with respect to the delivery of water and the application thereof to the tracts in question.

Two sources of water are mentioned in the contract. One of these was Butte creek, which lies about 2 miles westerly from the leased lands. A system of canals carries the water from Butte creek to the 400-acre tract, one leading to the northwest corner thereof, another going to the northeast corner of the same tract. This latter system of canals had in more recent years been allowed to fall somewhat in disuse, and to have carried the water of Butte creek to the northeast corner of the tract during the year in question would have required some reconstruction and repair.

The other source of water referred to in the contract was Cherokee canal, from which water was diverted and conducted to the northeasterly corner of the larger tract and from there spread over the entire leased lands. Early in the season ample water was obtained from Cherokee canal, but, as the season advanced, the amount diminished until it became insufficient to supply the demand. An adequate supply continued to flow in Butte creek, but no use was made of any water from that source. A portion of the crop failed by reason of the lack of water, and plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant for the loss thereof. From the judgment in favor of plaintiffs awarding them damages therefore, defendant presents this appeal. Defendant, appellant herein, contends he was not required by his contract to deliver water from Butte creek to the land at the headgate in the northeast corner of the tract, but was obligated to and did deliver water from Butte creek at the northwesterly corner thereof and that respondents failed to construct the necessary laterals or ditches to take the water from that source and apply it over the land.

Those portions of the agreement pertinent to the questions here involved are as follows:

"The party of the second part (respondent) agrees to plow and level said land. * * * In due and proper season in 1926 he shall first properly prepare said land for rice, constructing the necessary laterals, ditches and checks so that the same may be properly irrigated and drained; * * * care for said crops while growing, attend to the proper irrigation of said land throughout the growing season and see that water is properly applied and retained in said land throughout said growing season; care for the drainage of the land and as soon as the rice is matured to properly drain the same, and cut, thrash and sack the same. * * *

On the part of the appellant it is provided: "Party of the first part (appellant) will furnish the water for the proper irrigation of said land in the manner following, that is to say: party of the first part will deliver water in two main canals, one from Butte Creek and one from Cherokee Canal and the delivery of water to said land in said main canals shall be deemed a full performance of the obligation on the part of the first party to furnish water, it being understood that the party of the second part shall construct the necessary laterals and ditches to take said water from said canals and distribute it over said land for the proper irrigation of the same, * * * party of the first part shall have water in said main canals sufficient for the irrigation of said land by the 1st. day of April, 1926, and sufficient water will be maintained therein for the irrigation of said land during the irrigation period."

In addition to the foregoing, the contract further states: "It is understood and agreed, however, that the party of the first part shall not be liable in any way for failure or shortage of water, or that anything herein contained shall be deemed a guaranty on the part of the party of the first part as to the adequacy of the water supply, nor shall the party of the second part be held liable for loss of crops resulting from shortage of water not due to his failure to properly distribute the same upon the land."

It is apparent from the foregoing that appellant agreed to furnish water, but the dispute here is as to the point where respondent was to receive it. Respondent contends that the contract intended to and did specify that the water was to be delivered in two main canals, and that the delivery of the water to the land in said main canals was the duty of appellant, and that the responsibility of respondent was to see that it was properly applied to the leased lands.

[1] Appellant contends for reversal largely upon the receipt of testimony by the trial court of oral declarations made by appellant before the execution of the lease. It will be recalled that the paragraph previously quoted provides: "The party of the first part shall not be liable in any way for the failure or shortage of water. * * *" At or prior to the signing of the lease containing the foregoing, respondent asked appellant what was meant by the clause "failure or shortage of water," and appellant replied: "Of course you don't expect me to furnish water in case of a drouth, that is what that clause means," thereby inferring, so appellant claims, that he would be liable for any shortages of water except that by drouth.

Objection was also made by appellant to another conversation between one of respondents and appellant as to where the water would be delivered. We quote again from the transcript:

"Q. Now, at or about the time this lease was signed up, I understood you to say this morning that you had some conversation with Mr. Browning on the lease; is that correct? A. Yes.

"Q. Now you have testified that you went out all over the land, around the boundaries of the land? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you at any time go to the place where water was to be supplied? A. Yes, * * * we went to a point here southwest of a large barn here.

"Q. And what is it marked, here on the map, 'Headgate'? A. Headgate.

"Q. You went there, and you and Mr. Browning alone? A. Yes.

"Q. All right; what if anything was said there between you and Mr. Browning at that time pertaining to this lease? * * * A. He told me they delivered the water right southwest of the barn at this weir in sufficient quantities to irrigate this whole section, or this whole 400-acre tract, and also this tract down here.

"Q. That is the seventy-acre tract? A. The seventy."

Appellant also told respondent, as they were viewing the premises prior to the execution of the lease, that water sufficient to irrigate the entire tract was delivered at the headgate near the northeast corner of the larger tract, and also said that point was the junction of the Cherokee canal lateral and the Butte Creek lateral.

Relying upon this testimony, respondent claims they made no preparation either by the construction of canals to distribute the water over the ground from the northwest corner of the tract nor made checks so water could be used from that point.

Objection was also made to testimony of an official of the Sutter Butte Canal Company that the canal company had water available which could have been purchased to irrigate the lands in question.

We believe all the foregoing testimony was properly admitted in order that the court and jury could get the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances.

[2] In Balfour v. Fresno C. & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876, 877, the law applicable to the present situation is thus stated: "For the purpose of determining what the parties intended by the language used, it is competent to show not only the circumstances under which the contract was made, but also to prove that the parties intended and understood the language in the sense contended for; and for that purpose the conversation between and declarations of the parties during the negotiations at and before the time of the execution of the contract may be shown."

Also in the case of Scott v. U. S., 12 Wall. 443, 444, 20 L. Ed. 438, the court said: "In cases like this it is the duty of the court to assume the standpoint occupied by the parties when the contract was made—to let in the light of the surrounding circumstances—to see as the parties saw, and to think as they must have thought, in assenting to the stipulations by which they are bound. This process is always effective. When the terms employed are doubtful or obscure there is no surer guide to their intent and meaning."

[3] Neither the point of delivery of the water nor the source of the water supply were mentioned in the contract. It merely provided that the water would be delivered in two main canals, and delivery in two main canals to the land would constitute full performance on the part of appellant. From long acquaintance with the land by respondent and from the tour of inspection with appellant prior to the execution of the contract showed him there was one canal from Cherokee canal to the northeast corner and from Butte creek canal a series of canals to various points, one of which, however, led to the northeast corner and to the site of the headgate referred to. It was therefore proper to identify the canal and point of delivery which the parties had in mind when discussing the agreement.

It appeared from the testimony of various witnesses and maps in evidence that the only established intake on the rented premises was at or near the headgate referred to in the testimony above, which was in the northeast corner of the tract. It also appeared that the fall of the land south of the irrigation canal leading from the headgate was southwesterly, and north of that canal the fall was westerly, all tending to support the finding of the jury as to the intention of the parties.

Appellant attempted to show the land could be irrigated from the northwesterly corner, but, in addition to that being lower than the surrounding area, there was also between the canal containing the water from Butte creek and the land itself, a borrow pit, a levee, and a canal or ditch. With such testimony of the physical condition existing upon the land, the jury were fully sustained in their conclusions.

It is not contended that respondents failed to properly distribute the waters reaching the land, but it is apparent that the loss of the crop was due to the failure of appellant to furnish the water as he agreed in his contract.

It is also urged by respondents that, after the water began to fail in Cherokee canal, appellant purchased water from the Sutter Butte Canal Company and delivered the same to the headgate. From that act it may be inferred that appellant interpreted the contract requiring him to deliver water at the head-gate to the land. As was said in Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 84 P. 145, 150, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275: "The law, however, recognizes the practical construction of a contract as the best evidence of what was intended by its provisions."

We believe the testimony offered by respondents was properly received as it illuminated the circumstances surrounding the parties and their negotiations, and that the verdict of the jury was amply sustained by the evidence.

Finding nothing to justify a reversal, the judgment is affirmed.

ELLINWOOD v. McCOY.

Civ. 9171.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 3, 1933.

Appeal and error ⇨391(1).

Where statutory period for justifying sureties on first supersedeas bond had expired before second bond was offered, but delay in filing new bond was excusable, held, appellate court, by order staying proceedings on judgment, should give appellant opportunity to file good bond.

Action by Herbert M. Ellinwood against Frank J. McCoy. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. On defendant's petition for a writ of supersedeas.

Proceedings on judgment stayed, such order to remain in force during pendency of appeal upon filing of supersedeas bond within time fixed by court.

Barry & Boehler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edwards & Taylor, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice.

From the several statements of fact contained in the record herein, it is assumed by this court that the pertinent and essential conditions which appertain to the application herein are substantially that in an action pending in the superior court between the parties hereto the plaintiff therein recovered judgment for a substantial amount; that thereupon the defendant gave notice of appeal and, in accordance with the provisions of the statute with reference thereto, for the purpose of staying execution of the judgment pending such appeal, filed an undertaking which was executed by a regularly authorized corporation that was engaged in the surety business; that upon exception being taken by the plaintiff to such undertaking, and following several stipulated continuances of the hearing on the proposed justification of said surety, the said surety failed to justify; that four days thereafter, in place of the original undertaking, the defendant offered to substitute another undertaking that was executed by two individual sureties; whereupon the plaintiff excepted to said sureties and objected to the giving of said undertaking on the ground "that there was no provision in law for filing a second undertaking in the superior court," and at the same time gave notice to defendant of a motion to issue execution on the judgment; that thereupon the hearing of said motion, the said exception, and the justification of the bondsmen on the proposed new undertaking was continued by order of the trial court to a date three days later. In the meantime, and following said last-mentioned order, the defendant obtained from this court an order appointing a time for hearing his application to it for a writ of supersedeas, and further directing a stay of all proceedings on the judgment until the further order of this court. From the record, it also appears that the plaintiff in the action is financially irresponsible; and, consequently, that, if execution were to be issued on the judgment and, in pursuance thereof, that the said judgment were satisfied, in the event of a reversal of the judgment on appeal, the defendant thereafter would be unable to reimburse himself in any action which he might be entitled to bring against the plaintiff.

In such circumstances, although it may be, as contended by the respondent herein, that, before the second bond was offered by the defendant as an undertaking on appeal, the statutory time within which the sureties thereon were entitled to justify had expired, nevertheless, judging from the detailed statement of facts which appears in the affidavits presented by the respective parties hereto, but deemed unnecessary to herein set forth, this court is of the opinion that at all times pertinent to this application counsel for defendant were acting in good faith in the matter, and that the seeming negligence of counsel for the defendant in permitting the statutory period for filing a new undertaking on appeal to lapse is entirely excusable; from which it follows that, within reason and the law, the defendant should receive the protection of this tribunal to the extent of permitting him to file a good and sufficient undertaking on appeal. In accordance with the order made in the first of such cited cases, it is ordered that the petitioner herein be allowed, within twenty days from and after the filing of this opinion, to file an undertaking in this court in due form in the statutory amount for a stay of proceedings during the appeal, upon the following conditions: Such undertaking and the sureties thereon shall be approved by the presiding judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, and petitioner shall give to respondent at least three days' notice of the time when such undertaking shall be presented to said judge for his approval. Upon the filing of such undertaking in this court, approved by said judge, within the twenty days above mentioned, the order of this court hereinbefore made staying proceedings until the further order of this court shall be and remain in force during the pendency of the appeal; but, in the event that such undertaking be not filed here within said twenty days, the said former order of this court shall be considered as revoked and this proceeding discharged. It is further ordered that the demurrer of respondent to the petition herein be, and the same is, overruled.

DAVIS v. KITTLE MFG. CO.

Civ. 4741.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 3, 1933.

Appeal and error ☞816.

Where two appeals between same parties were pending in Courts of Appeal of different districts, one court could not consolidate appeals.

Appeals could not be consolidated since it appeared that one of the appeals was not ready for submission, no showing was made that evidence in each case was the same, the evidence in one case could not be used to support or impair the findings in the other, and the appeals were not pending in the same court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Action by Mansell A. Davis against the Kittle Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On defendant's motion to set aside order of submission.

Motion denied.

Stick, Moerdyke & Gibson and Lyon & Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Roscoe R. Hess, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a motion to set aside an order of submission for the purpose of consolidating this appeal with that of another case which was subsequently tried between the same parties, and which was appealed to, and is now pending in, the District Court of Appeal of the Second District.

In January, 1930, judgment in this case for $16,295 was rendered in favor of plaintiff by the superior court of Los Angeles county in a suit to recover royalties pursuant to a contract for the manufacture and use of a patented bedstead. The appellant's opening brief was not filed until January, 1931. The record on appeal contains 2,000 pages of evidence. The cause was finally argued and submitted to this court for decision on May 10, 1933. On June 22, 1933, the appellant filed his notice of motion to set aside the order of submission in this case on the ground that another case between the same parties was subsequently decided by the superior court of Los Angeles county, and thereafter appealed to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, in which last-mentioned case findings were adopted which are alleged to be in irreconcilable conflict with the findings of this case. It is urged that this cause should be consolidated with the other case so as to enable the appellate court to "reconcile said findings, and to avoid two decisions upon the same facts and under contrary and contradictory findings."

From the affidavits which were filed in support of the motion to set aside the submission in this case, it appears that the appeal which is pending in the District Court of Appeal of the Second District is not ready for submission. It does not appear when that appeal will be ready for submission. There is no satisfactory showing that the evidence upon which the two cases were decided is the same. The validity of the judgments in the respective cases must necessarily depend upon the records of each separate case as they are presented on appeal. The evidence which was adduced in one case may not be used to support or impair the findings which were adopted in the other case. Each must stand upon its own record. The second appeal is not pending in this court. This court has no authority to consolidate cases unless both appeals are pending in this court. There is no assurance the Supreme Court would consolidate these two cases on appeal if both cases were pending before that tribunal.

The unwarranted delay which would result from an order setting aside the submission in this case might amount to a denial of justice to the litigants. There is no assurance a consolidation of these two cases would subserve any good or equitable purpose.

The motion is denied.

CROWTHER v. METALITE MFG. CO.
Civ. 4725.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
July 27, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨907(3).

On direct appeal on judgment roll alone, it will be assumed that all objections to evidence in support of findings were waived.

2. Appeal and error ⇨907(3).

Where findings were not strictly in accordance with issues, on appeal on judgment roll alone reviewing court must presume evidence was introduced without any objection which would support findings, and that facts were treated by all parties as issues properly before court.

3. Damages ⇨120(2).

Under contract for work and labor and not of sale, damages for breach are governed by statute relating to such matter (Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3308, 3354).

In such case, damages are governed by Civ. Code, § 3300, rather than by sections 3308 and 3354.

4. Damages ⇨45.

Expenses necessarily incurred in good faith, in anticipation of performance or part performance of contract, may generally be recovered as part of damages for breach.

5. Pleading ⇨400.

Failure to allege breach of contract respecting manufacture of certain spouts, in addition to allegation of general failure to manufacture such amount as plaintiff might designate, held possibly ground for refusing to admit evidence covering specific amount to be manufactured, but did not prevent parties from consenting to have such issue tried and determined (Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

6. Appeal and error ⇨907(3).

Rule that on appeal on judgment roll alone reviewing court assumes, in support of TUTTLE, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

In this action plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $456.92 upon a complaint based upon the breach of a contract to manufacture pouring spouts. The appeal is brought here and presented upon the judgment roll alone.

It is the contention of appellant that the judgment is outside the issues and void, under the authority of Baar v. Smith, 201 Cal. 87, 255 P. 827, and other cases.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract according to the terms of which the defendant agreed to manufacture for the plaintiff certain Tip Top pouring spouts at a stipulated price in such quantities as the plaintiff might require or designate; that relying upon the contract and upon the promise of the defendant to manufacture the said spouts at the price agreed upon the plaintiff incurred certain expenses especially enumerated in the complaint; that contrary to the terms of said contract the defendant failed, neglected, and refused to manufacture or sell to the plaintiff spouts except 5,000 thereof, although the plaintiff informed defendant that a great many more of said spouts were required; that in addition to the expenditures set forth in said complaint, plaintiff had been further damaged in the sum of $5,000 on account of loss of profits. Defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and in its cross-complaint alleged that the contract was for 5,000 spouts instead of in such quantities as the plaintiff might require or designate, and further alleged a compliance on its part and a failure to comply on the plaintiff's part.

The court found that plaintiff was not entitled to any damages by reason of loss of profits, and limited the recovery to certain items of expenses which were incurred by plaintiff in anticipation of performance by defendant. These items were confined to the preparation of office facilities and advertising. The finding which is attacked as being beyond the issues is as follows: "That it is true that on or about the 9th day of August, 1928, at and in the county of Los Angeles, State of California, the plaintiff and cross-defendant, and the defendant and cross-complainant, all in connection with the transaction as alleged in plaintiff and cross-defendant's complaint on file herein, entered into a contract according to the terms of which defendant and cross-complainant agreed to manufacture for the plaintiff 5000 Tip-Top spouts at the price of five cents (5c) each, for which the plaintiff and cross-defendant agreed to pay said defendant and cross-complainant upon delivery of same; that it is not true that the defendant and cross-complainant manufactured said spouts pursuant to order of said plaintiff and cross-defendant and in the manner agreed upon by the said parties."

[1, 2] It is the rule in this state that upon a direct appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, it will be assumed, in support of the judgment, that all objections to evidence in support of the findings were waived. Poledori v. Newman, 116 Cal. 375, 48 P. 325, 326. The Supreme Court in that case goes on to state that: "If objection to the introduction of any evidence had been made upon the ground that the defect to which it related was not alleged in the complaint, the court would have permitted the plaintiffs to amend their complaint. Parties will not be permitted to lie by and keep silent when evidence is offered, and after the court has rendered its judgment, object thereto upon the ground that the evidence sustaining it was inadmissible under the issues presented by the pleadings."

In the instant case it is true that the findings are not strictly in accordance with the issues raised by the pleadings. The complaint seeks recovery of damages based upon the failure of defendant to manufacture spouts "in such quantities as plaintiff may require or designate," while the findings are to the effect that defendant manufactured 5,000 of such spouts, but that they did not conform to the agreement. This appeal being before us upon the judgment roll alone, we must presume that evidence was introduced which would support this finding, without any objection upon the part of defendant and appellant, and that the facts were treated by all parties as issues properly before the court at the trial. If the entire record were before this court, a different situation would be presented.

[3, 4] A similar contention is made by appellant with reference to the elements which were considered by the court in arriving at the measure of damages. We must presume that evidence of these elements was introduced by plaintiff without objection upon the part of defendant. We may add, however, that the contract in question appears to be for work and labor, and not a contract of sale. Accordingly, the damages are governed by section 3300 of the Civil Code, rather than by sections 3308 and 3354 as contended by appellant. The rule governing this feature of the case is clearly set forth by Mr. Justice Nourse in the case of United Iron Works v. Standard B. C. Co., 69 Cal. App. 384, 231 P. 567. Expenses necessarily incurred in good faith, in anticipation of performance or part performance of a contract, may generally be recovered as a part of the damages for its breach. 8 R. C. L. 495. The items which go to make up the total amount of damage here appear to fall within the latter authority.

The case of Baar v. Smith, 201 Cal. 87, 255 P. 827, 832, is not in conflict with the rule we have followed herein disposing of the attack made by appellant upon the ground that the judgment is outside the issues. In that case the entire record was before the court, including the evidence taken at the trial. The court there states that: "It is also true that the parties may voluntarily submit and try an issue without any specific pleadings and thus be estopped from complaining thereafter after judgment. [Citing Poledori v. Newman, 116 Cal. 375, 48 P. 325, and other authorities.] But no such exceptions exist in this cause."

[5] Undoubtedly the record showed affirmatively that the parties did not voluntarily submit and try the questioned issues in that case. Here we have no record of the evidence, and we must assume, in support of the judgment, that all objections to evidence in support of the findings were waived. Poledori v. Newman, supra. Section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes a court, when an answer has been filed to the complaint, to grant the plaintiff "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." The "case" made by the complaint herein, as well as the issue between the parties, was the right to recover damages for a breach of a contract to manufacture pouring spouts. The failure to allege a breach in respect to the manufacture of 5,000 of such spouts, in addition to an allegation of a general failure to manufacture such amount as plaintiff might designate, might have been a ground for refusing to admit evidence covering the specific amount to be manufactured, but it did not prevent the parties from consenting to have such issue tried and determined by the court. See Poledori v. Newman, supra.

The attack made upon the judgment in the Baar Case was a direct one. The portion of the judgment which was assailed clearly exceeded the issues as defined in the pleading, and the record of the trial failed to disclose that condition where it could be said that the parties voluntarily submitted and tried the issue in question, although there were no specific pleadings raising such issues. Under such conditions, the court held that a judgment based upon such issue was coram non judice and void.

In the case of Baar v. Smith, appellants applied for a supersedeas to restrain the enforcement of a judgment pending their appeal therefrom. The relief was sought upon the ground that so much of the judgment as formed the basis for a threatened execution was coram non judice and void. The action was brought to quiet title to personal property (corporate stock) under the provisions of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court adjudged that plaintiff was the owner of the property, and decreed that the possession of said property should be given to plaintiff, and ordered defendants to indorse and deliver said property to plaintiff. In the event that defendants failed or refused to comply with the judgment, it was ordered that judgment be entered against them for the stipulated value of the stock, to wit, $408,316. It was held that that portion of such judgment which decreed that plaintiff should have possession of the property, and awarding damages for a failure to deliver the same, was void as without the issues. It appears, however, that not only was the judgment roll before the court, but the entire evidence in the case. The court goes on to state that: "It is also true that the parties may voluntarily submit and try an issue without any specific pleadings and thus be estopped from complaining thereat after judgment. [Citing Poledori v. Newman, 116 Cal. 375, 48 P. 325, and other authorities.] But no such exceptions exist in this cause."

[6] Undoubtedly the record in the Baar Case showed affirmatively that the parties did not submit voluntarily to try the questioned issues. Here we have only the judgment roll before us and no record of the evidence, and we are bound to assume, in support of the judgment, that all objections to evidence in support of the findings were waived. This rule is subject to the qualification that (as appears here) the matter adjudicated properly belonged to the subject of the litigation (see opinion by this court in Suisun Lumber Co. v. Fairfield School District, 19 Cal. App. 587, 127 P. 349), and where the relief granted was possible and inherent in the cause of action set up. Naugle v. Naugle, 89 Kan. 622, 132 P. 164. On the other hand, if an adjudication is attempted in connection with matters which are wholly unrelated to the subject-matter of the litigation, such as a judgment for the probate of a will where the action is one for the possession of real property, or a judgment ordering specific performance where the action is one for libel, such adjudication would be clearly void, as transcending the limits of the authority of the court. Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. Ed. 914. In California, where the ordinary action is brought to quiet title to real property under the provisions of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for possession of the property, but jurisdiction to thus act is derived from section 380 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Polack v. Gurnee, 66 Cal. 266, 5 P. 229, 610. When section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended so as to place personal property in the same category with real property in the matter of quieting title, the Legislature apparently overlooked the amendment of section 380 of the Code of Civil Procedure so as to give the court the right to adjudge possession in respect to personal property in such an action. If the right to possession is expressly made an issue in an action to quiet title, of course the authority to adjudicate that issue would be unquestioned.

The judgment is affirmed.

The appellant was convicted in the superior court of Stanislaus county of petit theft, a misdemeanor, with prior conviction of petit theft, a misdemeanor.

The transcript on appeal was filed in this court June 3, 1933. No brief has been filed in behalf of appellant. The cause was regularly placed on the calendar for oral argument on July 25, 1933. No appearance was made for appellant at the time the case was called for hearing.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code, the judgment and the order are affirmed.

MARKS, Justice.

Appellant is the assignee for the purpose of collection of a promissory note in the principal sum of $16,000 and given by the El Centro Grain Company to the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank, a San Diego bank. This note was secured by a deed of trust on real property and a chattel mortgage, and bore on its face the signatures of S. T. Marshall and Harry W. Horton. It also bore a written guaranty of payment signed by Harry W. Horton, Arthur C. Rath, S. T. Marshall, C. W. Horton, J. M. Lathrop, and C. G. Wulff. Prior to the arising of the issues presented here, the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association had succeeded to the interest of the Southern Trust and Commerce Bank.

The complaint in this action, after alleging the corporate existence of the two banks, the execution, indorsement, delivery, and assignments of the note, makes the further allegation that the security for the note had been exhausted and that its principal sum had been partially paid. Judgment was sought against the makers and indorsers for the deficiency remaining, together with interest and attorneys' fees.

The trial of this action was commenced on April 27, 1931. Findings of fact and conclusions of law and the judgment were filed July 1, 1931. The last trial day was May 14, 1931. The original answers of the defendants are not in the record. On May 5, 1931, over the strenuous objection of appellant, defendants were permitted to file amended answers. These set up what counsel admit were new defenses consisting of allegations of diversion of certain of the funds secured by the note from the purposes for which they were intended; a change in the due date of the note by substituting "Three Years" for "One Year" after date; and that the security had not been exhausted. When the amended answers were filed, counsel moved the court for a continuance of the trial until after the decision of the case of El Centro Grain Company et al. v. Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, 123 Cal. App. 564, 11 P.(2d) 650, upon the ground that when the judgment in that case became final it would adjudicate

ROBINSON v. EL CENTRO GRAIN CO. et al.
Civ. 960.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 1, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1043(7).

Where court refused continuance until after decision of case involving similar issues, held that present case must be retried so that effect of now final judgment in such other case on issues in instant case may be determined.

A continuance was asked for until after the decision of the other case on the ground that, when the judgment in that case became final, it would adjudicate the issues raised by special defenses in instant case.

2. Trial ⇨368.

Agreed statement of facts takes place of, and has force and effect of, unattacked finding of facts made by court.

3. Pleading ⇨291(2).

Where copies of instruments are set forth in answer, their genuineness and execution are admitted, unless adverse party makes denial in affidavit, but any new matter alleged in answer is deemed controverted (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 448, 462).

4. Judgment ⇨580.

Trial court's judgment from which appeal is pending is not such final judgment that it becomes res judicata on issues.

5. Pleading ⇨237(1).

Considerable latitude is given trial judges in permitting amendment of pleadings to conform to proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

the issues raised by the first two special defenses. This motion was denied, as was a motion to strike out these defenses, and the case proceeded to judgment. The trial court's findings sustained all of the special defenses set up in the amended answers and judgment for respondents followed.

[1] One principal question which is presented by this appeal appears to us to be controlling and worthy of very careful consideration, namely, Did the trial court abuse its discretion in refusing a continuance until after a decision of El Centro Grain Company v. Bank of Italy, supra, and the judgment in that case had become final? We have neither discovered a case from the courts of this state nor been cited to one directly deciding the question under facts similar to those before us.

In approaching this question, it is necessary that we summarize the issues of the case of El Centro Grain Company v. Bank of Italy, supra, in considerably greater detail than they are set forth in the published opinion. El Centro Grain Company, Harry W. Horton, Julia Horton, S. T. Marshall, Louise Marshall, A. C. Rath, C. G. Wulff, and J. M. Lathrop instituted their action in the superior court of Imperial county against Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association and others. The action as to the other defendants was later dismissed. It was alleged that the plaintiffs were the owners of real property in Imperial county; that the El Centro Grain Company executed to the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank its promissory note in the principal sum of $16,000, dated October 5, 1928 (an evident typographical error; it should have been 1922), due and payable November 14, 1925, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum; that the plaintiffs executed the chattel mortgage and deed of trust on the above-mentioned real property to secure the payment of the note; that certain facts were alleged which entitled plaintiffs to credits on the indebtedness, the exact amount being unknown to them; "that it is necessary that an accounting be had between the plaintiffs and said defendant banks in order to ascertain the true and exact amount that may be actually due, owing and unpaid from the plaintiffs to the said defendant banks; that the plaintiffs allege and state that the said defendants claim that there is due from the plaintiffs a sum which is in truth and fact from $2,500.00 to $3,500.00 in excess of the amounts actually due or owing or unpaid"; that on April 19, 1928, the defendant Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association caused the trustee named in the deed of trust to file a notice of default; that a notice of sale was published fixing the sale of the property for August 17, 1928, and that the sale would take place unless restrained by court; that the defendants claimed there would be due on the note $17,- 165.10 on the date of sale while there would not have been more than $14,750 actually then due; "that the plaintiffs herein are willing and desirous and able to pay the true amount that is due to the defendants or any of them upon said promissory note." An accounting was sought to determine the amount actually due on the note, and an order was issued temporarily restraining the sale.

The Bank of Italy answered, alleging execution of the deed of trust, chattel mortgage and note, and setting forth exact copies of the instruments, together with a copy of the written guaranty of the note. The copy of the note pleaded was due "three years after date." No plaintiff filed any affidavit denying the genuineness or due execution of any of the instruments.

The parties submitted an agreed statement of facts in which the following appears: "That on the 14th day of November, 1922, the plaintiffs, El Centro Grain Company, a corporation, Harry W. Horton, and S. T. Marshall, executed to the defendant Southern Trust and Commerce Bank, a corporation, its certain promissory note in writing in the words and figures following, to-wit: [Here follows a copy of the note as pleaded in the answer due 'three years after date'.]" "The payments of said note were, at the time of its execution, and delivery, guaranteed by the following named plaintiffs and persons, in the words and figures following, to-wit: 'We hereby guarantee payment of the within note, or any renewal, or extension thereof, and all expense of collection thereof, and waive demand, presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and consent that the time for payment may be extended without notice to Harry W. Horton, S. T. Marshall, J. M. Lathrop, Arthur C. Rath, C. W. Horton, C. G. Wulff.'" This agreed statement of facts concluded: "On November 14, 1925, the date of maturity of the note, all of said sum of $16,000.00, had been expended, except the sum of $223.95, for which plaintiff was entitled to credit on not later than said 14th day of November, 1925. That on November 24, 1925, a rebate was received by the Southern Trust and Commerce Bank, a corporation, for which plaintiffs are entitled to a credit of One Hundred Ninety-seven and 35/100 ($197.35.) Dollars, as of that date. That the only issue to be decided in this case is as to the amount due on said note of Sixteen Thousand ($16,000.00) Dollars, and advances made by the Southern Trust and Commerce Bank and Bank of Italy National Trust and Savings Association, together with interest and the relief the respective parties are entitled to, but the question of accounting is stated herein as to the respective amounts to be debited and credited to the respective parties. * * * It is further stipulated that the legal proposition as to the question of time and amount of interest shall be submitted to the court on briefs." A supplemental stipulation of facts was made which is not material here.

The judgment in this case contains the following: "That there is due and owing to the defendant Bank of Italy National Trust and Savings Association, a corporation, for principal and interest on the note secured by the trust deed, a copy of which said note and trust deed is attached to the answer of the defendant Bank of Italy National Trust and Savings Association, the sum of Seventeen Thousand Sixty-eight and 02/100 Dollars ($17,068.02)." It was further adjudged that the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association had the right to proceed with the foreclosure, but it was restrained from doing so for thirty days to enable the plaintiffs to pay the amount due on the note. This judgment was affirmed by this court on May 19, 1932, and the remittitur issued July 19, 1932.

[2] In the first case the trial court made no findings of fact, but decided it on the agreed statement of facts. "Such an agreed statement of facts takes the place of, and has the force and effect of, an unattached finding of facts made by the court. Burnett v. Pacheco, 27 Cal. 408; Muller v. Rowell, 110 Cal. 318, 42 P. 804; McMenomy v. White, 115 Cal. 339, 47 P. 109; Conway v. Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America, 137 Cal. 384, 70 P. 223." Estate of Davidson, 21 Cal. App. 118, at page 120, 131 P. 67, 68. See, also, Faust v. City of San Diego, 115 Cal. App. 277, 1 P.(2d) 543, Wixom v. Davis, 198 Cal. 641, 246 P. 1041.

[3] Where copies of instruments are set forth in an answer, their genuineness and due execution are admitted, unless the adverse party denies such genuineness or due execution in an affidavit filed within ten days. Section 448, Code Civ. Proc. Any new matter alleged in an answer is deemed controverted by the adverse party. Section 462, Code Civ. Proc. The genuineness and due execution of the note as pleaded in the answer (due "three years after date"), and of the guaranty, became issuable facts in the case by their being set forth in the answer, and their genuineness and due execution became admitted when the opposite party failed to deny such issue under oath within the time allowed by law. The parties agreed in writing in the trial court, and the trial court found through the agreed statement of facts, that the note in the language pleaded was "executed" by El Centro Grain Company, Harry W. Horton, and S. T. Marshall, and that Harry W. Horton, S. T. Marshall, J. M. Lathrop, Arthur C. Rath, C. W. Horton, and C. G. Wulff guaranteed in writing the payment of the note at the time of its execution and delivery to the payee. C. W. Horton, one of the respondents here, was not a party to that action.

Appellant cites numerous California cases which he maintains support the doctrine that a final judgment is not only conclusive between the parties and their successors acquiring an interest subsequent to the judgment on "the subject-matter in controversy in the actions upon which it is based, but also in all other actions involving the same question, and upon all matters involved in the issues which might have been litigated and decided in the case; the presumption being that all such issues were met and decided." Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175, 68 P. 597; Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 505, 62 P. 825; Martin v. Holm, 197 Cal. 733, 242 P. 718; Price v. Sixth District Agricultural Ass'n, 201 Cal. 502, 258 P. 387; Elm et al. v. Sacramento, etc., Co. (Cal. Sup.) 17 P.(2d) 1003; Edmonds v. Glenn-Colusa Irr. Dist. (Cal. Sup.) 19 P.(2d) 502. This is but another way of stating the familiar rule recognized in many jurisdictions that a party may neither split his demand in more than one action nor reserve some of his defenses for a second action if he be unsuccessful in the first.

[4] It is admitted that a judgment of a trial court from which an appeal is pending is not such a final judgment that it becomes res adjudicata on the issues of the case. Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 P. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314. The judgment in the case of El Centro Grain Co. et al. v. Bank of Italy, supra, had not become final at the time of the trial of the instant case in 1931. It became final on July 19, 1932, more than a year ago.

In cases presenting similar facts, it has been held that a party should ask a continuance of the second trial until the prior case is decided, and that such a request would be good ground for continuance, or that the trial judge could on his own motion continue the second trial. Brown v. Campbell, supra; Smith v. Smith, 134 Cal. 117, 66 P. 81; Houghton v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 661, 203 P. 765; Pellissier v. Title, etc., Co., 208 Cal. 172, 280 P. 947; Lincoln v. Superior Court, 95 Cal. App. 35, 271 P. 1107. The converse of this situation is presented here. We must answer the question, Where the request is made and denied, is such denial an abuse of judicial discretion?

The Supreme Court was once placed in the unfortunate position of having to affirm two judgments, reaching opposite conclusions on the same state of facts, because no request for a continuance of the second case had been made in the trial court. Priest v. Brown, 100 Cal. 626, 35 P. 323, Brown v. Campbell, supra. We are not forced into any such position here because the request for a continuance of the trial was made and denied. We think the case must be retried so that the effect of the now final judgment in El Centro Grain Co. et al. v. Bank of Italy, supra, on the issues of the instant case may be determined.

[5] Appellant urges that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting respondents to file amended answers during the trial setting up the defense of diversion of part of the funds, of unauthorized alteration of the note, and that the security given for its payment had not been exhausted. Considerable latitude is given trial judges in permitting the amendment of pleadings to conform to the proof, and we cannot conclude that it was a breach of discretion to permit the filing of this pleading under the facts presented. The legal sufficiency of the first two special defenses will have to be determined on the retrial of the case, and, after the judgment in El Centro Grain Co. et al. v. Bank of Italy, supra, has become final. The third special defense presents a proper question for the determination of the trial court. Bank of Italy v. Bentley (Cal. Sup.) 20 P.(2d) 940; Brink v. Benton (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 455.

Judgment reversed.

HENDERSON, Justice pro tem.

The defendant, William M. Hunt, appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs Lewis, husband and wife, for breach of contract. The facts which we deem material for our decision are summarized as follows: The defendant entered into a contract on October 1, 1926, for the purchase from plaintiffs of a certain house and lot, which Mrs. Lewis claimed as her separate property, at a price of $15,000. As part of the purchase price the defendant "assumed and agreed to pay" when it became due on February 1, 1927, a certain note in the sum of $3,500 secured by a mortgage on the property held by the Bank of Italy. After the transfer of the premises, in further payment of the purchase price the defendant delivered to the plaintiffs his promissory note secured by a deed of trust constituting a second lien on the property. The defendant defaulted in the payment of this note when due, which default was followed by the purchase of the property subject to the mortgage at the foreclosure sale by Mrs. Lewis, who went into possession under the trustee's deed on February 15, 1930. The defendant having defaulted in the payment of the note secured by the mortgage, the plaintiffs voluntarily paid the same to the mortgage bank at its suggestion in order to protect the property from foreclosure, and received from the bank what was termed a "release" on the 22d day of March, 1930. The plaintiffs sued, and the court rendered judgment, upon the contract of assumption alone. Irrespective of the many objections raised by defendant, they may be reduced for our consideration to his single claim that he cannot be legally bound upon a judgment for payment of money until plaintiffs have first foreclosed the mortgage, exhausted their security, and reduced the obligation to a fixed amount on a deficiency judgment, if any.

It is the position of the respondent, which receives the support of the great weight of authority, that the assumption of the mortgage debt by the grantee of the land subject thereto as part of the purchase price is a contract to pay rather than one of indemnity, and a cause of action accrues in favor of the original grantor for the entire sum secured thereby immediately upon the failure of the purchaser to pay the mortgage debt at maturity. 41 Corpus Jur. p. 741, § 802. The authorities announcing the majority view ordinarily declare that a recital in a deed stating, "which mortgage the grantee assumes, or assumes and agrees to pay" or the conveyance is made 'subject to the payment of an outstanding mortgage,'" makes the sum of money represented thereby a part of the purchase price, and imposes a personal obligation upon the grantee, which, in case of default, may be enforced by the mortgagee pursuant to the terms of the contract. Burbank v. Roots, 4 Colo. App. 197, 35 P. 275. See, also, Stichter v. Cox, 52 Neb. 532, 72 N. W. 848; Morlan v. Loch, 95 Kan. 716, 149 P. 431; Furnas v. Durgin, 119 Mass. 500, 20 Am. Rep. 341; Haas v. Dudley, 30 Or. 355, 48 P. 168.

The defendant urges, however, that, no matter how founded in reason the rule above announced may be, it arose in jurisdictions not restricted by a statutory requirement similar in nature to that of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for but one action to recover a debt secured by a mortgage. In this connection he further points to the fact that the California cases in their construction of this section have consistently held that a court cannot properly render a personal judgment in an independent action against the maker of a promissory note secured by a valid mortgage until the security is exhausted (Barbieri v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 154, 23 P. 1086; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Crescent Lumber Co. v. Larson, 166 Cal. 168, 135 P. 502); or, expressed in other words, the mortgaged land necessarily constitutes the primary fund out of which the mortgage debt must be paid (Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 51 P. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108; White v. Schader, 185 Cal. 606, 198 P. 19, 21 A. L. R. 499). Furthermore, the prevailing tendency of our appellate courts is to extend rather than limit the application of the provisions of said section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure. See Bank of Italy Nat. Trust & Sav. Ass'n v. Bentley (Cal. Sup.) 20 P.(2d) 940.

[1-3] Likewise in determining the position of plaintiffs we are bound to consider with the principles above announced the well-established rule that a purchaser or grantee who assumes the payment of the mortgage debt becomes as to the mortgagor the principal debtor, and the mortgagor a surety, and the dealings between the parties must be controlled by the doctrines governing suretyship. Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 665, 55 P. 683; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 37 P. 411; Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 P. 868; Bogart v. George K. Porter Co., 193 Cal. 197, 223 P. 959, 31 A. L. R. 1045. Manifestly, in view of this rule, the plaintiffs by their voluntary extinguishment of the mortgage debt became subrogated without formal assignment to the benefit of the security, which as equitable assignees they could enforce for the money expended. Graham v. Durnbaugh, 44 Cal. App. 483, 186 P. 798; White v. Schader, supra. We are further convinced that the extent of respondents' right to recover cannot be determined solely by the strict language of the contract, but should be read in the light of said section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which must necessarily enter into and form a part of the agreement as though expressly referred to and incorporated by its terms. 6 Cal. Jur. p. 310, § 186.

[4] It is evident that the payment of the note and mortgage by plaintiffs was not required to establish defendant's liability under the contract. This act on their part was apparently for no other purpose than to protect their newly acquired interest, purchased at the trustee's sale, from foreclosure under the prior mortgage. Moreover, the plaintiffs were presumed to know as a matter of law at the commencement of the action that defendant's liability was merely one of indemnity contingent upon the sale of the mortgaged property in a legal foreclosure proceeding and its failure to satisfy the debt and costs. See Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 P. 609; Williams v. Naftzger, supra; 18 Cal. Jur. p. 42, § 364; Robson v. O'Toole, 45 Cal. App. 63, 187 P. 110. This being true, the plaintiffs have deprived themselves of a right of action under the contract by their failure to foreclose the mortgage and determine the deficiency, if any.

There is nothing said in the case of Turner v. Howze, 28 Cal. App. 167, 151 P. 751, cited and relied upon by respondents, contrary to the opinion we have reached. There the debt defendant agreed to pay was in substance his own, for which plaintiff's property had been given as security, and the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover upon the contract.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Reversed, with directions.

TURRENTINE, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, as guardian ad litem of Betty Daslyne Brown, a minor, brought suit against defendants for damages arising out of the death of the father of the minor, who was killed while riding in an automobile as the guest of the defendants. George Christian was operating the automobile with the consent of defendant Kiramidjian, the owner. The cause was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. Prior to submitting the matter to the jury, defendants moved for a directed verdict. This motion was denied. After verdict, and before entry of the judgment, motion was made to vacate and set aside the verdict of the jury and enter a judgment for defendants notwithstanding the verdict. The motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was made in the alternative form asking therefor, and reserving, if that be denied, the right to apply for a new trial. On motion for new trial, judgment on the verdict was set aside, and judgment notwithstanding the verdict was made and entered for the defendants. Plaintiff appeals from such judgment.

The motion for a directed verdict and motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict were made on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, "because it appears from the whole evidence in the case that the negligence of the deceased, plaintiff's ancestor, proximately contributed to his death."

It appears from the evidence that at about 1 o'clock on the afternoon of August 25, 1930, the deceased met defendants and served them with beer; that the three of them drank a couple of bottles apiece between that time and 3 o'clock. At about 3 o'clock defendants left in an automobile and drove to a place about two miles distant. The deceased did not go with them. Upon arrival they drank more beer, returning about 4 o'clock, where they again joined deceased. It does not appear that deceased knew of their drinking at this other place. All three again drank beer, either a glass or a bottle apiece. They also had lunch. At about 5 o'clock they left for deceased's home, the defendant Christian driving, with all three sitting in the front seat. Christian drove some distance, and at the request of deceased stopped at a place, where he got two bottles of beer, putting them in the car. While there they each drank another glass. They re-entered the automobile with the same seating arrangement, Christian driving, and did not stop again until the accident occurred. On passing an automobile, Christian, while driving between fifty-five and sixty miles an hour, turned and waved his hand at the occupants of the other car. While he was so engaged the automobile he was driving swerved onto the left-hand side of the road, he glanced forward, turned it back to the right, it went off the highway and overturned, causing the death of deceased. The car was going about fifty-five miles an hour at the time of the accident.

The defendant Kiramidjian gave the following testimony:

"Q. Now, was Christian driving a little fast at any time prior to the accident? A. I don't know—at certain times.

"Q. Did Mr. Brown say anything to you or to Mr. Christian about his driving? A. He did once, he made a remark.

"Q. What did he say? A. Well, he told me—he asked me to take the wheel. He said if I didn't he thought Mr. Christian would kill us before we got home.

"Q. What was your answer to him? A. I told him, 'Our lives are not any better than his,' so we were feeling pretty good and we didn't care. We told Christian to slow up.

"Q. I will ask you if you said this to him after Mr. Brown told you to have him slow down, you said, 'What the hell?—your life is no better than his, sit where you are?' Is that what you said? * * * A. Yes, sir."

Whether this was before or after Brown got out of the automobile to get the two bottles of beer does not appear. When Kiramidjian was asked whether Christian's actions on the day of the accident were different than on any other day when he had not been drinking, he replied:

"Well, it has some effects on a fellow, we was feeling pretty good.

"Q. You had been with Mr. Christian on numerous occasions when he had not been drinking liquor? A. Yes.

"Q. Was there any difference in his actions this day than the days when you were with him when he had not been drinking? * * * A. No.

"What condition was Mr. Christian in just prior to getting in and driving the car relative to his stability? A. Well, he seemed all right to me.

"Q. He looked like he was able to drive your car did he? A. Yes.

"Q. Just state what you saw, what he did? A. He was feeling all right, he was feeling happy. He wasn't staggering or anything. He looked all right."

The defendant Christian, when called as a witness, gave substantially the same story as Kiramidjian, and, when asked whether he felt any different on the day of the accident than on other days, answered:

"Oh, yes, why sure, I felt better because I had been drinking beer. I felt happy and things like that. You are bound to feel different. I wasn't intoxicated, I had been drinking beer but not intoxicated."

Over plaintiff's objection, a traffic officer, who came on the scene shortly after the accident and saw the physical conditions surrounding the accident and smelled liquor, testified that he "thought it was a drunken party." He heard one of the defendants talk, did not know which one it was, but thought it was Christian. Some broken bottles were found at the scene of the accident. The three witnesses whose evidence we have reviewed were the only ones who testified as to what happened before or after the accident in respect to the drinking and condition of defendants and of the deceased.

[1-4] From these facts we feel that it was a question for the jury to determine, under proper instructions, (a) whether the defendant Christian was drunk or under the influence of intoxicating liquor as defined in People v. Ekstromer, 71 Cal. App. 239, 246, 235 P. 69, and whether, if drunk, or under the influence of intoxicating liquor, this was the proximate cause of the accident; (b) whether the deceased knew, or should have known, that defendant Christian was under the influence of intoxicating liquor when he last started to ride with him; and (c) whether the turning to wave at the passengers of the passing automobile while traveling at an excessive rate of speed was gross negligence, and whether such gross negligence, if so found, was the proximate cause of the accident. Krause v. Rarity, 210 Cal. 644-655, 293 P. 62, 77 A. L. R. 1327. From evidence that a person had been drinking intoxicating liquor and thereafter drives his car in a negligent manner, it does not follow as a matter of law that he was driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. There is no evidence in the record from which it can be said as a matter of law that deceased knew, or should have known, that Christian was under the influence of intoxicating liquor before he entered the automobile the last time, or that after discovering his intoxicated condition he had a clear chance to leave the automobile at a safe place. This clearly distinguishes the present case from Hirsch v. D'Autremont (Cal. App.) 23 P.(2d) 1066.

[5, 6] The trial court has power to enter a judgment notwithstanding the verdict when it could and should have in the first instance directed a verdict (Code Civ. Proc. § 629), and the court's right to direct a verdict is "absolutely the same as the right * * * to grant a nonsuit." Perera v. Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co., 179 Cal. 63, 175 P. 451, 455. Applying these rules to the facts and to the conclusions which we have drawn therefrom, we are of the opinion that the trial court did not have the right to determine from the whole evidence that a verdict for defendants should have been directed in the first instance, and therefore did not have a right to enter a judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

It is urged that a reversal of this case results in a final judgment for plaintiff. This is not the law. Upon a reversal of the case, and judgment on the verdict being entered, the defendants have a right to file a motion for new trial, if they so desire, and the trial court shall pass upon said motion as if made in the first instance, if made in the manner and within the time required by law, after notice of entry of the judgment as herein ordered.

The judgment is reversed. It is directed that judgment upon the verdict be entered.

Jack Norris was convicted of robbery in the first degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Maxwell M. Willens, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery in the first degree, upon an information filed against him by the district attorney of San Joaquin county, charging that the defendant on or about the 28th day of February, 1933, willfully, feloniously, etc., held up and robbed the occupants of a certain roadhouse known as and called the "Five Mile House," situate in said county. The roadhouse in question is situate about five miles north of the city of Stockton.

The record discloses that the defendant and one George Hibbitt, a negro, participated in the robbery, and, at the trial of the appellant in this action, Hibbitt, who had previously pleaded guilty and been sentenced to Folsom, told the whole story of the transaction. This record discloses that the appellant and Hibbitt had been acquainted with each other for some years, had worked together in Stanislaus county at a place near Los Banos, and for the same employer. The record further shows that on Sunday evening, February 26, 1933, while the defendant, accompanied by two witnesses who testified in the cause, to wit, Art Fuller and H. W. Lambert, were walking along on one of the streets in the city of Stockton, the appellant recognized Hibbitt, who was sitting on a porch in front of a residence bordering the street where the three parties were walking, and at the time in question Hibbitt and the appellant had some conversation. This conversation was not overheard by either of the witnesses we have mentioned. Thereafter, the robbery occurred on the evening of February 28th.

The circumstances surrounding the robbery appear to be as follows: An automobile drove up in front of the roadhouse some time between 10 and 11 on the evening of February 28th; a colored man and white man immediately appeared at the door of the roadhouse, the colored man carrying a revolver. The white man having a handkerchief tied over his face to conceal his features; the occupants of the roadhouse were lined up, bound with wire, their pockets rifled, and the till of the roadhouse opened and the contents taken. The proceeds of the robbery aggregated about $175. The details of the robbery are fully set forth in the testimony of George Hibbitt; the fact of their being driven to the roadhouse in a Buick coupé belonging to Norris; the kind of gun which Norris gave to Hibbitt to use as he preceded the defendant in accomplishing the robbery. It also appears from the testimony of Hibbitt that the appellant and Hibbitt had been acquainted with each other from some time in the year 1926; that it was in the years 1926, 1927, and 1928 that the two were living near Los Banos. This witness, however, had not seen the appellant after 1928 until the meeting in Stockton which we have just mentioned. On the way out from Stockton for the purpose of the robbery, it appears that the appellant, who was driving the car, explained to Hibbitt the manner in which the holdup should be carried out, and that the two drove about for some little time until the hour which we have mentioned.

[1] Upon this appeal it is contended that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant conviction, and that the court erred in its instructions to the jury, also in its rulings excluding the testimony offered by the appellant. The contention that the testimony is insufficient to support the verdict is based upon the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code, which specifies that a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it is corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, etc. If the record discloses any testimony tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, the first contention of the appellant is unsound.

There is testimony in the record showing that the defendant, on or about the 1st day of October, 1932, went to work on a ranch known as the "Quinto" ranch, owned by a man by the name of Devaney. This ranch is located about two miles north of the Five Mile House, and, while there, had a conversation with a man by the name of Tinner, and during this conversation the appellant stated to Tinner that he had in mind the holding up of the Five Mile House. The record further shows that the employees of the Quinto ranch, including the appellant, were accustomed to have their pay checks cashed at the Five Mile House. The witness Hibbitt testified that the wire which was used in tying up the occupants of the Five Mile House on the night of the robbery was obtained from the Quinto ranch. It was found upon examination that the wire used in tying up the occupants of the Five Mile House was similar to wire found and left at the Quinto ranch. The wire used was baling wire.

The witness Hibbitt testified that the gun that was given to him by the appellant was a Colts 44 six-shooter, single action, side loader. One of the occupants of the roadhouse who was held up testified as to the revolver used on that occasion. Question and answer in relation to the revolver are as follows: "Q. Was there anything about it that you noticed particularly? A. It has got that side rod there, side loader, an old Colts. I could tell it, in fact I identified that gun before they ever picked it up, yes, I don't know if it is the same gun, but it is one like it if it is not the same."

The record shows that, when the defendant was arrested in Reno, to which place he had gone shortly after the robbery, a gun in the possession of the defendant was found precisely like the description of the gun given by the witness Hibbitt, and, also, one of the occupants of the roadhouse. The defendant admitted the ownership of the gun, and stated that he had owned it for about fifteen years. One of the occupants of the roadhouse testified that he noticed a peculiar wobbling gait of the white man who accompanied the negro, and that the wobbling gait of the white man was exactly similar to the walk of the defendant, which he had noticed after the defendant's arrest and during the course of the trial at Stockton. The appellant denied his acquaintanceship with the witness Hibbitt; denied that he ever knew him in Los Banos; denied the meeting in Stockton testified to by the witnesses Tinner and Lambert. The conversation testified to by Tinner with the appellant appears not to have been denied.

The record further shows that Hibbitt knew all about the automobile owned by the appellant; that he had had certain repairs made thereon; the cost thereof; had been compelled to have the shock absorbers taken off the machine, and other incidents in relation to the automobile, showing his familiarity with and acquaintance with the affairs of the appellant. The defendant simply denied his acquaintanceship with the negro.

The record shows, as we have stated, that the appellant left Stockton shortly after February 28th, to wit, on March 4th, and was arrested in Reno, Nev. The testimony and corroborating circumstances which we have detailed may be admitted as not sufficient, if standing alone, to support a verdict of conviction, but are certainly corroborating circumstances tending to support direct testimony given by the accomplice. As to the legal sufficiency of the corroborating testimony which we have set forth, an excerpt from the case of People v. McNett, 80 Cal. App. 81, 251 P. 688, 690, wherein this court, speaking through pro tempore Justice Needham, used the following language: "While, of course, it is axiomatic that corroborative evidence of that given by an accomplice need not be direct and positive, and while circumstantial evidence, which tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged, is sufficient to fulfill the requirements of the law, and while the corroborative evidence required by the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code need not be strong and is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, though if it stood alone it would be entitled to but little weight (People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 24 P. 32; People v. Barker, 114 Cal. 617, 46 P. 601), and while such testimony need not extend to every fact in detail covered by the statement of the accomplice (People v. Cloonan, 50 Cal. 449; People v. Kunz, 73 Cal. 315, 14 P. 836), and while it has been held that sometimes a fact or circumstance which seems to be very slight carries the quality of sufficient corroborative proof, and while it may be claimed that the corroborative evidence in the instant case is sufficient under section 1111 of the Penal Code, yet we are constrained to hold to the opinion that such corroborative evidence in the instant case is not so clear and convincing as to render serious errors occurring at the trial harmless."

[2] Our attention has not been called to any serious errors, or, in fact, to any errors of the trial court occurring at the trial of the instant case. The appellant does urge that the court committed error in sustaining objections to questions propounded to Mrs. Norris, the wife of the appellant, as to whether she had or had not written to the appellant while he was living in Stockton and she living in Reno, asking the appellant to come to Reno, the contention being that this was in explanation of the defendant's leaving Stockton shortly after the robbery for which he was being tried.

An examination of the testimony given by the appellant discloses that he did not testify as to why he left Stockton and went to Reno, Nev., nor did he attempt to give any explanation of why he left Stockton shortly after the robbery. Unless it were shown that the appellant had left Stockton at the request of his wife, and gone to Reno, the fact that Mrs. Norris had written to the appellant was, of course, wholly immaterial. No such showing was made, nor was any offer to introduce such testimony presented to the court.

[3] The appellant requested from the trial court the giving of a number of instructions, most of which were refused. It is now urged that it was error on the part of the court not to give the instructions requested by the appellant, defining the weight that should be given to the testimony of an accomplice, and the fact that a defendant could not be convicted on the testimony alone of an accomplice.

Among the instructions given by the court we find the following: "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof. Corroborative evidence is additional evidence to the same point. To corroborate an accomplice the evidence need not extend to all the elements of the offense, nor prove that the accomplice has told the truth. The corroborative evidence must tend, to some degree at least, to incriminate the defendant. While it need not be strong, more is required by way of corroboration than mere suspicion." This fully covers all that was required on the subject of corroboration. In other instructions the court fully advised the jury that they could not convict the defendant unless they believed from the testimony, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was guilty. On the subject of flight, the jury was properly instructed that it was simply a circumstance which they might consider. The court correctly instructed the jury that they were the exclusive judges of the weight of any testimony that had been given.

A reading of the instructions given by the court shows that every element or question involved in the case was properly presented to the jury, and that, had the instruction requested by the defendant been also read, tedious repetition would have been disclosed, all of which was properly avoided.

The order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

Action by P. L. Sarraat and others, copartners, doing business as Silvan Newburger & Son, against W. E. Walters. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

James W. Glassford, of El Centro, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

Under a written contract dated April 29, 1926, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 300 bales of cotton to be delivered on or before December 1, 1926, with the proviso that, if the same was not delivered, the plaintiffs should have the option to purchase cotton in the open market and charge the defendant "the difference in market value at such time." In this action to recover damages for failure to deliver any of the cotton, the plaintiffs recovered judgment, from which the defendant has appealed. No brief has been filed on behalf of the respondents.

[1, 2] A number of the points raised by the appellant are based upon the contention that under the terms of the contract he was under no obligation to deliver any cotton unless the same should be raised during that season upon lands owned or controlled by him. These contentions are without merit, as the terms of the contract are plain and must prevail in the absence of any pleading of fraud or grounds for reformation.

[3] A further contention that the judgment, with respect to the amount of the damages, is not sustained by either the findings or the evidence, must be sustained. The contract fails to fix a definite price for the cotton, but provides that the price shall be fixed "in open market" on or before November 15, 1926, and that, in the event the seller fails to fix the price on or before that date, the buyer may fix the same. While the court found that the appellant did not fix the price on or before November 15, 1926, there is neither a finding that the respondents ever fixed the price nor one as to what was the contract price. The court found that, "subsequent to" November 15, the respondents bought 300 bales of cotton in the open market at a price one hundred and twenty-five points above the December New York future market, but made no finding as to what was the December New York future market, what the respondents paid, or as to the weight of the cotton purchased. From these findings the conclusion is drawn that the difference between the contract price and the price paid by the respondents is $3,375.

Evidence was introduced by the respondents to the effect that the difference between the market price on December 1, 1926, and the contract price was "225 to 250 points." The witness was then asked: "What is the gross amount of difference at the time on December 1 and the contract price that you purchased for?" To which the answer was: "Cotton sold cheaper on December first at the time of the contract than it did on November 26 when we bought 340 bales." The record contains no other evidence as to quantity of cotton bought, and none to show that the price was fixed or what the market price was on December 1st. It cannot even be ascertained from the evidence what was the market price on November 26. It does appear that the respondents' gross figures, which were accepted by the court, were based upon the market price on November 26, although the respondents' own testimony shows that the market price on December 1st, which the contract provided should be used as a basis for fixing damages, was more favorable to the appellant. While there is evidence that the respondents bought cotton on several occasions in November, no purchase of 300 bales appears, and there is nothing to indicate that any purchase made was on account of the failure of the appellant to deliver the cotton here in question.

With no evidence that the contract price was ever established or as to its amount, and with none as to what was the market price at the time of the breach or any time thereafter, the respondents' witness was permitted to testify over the appellant's objection that the "loss" sustained on the purchase of 300 bales of cotton was $3,375, for which amount the court gave judgment. This statement was a pure conclusion, and the judgment is sustained neither by the findings nor by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

Affirmed.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellants.

Laurence B. Myers, Ralph E. Norton, and Conley, Conley & Conley, all of Fresno, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendants have appealed from a judgment of $1,760 which was rendered against them for damages to a truck which occurred as a result of an automobile collision.

Shortly before midnight on July 7, 1931, the defendant Horn was engaged in driving a Moreland truck and trailer belonging to the defendant King northerly along the state highway at a point about four miles from Madera. Seated by his side was a coemployee by the name of Nevins. They were conveying a load of melons to the city of Oakland. The paved portion of the highway at that point is twenty feet wide. There is an eight-foot solid oiled shoulder on each side of the concrete highway at that place. Beyond the shoulder there is a gradual slope of solid land without the presence of a ditch. The defendant Horn had frequently driven a truck along this highway and was familiar with the condition of that roadway. He was driving at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. Suddenly trouble developed with his carburetor or ignition system and the engine ceased to operate. Without applying the brakes, Horn guided his machine toward the outer edge of the concrete and the truck finally stopped with the inside wheels within two or three feet from the central white line of the concrete. Here the truck and trailer remained parked for three or four minutes until the collision occurred. Horn testified in that regard: "Q. How much time passed by from the time you came to a stop until the collision? A. Oh, I should say, three or four minutes."

Following the defendants' truck at some considerable distance were two other trucks belonging to the plaintiffs. They were traveling in the same direction. There was no other traffic on the highway at that time and place. The first one of plaintiffs' trucks was driven by an employee by the name of Earl Pattee. The second truck was driven by another employee by the name of Wipf. Both of these trucks were traveling on their proper side of the highway at a rate of twenty-five to twenty-eight miles an hour. The pavement was dry and the night was clear. When Pattee reached the parked truck he passed it by turning onto his left-hand side of the concrete. He said in that regard: "I had to swing out in order to miss him. I came pretty near hitting him myself." Pattee drove on without stopping. The undisputed evidence is that the plaintiffs' second truck was following the first one at a distance of from four to six city blocks, and at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. Wipf failed to see the defendants' parked truck in time to avoid hitting it. The drivers of both of plaintiffs' trucks testified there were no tail or clearance lights on the parked trailer. The truck which was driven by Wipf ran into the rear end of the defendants' trailer. The plaintiffs' machine was damaged.

Suit for damages to the truck was commenced by the plaintiffs. It was asserted the defendants were guilty of negligence in parking their truck on the paved portion of the highway in violation of section 136 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 561), and in failing to keep the tail and clearance lamps on their trailer lighted. In their answer the defendants refuted the plaintiffs' allegations of negligence and affirmatively charged "that the carelessness and negligence of the plaintiffs and their agent and employee contributed directly and proximately to the collision." Upon appeal it is claimed the evidence fails to support the finding that the defendants were guilty of negligence and, upon the contrary, that Pattee, the driver of plaintiffs' first truck was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to stop his machine and warn Wipf of the danger of defendants' parked truck, and that this negligence is imputed to the plaintiffs so as to defeat their claim for damages.

The cause was tried without a jury. The court adopted findings to the effect that defendants were guilty of negligence which proximately caused the damages, and that plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of plaintiffs for actual damages sustained by their truck and for loss of the use thereof during a period of twenty-five days while it was undergoing repairs. From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

[1] There is ample evidence to support the finding that defendants were guilty of negligence in parking their truck on the paved portion of the highway in violation of section 136 of the California Vehicle Act, and permitting it to remain in that position for several minutes without ascertaining whether or not the tail and clearance lights on the trailer were burning when the driver knew they were flickering and likely to be extinguished. Mr. Wipf testified regarding the collision: "I did not see him in time to miss him. I turned to my left and applied my brakes at the same time, but I was too close to him when I saw him. There was no lights on the back end of his trailer, or no clearance lights; there was a dim light in front, I noticed afterwards, so I got out of the truck and took my shoe off my foot, my foot was hurt, and I did not know at that time that I had quite a severe cut on my wrist, and when I was out on the highway, Mr. Horn came back and asked me if his lights were on, and I told him that they were not, and he said that he knew that he had had trouble with them, that they had been flickering, but he did not know they was clear out."

[2, 3] The defendant Horn admitted sitting in his machine three or four minutes after it stopped on the highway before the collision occurred. He made no effort to ascertain the condition of his rear lights. Moreover, there was ample momentum of his truck and sufficient opportunity to guide the machine off the concrete portion of the highway after the driver discovered the trouble with his engine and knew that the machine was likely to stop running. He was traveling twenty-five miles an hour when the engine trouble occurred. It was a question of fact for the court to determine whether the driver of defendants' truck knew he had defective rear lights, and whether it was practicable for him to park the truck off the paved portion of the highway. Since the court's conclusions with relation to these questions of fact are supported by substantial evidence, its findings may not be disturbed by this court on appeal.

[4] There is also sufficient evidence to support the court's finding that the plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence for failure on the part of the driver of their foremost truck to stop and warn the driver of the second truck of the danger from the defendants' parked machine. Assuming, without so deciding, that under certain circumstances the failure of one employee to warn another employee who is engaged in driving a separate machine, of threatened danger, would be imputed to the master and constitute negligence so as to defeat his claim for damages, still, under the circumstances of this case, it became a question of fact for the court to determine whether the driver of the first truck as a reasonable person would anticipate serious danger and be required to stop his machine to convey his fear to the driver of the truck which was following, and, if so, whether he believed that he had time to stop and warn him. Even though Pattee did narrowly escape a collision with the parked trailer, it may not be said as a matter of law, that he should necessarily assume the driver of the following truck would also fail to see the parked vehicle in time to avoid a collision. Moreover, the undisputed evidence is that Wipf's truck was following plaintiffs' first car at a distance of from four to six city blocks, which would be from 1,200 to 1,800 feet distant, and that it was traveling twenty-five miles an hour. It follows that the intervening space to the point of the parked truck would be traversed in from one-half to three-quarters of a minute. When Pattee first discovered the parked truck his machine was traveling twenty-five miles an hour. It would have been physically impossible for him to stop his truck, park it on the side of the highway and return to the defendants' truck in time to warn Wipf of the danger. We must assume Pattee knew that it was impossible for him to stop his machine so as to warn Wipf in time to avoid the collision, even though he anticipated it might occur. Under the circumstances of this case it may therefore not be held, as a matter of law, that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence. Contributory negligence of the plaintiffs became a question of fact to be determined by the court. With its conclusion in that regard this court may not interfere, since there is substantial evidence to support the finding favorable to plaintiffs. 19 Cal. Jur. 735, § 141; Elsev v. Domecq, 114 Cal. App. 42, 299 P. 794.

The evidence is adequate to support the amount of damages which the court found was suffered by plaintiffs.

[5] The court found that the truck was damaged in the sum of $1,135. This amount is not seriously disputed. The court further found damages for loss of the use of the machine for a period of twenty-five days at a rate of $25 a day. This is supported by the evidence. The bill for repairs, which was introduced in evidence contains an item charging for 265 hours of labor. Allowing eight working hours per day, this indicates that the machine was actually undergoing repairs in the hands of the mechanic for thirty-three days. The plaintiff W. M. Pattee testified that he figured the reasonable rental value of a truck to be "at least twenty-five dollars" a day. This evidence adequately supports the allowance of $625 for loss of use of the machine.

The judgment is affirmed.

Where right to recover is not barred by statute, further consideration by estate's representative of valid claim not acted upon, or its subsequent allowance by representative and court, is not barred.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨234, 236.

Any act in writing by estate's representative or by judge sufficiently indicating intention to reject or approve claim has same effect upon estate as indorsement upon claim (Probate Code, §§ 711, 712).

3. Executors and administrators ⇨213.

Statute prohibiting approval of claim which is barred by limitation, held not applicable to claim, portion of which was not barred by limitation (Probate Code, § 708).

4. Courts ⇨201.

When superior court sitting in probate has jurisdiction of subject-matter, it has power to determine all questions of law and fact, determination of which is ancillary to proper judgment.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨236.

Superior court sitting in probate has jurisdiction to decide upon allowance of claim, and such jurisdiction is not limited to rendition of correct decision (Probate Code, §§ 708, 711, 712).

6. Executors and administrators ⇨241.

Allowance of claim against estate is not equivalent to "final judgment" and is not conclusive upon heirs (Probate Code, § 713).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of Final Decree or Judgment," see Words & Phrases.]

7. Executors and administrators ⇨239.

Order directing payment of claim by estate is appealable (Probate Code, § 1240).

8. Certiorari ⇨29.

Certiorari is not available to correct errors in exercise of jurisdiction, but only where court exceeded its jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

9. Execution ⇨75.

Mere lapse of time after entry of judgment does not deprive trial court of power to order issuance of execution (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

10. Executors and administrators ⇨213.

Where judgment debtor died and statute of limitations ran against judgment, court may grant judgment creditor leave to enforce judgment by presentation of claim against estate, and by bringing action thereon if claim is rejected (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

11. Judgment ⇨855(1).

Procedure contemplated by statute providing for enforcement of judgment after lapse of five years is subsequent step in action already commenced and not separate proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

12. Executors and administrators ⇨236.

Superior court sitting in probate could not permit claimant to enforce dormant judgment, against estate, since whether execution can be issued on dormant judgment cannot be determined in separate proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

13. Judgment ⇨855(1).

Whether dormant judgment shall be enforced is within discretion of trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

14. Courts ⇨198.

Probate jurisdiction of superior court is separate from its jurisdiction in ordinary civil matters, and while considering case belonging to one class, it cannot determine what is essentially case of another class.

15. Executors and administrators ⇨238.

Order permitting claimant to enforce dormant judgment may be vacated on motion, where order was in excess of court's probate jurisdiction, and was made without notice (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

16. Appeal and error ⇨82(1).

Order permitting claimant to enforce dormant judgment against estate is appealable as order made after judgment, though order was void (Code Civ. Proc. § 685)

17. Appeal and error ⇨141.

Representative of estate must generally seek review of judgment against estate in personal action.

18. Appeal and error ⇨147.

Heir may prosecute appeal from judgment against estate, where representative refuses to do so.

19. Certiorari ⇨33(2).

Certiorari to review judgment or order of superior court can be granted only to parties to record and not to strangers.

20. Certiorari ⇨33(2).

Heir and his guardian stood in position of strangers to whom certiorari could not be granted to review order of superior court permitting claimant to enforce dormant judgment against estate (Code Civ. Proc. § 685).

21. Appeal and error ⇨143.

Heir and his guardian can make themselves parties to record by motion to set aside order complained of, and if order denying motion be appealable, they may have proceeded reviewed on appeal, not only for excess of jurisdiction, but for error.

22. Certiorari ☞6.

That right to appeal was lost by lapse of time did not change rule that certiorari will not lie where remedy by appeal exists, except in unusual cases, such as want of notice (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

Original application for certiorari by Frank Faias, as guardian of the person and estate of Christina Faias, an incompetent person, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Alameda.

Order granting relief discharged, and order approving claim affirmed.

Edward J. Silver, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Robert P. Cahen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Certiorari to review certain orders made by respondent Superior Court.

Francisco Gomes De Sousa, who died on July 25, 1932, was during his lifetime married to Josephine Sousa. At the time of the marriage decedent had one daughter, Christina, an incompetent, of whose person and estate petitioner since August 12, 1932, has been and now is the duly appointed and qualified guardian. In 1913 said Josephine Sousa obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from decedent, which provided for the payment by the latter of the sum of $25 each month for the support of the two minor children of the marriage, namely, Manuel and Madeline, who were aged three and four years, respectively. The same order was continued in the final decree. Decedent died testate, and said Madeline De Sousa was duly appointed and qualified as the administratrix with the will annexed of his estate. Said Josephine Sousa filed a claim against the estate, alleging that sums aggregating $4,700 with interest remained unpaid on said judgment. The administratrix took no action thereon; and after the lapse of thirty days the claimant filed in respondent court in the matter of decedent's estate her affidavit, setting forth the above facts, and, based thereon, the court entered its order, granting leave to enforce the judgment against the estate "as provided by law." The court also made therein a finding of the amount unpaid. Following this the claimant commenced suit on the claim in the Superior Court of Alameda county.

On February 23, 1933, the administratrix filed in the matter of the estate her petition, praying the order of the court permitting her to compromise said claim for the sum of $3,000. The petition was set down for hearing on March 1, 1933. Petitioner herein as guardian of the incompetent filed objections to the making of the order prayed for on the ground that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Following a hearing the court made its order as prayed for.

Petitioner contends that respondent court sitting in probate was without jurisdiction to make the order permitting the claimant to enforce the judgment; further, that there was a want of jurisdiction to make the second order mentioned.

[1] The last order was in effect no more than an approval of the claim for the reduced amount as agreed upon by the claimant and the administratrix. As stated, the claim was presented to the administratrix, who took no action thereon, and the court had not previously passed upon its validity. There is nothing in the law which forbids further consideration by the estate's representative of a valid claim, or its subsequent allowance by the representative and the court, if the right to recover thereon be not barred by statute. 11 Cal. Jur., Executors and Administrators, § 379, p. 661.

Respondents urge that a compromise in cases of this character is authorized by section 578 of the Probate Code. In view of the foregoing, however, the question whether that section applies to claims against an estate need not be considered.

[2] Section 711 of the Probate Code provides that the fact of the approval or rejection of a claim must be indorsed thereon. However, such an indorsement is but a manifestation of intention, and does not go to the essence of the thing done. See section 712, Probate Code. This provision, in our opinion, was adopted with a view to convenience rather than substance; and any act in writing by the estate's representative or by the judge sufficiently indicating an intention to reject or approve should, in so far as concerns the estate, be held to have the same effect as an indorsement upon the claim.

[3-5] The statute provides that no claim which is barred by the statute shall be allowed or approved (Probate Code, § 708); but it is not contended here that the whole claim was barred, as a portion at least had accrued within five years immediately preceding decedent's death; and when the Superior Court sitting in matters of probate has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a case it has the power to hear and determine in the mode provided by law all questions of law and fact the determination of which is ancillary to a proper judgment (Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 P. 458); and although the allowance of a claim may be erroneous (Estate of Aldersley, 174 Cal. 366, 163 P. 206), the question is one which the court is empowered to decide, and its jurisdiction is not limited to the rendition of a correct decision (Kohn v. Rupley, 54 Cal. App. 565, 202 P. 163).

[6-8] It has been held that the allowance of a claim is not equivalent to a final judgment (Haub v. Leggett, 160 Cal. 491, 117 P. 556), and is not conclusive upon an heir (11 Cal. Jur., Executors and Administrators, sec. 448, p. 755). Section 713 of the Probate Code provides that any person interested in an estate may contest the allowance of any claim not passed upon in the settlement of any former account. Moreover, an order directing payment is appealable (12 Cal. Jur., Executors and Administrators, § 866, p. 106); or, if the one in question be considered as equivalent to such an order, an appeal therefrom lies under section 1240 of the Probate Code. However, the question of the right to appeal from the order last considered, or whether the heirs on whose behalf petitioner asks relief here, would, in view of the facts stated, be bound by the order, is not material, as certiorari is not available to correct errors in the exercise of the jurisdiction of a judicial tribunal (4 Cal. Jur., Certiorari, § 14, p. 1036), but only where it has exceeded its jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068), which, as respects this order, was not the case.

[9-14] The first order, however, presents a different question. There the claimant sought relief under section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "in all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose, founded upon supplemental pleadings. * * * " Under this section mere lapse of time after the entry of a judgment does not deprive the trial court of the power to order the issuance of an execution (Welk v. Conner, 102 Cal. App. 286, 282 P. 963); and when the judgment debtor has died and the statute of limitations has run against the judgment the court may under this section grant the judgment creditor leave to enforce the judgment by the presentation of a claim against the estate and by the bringing of an action thereon if the claim is rejected (Saunders v. Simms, 183 Cal. 167, 190 P. 806). However, it has been held that the procedure contemplated by the section is a subsequent step in the action already commenced and not a separate proceeding (Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 91 P. 330; Murphy v. Davids, 55 Cal. App. 416, 203 P. 802). The question whether an execution shall issue not being one which can be determined in a separate proceeding, it is clear, we think, that respondent court sitting in probate was without jurisdiction to grant relief under the section. Whether a dormant judgment shall be enforced is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court (11 Cal. Jur., Executions, § 12, p. 51), which may, as was done in Saunders v. Simms, supra, grant the judgment creditor leave to present a claim against the estate of a deceased debtor, and, in case of its rejection, to bring an action to establish its validity. The probate jurisdiction of the Superior Court is separate and distinct from its jurisdiction in ordinary civil matters; and while engaged in the consideration of a case belonging to one of those classes it cannot in the same matter hear and determine what is essentially a case of another class (7 Cal. Jur., Courts, § 81, p. 698).

[15, 16] While it is our conclusion that the order was in excess of the court's probate jurisdiction, such an order, if made without notice, as appears to have been the case here, may be vacated on motion; and, being an order which affects the judgment by way of enforcing it (Lake v. Harris, 198 Cal. 85, 243 P. 417), is appealable as an order made after judgment (Harrier v. Bassford, 145 Cal. 529, 78 P. 1038; Doehla v. Phillips, supra; Creditors' Adjustment Co. v. Newman, 185 Cal. 509, 197 P. 334); and this is true although the order was void, it being otherwise appealable (Merced Bank v. Rosenthal, 99 Cal. 39, 31 P. 849, 33 P. 732; Stearns Ranchos Co. v. McDowell, 134 Cal. 562, 66 P. 724; Ewing v. Richvale Land Co., 176 Cal. 152, 167 P. 876; Baicalupui v. Baicalupui, 72 Cal. App. 654, 238 P. 93).

[17-22] As urged by petitioner, the representative of an estate must as a general rule seek a review of a judgment against the estate in a personal action (Bancroft, Code Practice and Remedies, § 6371); nevertheless, where it appears that the representative refuses to prosecute an appeal an heir may do so (Holland v. McCarthy, 177 Cal. 507, 171 P. 421). Here it was apparent from the conduct of the administratrix that she did not intend to move to vacate the order or appeal therefrom, and no action was taken by the petitioner or the heir. Moreover, it has been held that the writ of certiorari to review any judgment or order of the Superior Court can only be granted to parties to the record and not to strangers. The petitioner and his ward stand here in the latter position. However, such persons can make themselves parties to the record by a motion to set aside an order complained of; and if an order denying the motion be appealable they may have the proceeding reviewed on appeal not only for excess of jurisdiction, but for error. Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 501, 77 P. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102; Howe v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. App. 769, 274 P. 992; Tingley v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 47, 96 P. 20; 4 Cal. Jur., Certiorari, § 51, p. 1087. Where the remedy by appeal exists certiorari will not lie (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068), and the fact that the right may have been lost by lapse of time does not change the rule except in unusual cases, such as a want of notice, which is not alleged to have been the fact here (4 Cal. Jur., Certiorari, § 27, p. 1055). In view of the foregoing we are satisfied that as to this order the writ should be discharged.

It is accordingly ordered that the writ be discharged as to the order purporting to grant relief under section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and it appearing that the order approving the claim in question was not in excess of the jurisdiction of respondent court the same is affirmed.

SAME v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND et al. (R. C. STORRIE & CO., Interveners).

SAME v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND et al.

R. C. STORRIE & CO. v. ÆTNA CASUALTY & SURETY CO. et al.
Civ. 8207.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Aug. 3, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 2, 1933.

1. Contracts ⇨319(1).

Contractor prevented from performing contract by other party's failure to furnish materials as agreed may treat contract as rescinded and recover on quantum meruit, keep contract alive, offer complete performance, and sue for damages, or treat repudiation as terminating contract and sue for lost profits.

2. Contracts ⇨303(4).

Subcontractor's mere knowledge that general contractor intended to complete only part of work during year did not modify latter's contractual obligation to furnish subcontractor materials for completion of job in that year.

3. Contracts ⇨323(1).

Whether subcontractor, to whom general contractor agreed to furnish materials, intended to proceed after exhaustion thereof, if additional materials were furnished, held for jury.

4. Contracts ⇨322(3).

Evidence held to support jury's implied finding that subcontractor, to whom general contractor agreed to furnish materials, intended to proceed after exhaustion thereof if additional materials were furnished.

5. Contracts ⇨323(1).

Whether subcontractor was prepared to proceed further after exhaustion of materials furnished by general contractor and sufficient materials were reasonably available to proceed held for jury on substantially conflicting evidence.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Jury's verdict is conclusive on appeal as to question on which evidence was conflicting.

7. Damages ⇨124(2).

Whether contractor, prevented from performing contract, may recover more than contract price as reasonable value of work done, depends on whether it is equitable to permit him to do so.

8. Contracts ⇨274.

Rescinded contract ceases to exist for all purposes, including breach thereof (Civ. Code, § 1688).

9. Damages ⇨124(2).

Party terminating contract by preventing performance by other party cannot limit latter's recovery on quantum meruit to contract price.

10. Contracts ⇨236.

Parties' agreement to shift contractual obligation from one to other may be expressed or implied from their conduct (Civ. Code, § 1621).

11. Contracts ⇨247.

Evidence held to justify jury's finding that hydroelectric project contractor, letting subcontract for construction of dam, impliedly agreed to assume subcontractor's contractual obligation to excavate cut-off trench and operate air compressors.

12. Appeal and error ⇨930(1).

Appellate court must assume in support of verdict, including in damages awarded subcontractor increased cost due to general contractor's delay in performing work required of subcontractor by original contract, that jury found that general contractor assumed such obligations, where evidence justified such finding.

13. Election of remedies ⇨1.

Doctrine of "election of remedies" is based on plaintiff's estoppel to pursue one remedy after adopting another, if defendant is prejudiced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Election," see Words & Phrases.]

14. Estoppel ⇨68(2).

Subcontractor, quitting work on general contractor's failure to supply materials as agreed, held not estopped by filing of mechanic's lien suit to treat contract as rescinded and sue general contractor on quantum meruit.

15. Trial ⇨349(2).

Submission of special interrogatories to jury is within discretion of trial court.

16. Work and labor ⇨27(1).

Testimony as to yardage in drainage trench in excess of engineer's estimate held admissible in action on quantum meruit by subcontractor rescinding contract; engineer's estimate being no longer conclusive.

17. Pleading ⇨237(6).

Amendment of subcontractor's complaint in suit to foreclose mechanic's lien and recover money judgment against general contractor to conform to proof of rescission of contract held proper; general contractor not being prejudiced by allegations of amendment without evidentiary support.

18. Damages ⇨124(2).

Subcontractor rescinding contract because of general contractor's failure to furnish materials as agreed held entitled to recover reasonable value of work done, not merely agreed price, from sureties on contractor's bond (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

19. Mechanics' liens ⇨163.

Rescinded contract cannot be made basis for proving agreed price under statute limiting amount of mechanic's lien to reasonable value of labor or materials or agreed price (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Consolidated actions by H. H. Boomer against Robert B. Muir and another, the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland and others, in which R. C. Storrie & Co. intervened, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland and others, and by R. C. Storrie & Co. against the Aetna Casualty & Surety Company and another. From an order granting defendants Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland and others a new trial after a verdict against them, plaintiff Boomer appeals, and, from a judgment for defendants Boomer and the Aetna & Casualty Insurance Company, a judgment for plaintiff Boomer, and an order allowing him to amend his complaint in the first action, R. C. Storrie & Co. and defendants Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland and others appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

R. C. Storrie & Co., a copartnership composed of Robert B. Muir and Robert C. Storrie, had a general contract with the Feather River Power Company to build a hydroelectric project in the high mountains on certain tributaries of the north fork of the Feather river. The project was one of great magnitude, and under their contract Storrie & Co. were to receive a flat price of $7,691,889. In connection with this contract Storrie & Co. furnished a labor and materialmen's bond in the sum of $3,850,000 with Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, Globe Indemnity Company, Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, Maryland Casualty Company, and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as sureties on such bond. Hereafter these companies will be referred to as Storrie's sureties.

The project involved, as one item, the construction of a storage dam in Buck's Valley to impound the waters of Buck's creek. Under the specifications this dam was to be a rock fill dam with a gravity concrete section in its central part immediately over the bed of Buck's creek. The upstream toe of the dam was to be buttressed against a concrete cut-off wall extending below the surface to a depth to be prescribed by the engineers of the Feather River Power Company and the upstream face of the dam was to be covered by a series of concrete slabs resting at the bottom upon the cut-off wall as a base.

On May 28, 1926, Storrie & Co. entered into a subcontract with H. H. Boomer for the construction by him of the Buck's creek dam, the work to be done in accordance with the plans and specifications of the Feather River Power Company and to the satisfaction of that company's engineer. Under this subcontract Storrie & Co. were to deliver at the dam site to Boomer all cement, gravel, sand, steel and other metal work which was to be a permanent part of the dam. Boomer was to furnish all other materials and labor and equipment. Certain air compressors then being installed were to be delivered to Boomer and operated at his expense. Boomer was to pay for the electric power used by him at actual cost as metered by Storrie & Co. Boomer agreed to purchase certain equipment from Storrie & Co. and to assume all the benefits and obligations of Storrie & Co. under a contract which Storrie & Co. had with one Anderson to operate cook houses, commissaries, and camp buildings.

It was further agreed that work was to commence immediately and be completed on or before December 1, 1927. Boomer was to be paid for his work according to an agreed schedule of unit prices for quantities which were to be estimated by the engineers of the Feather River Power Company, such estimates to be made monthly for work completed during the previous month. On the basis of such estimates Storrie & Co. were to pay Boomer monthly 90 per cent. of the estimate, the remaining 10 per cent. to be paid upon the completion of the contract. Storrie & Co. were to complete the excavation for the concrete gravity section of the dam, but Boomer was to make the excavation for the cut-off wall.

Boomer furnished a performance bond in the sum of $333,334 upon which the Aetna Casualty & Surety Company was the surety.

When Boomer commenced performance of his subcontract, almost immediately friction developed between Boomer and Storrie & Co., and such friction and disputes continued as long as Boomer remained on the job. A discussion of the nature and character of these disputes will be deferred to a later portion of this opinion. Suffice it to say here that, when Boomer shut down for the winter at the end of 1926, a much smaller portion of the work had been done by him than the parties had anticipated at the inception of their contract. In a mutual effort to speed up the work in 1927, Boomer and Storrie & Co. entered into a supplemental agreement on March 4, 1927, whereby the original contract between them was considerably modified. By this supplemental agreement it was provided that Boomer should open up the work not later than April 1, 1927, and that commencing with May, 1927, Boomer should place not less than 40,000 cubic yards of material each month until the completion of the dam. Storrie & Co. agreed to pay Boomer all of the 10 per cent. estimates previously retained under their original contract with Boomer. The unit prices for loose rock fill were materially increased; it being recited that such increase should be construed as covering any cost Boomer had theretofore or might thereafter incur for stripping quarries, transportation of rock, and developing new quarries. Storrie & Co. waived their right to retain 10 per cent. of the monthly estimates, but after May 1, 1927, if during any month 40,000 cubic yards of loose rock should not be placed in the dam, the 10 per cent. for such month was to be retained by Storrie & Co. until completion. Except as modified by the supplemental agreement, it was agreed that the original agreement should remain in full force and effect. Other provisions of the supplemental agreement will be mentioned in connection with the discussion of specific points urged on the appeals herein.

Boomer proceeded with the work on the dam in 1927, and the disputes between Boomer and Storrie & Co. continued much as before, culminating with Boomer's leaving the job uncompleted in December, 1927.

Boomer originally commenced an action in Plumas county to foreclose a lien against the owners of the property (who have since ceased to be parties) and for a money judgment against the partners composing Storrie & Co. Later he commenced an action against Storrie's sureties upon their bond in which Storrie & Co. intervened. Storrie & Co. also commenced an action against Boomer and Boomer's surety, Aetna Casualty & Surety Company. These suits were ultimately combined for trial and tried before a jury in San Francisco. Boomer's actions contained inconsistent counts; one of them being upon a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the work done less the payments received. This count proceeded upon the theory of rescission of the contract on the ground that performance had been prevented by Storrie & Co.'s failure to deliver materials as required by the contract. During the course of the trial, upon motion of Storrie & Co. and Storrie's sureties, the court compelled Boomer to elect the theory upon which he should proceed. Boomer elected to proceed upon the theory of rescission for prevention of performance. The jury brought in a verdict against Storrie & Co., and Storrie's sureties for $257,965.06. The court denied Storrie & Co. a new trial, but granted a new trial to Storrie's sureties. Boomer has appealed from the order granting Storrie's sureties a new trial. Storrie & Co. have appealed from the judgment in favor of Boomer and Boomer's surety, Aetna Casualty & Surety Company, in the action brought by Storrie & Co. against them. Storrie & Co. and Storrie's sureties have appealed from the judgment against them and in Boomer's favor for $257,965.06. Storrie & Co. have likewise appealed from an order of the court made after judgment was entered allowing Boomer to amend his complaint against them in the action which was originally commenced to foreclose a mechanic's lien.

In a consideration of the appeal of Storrie & Co., and Storrie's sureties from the money judgment against them, it will be necessary to state in considerable detail the facts which were developed upon the trial. We have said that the disputes between Boomer and Storrie & Co. were practically continuous throughout the time Boomer was on the job. These disputes fell into four principal classes: (1) Disputes concerning compressed air; (2) disputes concerning the cut-off trench; (3) disputes concerning material deliveries by Storrie & Co.; and (4) disputes concerning roads and quarries.

Concerning the compressed air, Boomer testified that, when the original contract was entered into, he had not seen the air compressors which were to be installed, and that he had never attempted to operate steam shovels with compressed air, but that Muir assured him that the compressors would be adequate to operate his steam shovels. The compressors did not furnish sufficient air to operate the shovels, and Boomer was compelled to operate them with steam. Although the contract provided that Boomer should take over the operation of the compressors, he never did so, and at all times they were operated by Storrie & Co. During the greater part of the time that Boomer was on the job, Storrie & Co. were diverting some air to other parts of the work. In June, 1927, both compressors were destroyed by fire. Storrie & Co. installed a smaller compressor and removed the burned compressors to San Francisco and had them repaired. The burned compressors were not both returned for something like sixty days. During this time Boomer repeatedly complained to Storrie & Co. about the delay in restoring the compressors, and upon the trial he testified that by reason of the lack of air in July and August his operations were slowed up approximately one-half.

The contract required Boomer to excavate for the cut-off trench. Storrie & Co., however, actually did all of this excavating, and Boomer at no time took it over. Boomer testified that, when he went on the job, he wished to take over this excavation, but Storrie & Co. would not allow it. During the entire course of his operations Boomer was making demands upon Storrie & Co. to proceed more expeditiously with these excavations, claiming that he was being retarded in his other work by Storrie & Co.'s failure to make the excavations for the cut-off trench rapidly enough. Upon the trial there was substantial evidence that delays in excavation for the cut-off trench both delayed Boomer's operations and made them more expensive.

When Boomer entered into his contract, one quarry was stripped. This later proved inadequate, and Boomer was compelled to open other quarries and build roads to them. Boomer claimed extra compensation for this work, and the supplemental agreement purported to settle this claim, at least so far as the quarries were concerned, by increasing certain of the unit prices.

While he was on the job, Boomer repeatedly complained to Storrie & Co. about delays in furnishing materials and for several months before December, 1927, he informed them that if the materials were not supplied as needed, he would quit the job and hold Storrie & Co. responsible. There is testimony which would support a finding that Storrie &

Co. did not furnish materials as rapidly as Boomer needed them, and that this slowed up Boomer's progress and increased his cost. On December 3, 1927, Boomer finished pouring the third slab on the inner face of the dam. At that time all that remained to be done was to pour the fourth slab and complete the superstructure of the dam. It was Boomer's testimony that at that time there were not sufficient materials on hand to complete or proceed further with the work; that he waited until December 15, 1927, and, no further materials having been supplied to him, he moved off the job and never returned.

[1] It is well settled in California that a contractor who is prevented from performing his contract by the failure of the other party to furnish materials has a choice of three remedies: He may treat the contract as rescinded and recover upon a quantum meruit so far as he has performed; he may keep the contract alive, offering complete performance, and sue for damages for delay and expense incurred; or he may treat the repudiation as putting an end to the contract for purposes of performance and sue for the profits he would have realized. McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 85 P. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. Storrie & Co. and Storrie's sureties admit this rule, but claim that the evidence will not support a finding that Boomer was prevented from performance by Storrie & Co.'s failure to furnish materials. They argue that Boomer did not intend to go any further than the pouring of the third tier, and that Storrie & Co. knew this. Boomer testified that he was prepared to complete the contract if the materials had been furnished, and that he waited on the job from December 3d to December 15th for that purpose. On November 27, 1927, Boomer sent the following wire to Storrie & Co.: "I am prepared to complete my contract on time. Ran out of material last night. Do you want me to hold crew here to put through the three unfinished slabs of the third section? This extra cost must be paid by you. I await your answer today."

Boomer also on cross-examination testified that in November, 1927, he came to the conclusion that they were not going beyond the third slab that year, that he was so informed by engineers on the job, and also possibly by Storrie.

[2] From this evidence it is argued that Boomer had no intention of completing the job, and Storrie & Co. knew this. However, the jury was not bound to find that Boomer ever agreed to a modification of the contract so as to provide only for the completion of the third slab in 1927. His mere knowledge that Storrie & Co. intended to go no further that year, if that was the fact, would not modify their obligation under the contract to furnish the materials for completion in that year. In his wire of November 27 he explicitly stated: "I am prepared to complete my contract on time." He was entitled under the law to quit the job at that time for failure to supply materials, and his further language: "Do you want me to hold crew here to put through the three unfinished slabs of the third section? This cost must be paid by you," might reasonably have reference to the fact that that was the immediate unfinished work and that he was prepared to leave at that point unless materials were furnished at once. Whether or not this amounted to an expression of intention not to proceed beyond that point was for the jury. Boomer did not say: "I will not go beyond the third section." In effect he said: "Unless you furnish materials at once I will quit with the third section unfinished." He had previously more than once told Storrie & Co. that he would finish if they furnished the materials, but, if they did not, he would quit. On September 17, 1927, Boomer wrote Storrie & Co.: "We have notified you many times that we are out of cement more or less constantly and we want to call your attention to the fact that we expect to finish our work here on time this year."

[3,4] The court instructed the jury: "If you find from the evidence in this case, that Boomer did not intend to use any materials that might have been furnished after he had completed the pouring of the third slab in December, 1927, and Storrie & Company were aware that if such materials were furnished they would not be used, then there was no obligation upon Storrie & Company's part to furnish such materials at that time, or until they were advised by Boomer that such materials would be needed."

Under this instruction the jury must have found that Boomer intended to proceed if materials were furnished. We are satisfied that under the evidence this was a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and that their implied finding on this point is not without substantial support in the evidence.

[5] It is also argued that Boomer was not prepared to proceed further under winter conditions which then existed, and that sufficient materials were actually reasonably available to proceed had Boomer desired. On both these questions we have examined the record and are satisfied that as to both there was a substantial conflict in the evidence.

[6] The jury was fairly instructed on the question of prevention of performance, no complaint is made of such instructions on this appeal, and the case is the familiar one of a conflict in the evidence on this point as to which the jury's verdict is conclusive on appeal.

[7] It is further urged that, "assuming that prevention of performance was shown, the contractor may not, where the contract has been fully liquidated up to a given stage, reopen the part of the contract which has been fully executed on both sides and seek to have his past work revalued." In this connection it is pointed out that, at the time Boomer left the job in December, 1927, the monthly estimates provided for in the contract had been made up to November 25, 1927, and Boomer had been paid in full for all work covered by these estimates, with the exception of the retained percentage of 10 per cent. for three months after May, 1927, in which months Boomer had not placed 40,000 cubic yards of material in the dam as provided in the supplemental agreement. It is conceded that the general rule, and the one followed in California, is that, where a contract has been rescinded for prevention of performance, the plaintiff may recover the reasonable value of what he has done or supplied under the contract, even though such recovery may exceed the contract price. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 P. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; San Francisco Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton L. & I. Co., 119 Cal. 272, 51 P. 335; Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agr. Corp., 60 Cal. App. 516, 213 P. 529. It is insisted, however, that this general rule does not apply in cases where specific payment is provided in the contract for specific portions of the work, and such portions have been fully performed and payment for which has been fully ascertained and liquidated prior to the breach by the adverse party. In support of this contention are cited Rodemer v. Gonder, 9 Gill (Md.) 288; Doolittle v. McCullough, 12 Ohio St. 360; Wellston Coal Co. v. Franklin Paper Co., 57 Ohio St. 182, 48 N. E. 888; City of Philadelphia v. Tripple, 230 Pa. 481, 79 A. 703; and Farnum v. Kennebec Water Dist. (C. C. A.) 170 F. 173. To these cases might be added 2 Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) § 665b, p. 1319; 3 Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) § 713, pp. 2690, 2691; Keener on Quasi-Contracts, pp. 312, 313; and the Restatement of the Law of Contracts, § 351. The statements of these text-writers, and we may assume section 351 of the Restatement of the Law of Contracts, are based upon the doctrine of those of the above-cited cases which squarely apply the doctrine contended for. Of these there are only three, the Rodemer Case, the Doolittle Case, and the Farnum Case. The other two cases, while referring to the rule, held that under the facts involved it was not applicable.

The Rodemer Case was one wherein plaintiff had a contract for grading a railroad payable on monthly estimates of quantities as the work progressed, four-fifths immediately and the balance on completion of the work. Estimates and four-fifth payments were made to October 29, 1845, and on November 6, 1845, defendant expelled plaintiff from the work. Plaintiff sued for the reasonable value of all the work done. The court held that as to those portions of the work as to which the monthly estimates had been made the plaintiff could only recover the balance due upon these settlements, and could not reopen and revalue them upon a quantum meruit. The court said, in part: "He is concluded by these settlements, and by reason of their being closed as distinct and separate portions of the contract, he cannot open them again to prove and recover the actual value of his work. His claim has in fact been liquidated upon the quantity of work done and the value ascertained by the prices in the contract, and he is effectually barred by adopting the adjustments and receiving payments under them. The partial payments bind him to the whole settlement. And so far as the work has been ascertained and adjusted under the contract, he is entitled to recover only the balance upon the basis of these settlements, whatever may remain in arrear including the twenty per cent."

The Doolittle Case was also a railroad construction case at unit prices, with installment payments on the basis of such unit prices. Defendants wrongfully terminated the contract after part performance. Said the court, at page 368 of 12 Ohio St.: "It is certain that where there has been a part performance, and that part paid for, under the contract, according to its terms, and the contract has then been terminated wrongfully, by the party so having paid, it cannot be that the termination of the contract occasions damage or gives any right of action to the other party in regard to the part so performed and paid for under the contract."

The Farnum Case, while it may be taken as supporting the same rule, is weakened as an authority on the point by the fact that it was decided under the law of Maine, and Maine is one of the states holding to the minority view, which is not the law in California, that upon rescission for prevention of performance the recovery in quantum meruit cannot exceed the contract rates. If in no event can the recovery exceed the contract rates, then it plainly cannot exceed that price when the price for the work done has been ascertained and liquidated.

The Wellston Coal Co. Case was one decided in Ohio. It cited the Doolittle Case with apparent approval, but distinguished it on its facts. In that case plaintiff had a contract with defendant for the sale of coal to defendant for one year at an uniform price per ton. The price of coal varied with the season. Defendant took coal from plaintiff under the contract, and paid at the contract rate during the portion of the year when the contract price was lower than the market price and repudiated the contract when the market price fell below the contract price. The court said, at pages 889, 890 of 48 N. E., 57 Ohio St. 182:

"The general rule is that, when full performance of a contract has been prevented by the wrongful act of the defendant, the plaintiff has the right either to sue for damages, or he may disregard the contract, and sue as upon a quantum meruit for what he has performed. The plaintiff has pursued the latter course; and it seems well settled, both in reason and authority, that he had the right to do so. 2 Sedg. Meas. Dam. (8th Ed.) 654; Chamberlin v. Scott, 33 Vt. 80; McCullough v. Baker, 47 Mo. 401; Kearney v. Doyle, 22 Mich. 294; Buffkin v. Baird, 73 N. C. 283; U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 S. Ct. 81 [28 L. Ed. 168]; Merrill v. Railroad Co., 16 Wend. [N. Y.] 586 [30 Am. Dec. 130]; Clark v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 4 N. Y. 338 [53 Am. Dec. 379].

"But it is claimed, on the authority of Doolittle v. McCullough, 12 Ohio St. 360, that the contract price must still be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery. There are many expressions in the opinion in that case that seem to support this view, and much of the reasoning is to the same effect. But all that is there said must be taken as said with reference to the facts of that case. The rule there stated may be regarded as a proper one in a case where, as in that case, it appears from the claim of the plaintiff that the breach of the contract by the defendant worked no loss, but a benefit to him, on the ground, as appears, that, had he been required to complete the work, he would have suffered a much greater loss; for, if the least inexpensive part of the work could not have been done without loss, it follows that the doing of the remaining part, under the contract, would have resulted in a still greater loss. The action upon a quantum meruit is of equitable origin, and is still governed by considerations of natural justice. Hence, when one has performed labor or furnished material under a contract that is wrongfully terminated by the other party before completion, the question arises whether the party not in fault should be confined to the contract for what he did, or to a quantum meruit; and this must depend upon whether the act of the other party in terminating the contract works a loss or not to him, regard being had to the contract. If it works no loss, but is in fact a benefit, as in the case of Doolittle v. McCullough, there are no considerations of justice requiring that he should be compensated in a greater sum for what he did than is stipulated in the contract. These considerations exercised a controlling influence in the case just referred to. The plaintiff had a contract with the defendant for the making of certain excavations in the construction of a railroad. He was to receive for the entire work 11 cents per cubic yard. He had performed the least inexpensive part of the work when the contract was wrongfully terminated by the defendant; and on this part, by his own showing, he had suffered a loss. The proof showed that the performance of the remainder, being hardpan, would have cost him a great deal more. It was then evident, as the court observed, that he had sustained no loss, but a benefit, from the termination of the contract by the defendant. But in the case before us the facts are very different. They are in fact just the reverse. The contract was for the delivery of coal at a price generally received during the dulllest season of the whole year. The defendant received the coal during the season when the market was above the contract price. He had the benefit of the difference between the market and the contract price; but when the dull season arrived, and the advantages of the contract would accrue to the plaintiff, the defendant repudiated it. The difference between the two cases is thus apparent. In the case before us, justice and fair dealing require that the defendant, having repudiated the contract, should pay the market price for the coal at the time it was delivered. In the former case, as the repudiation of the contract by the defendant did not enrich him to the loss of the plaintiff, there were no considerations of justice on which the plaintiff could claim more than the contract price for what he had done under the contract. The object in allowing a recovery of this kind is not to better the condition of the plaintiff under the contract, were it performed, but to save him from a loss resulting from its wrongful termination by the defendant, or, in more general words, to prevent the defendant from enriching himself at the expense of the plaintiff by his own wrongful act. The real test in all cases of a plaintiff's right to recover as upon a quantum meruit for part performance of a contract, wrongfully terminated by the defendant, depends upon the consideration whether the defendant is thereby enriched at the loss and expense of the plaintiff. If so, then the law adds a legal to the moral obligation, and enforces it."

As thus limited, the question whether plaintiff can recover in excess of the contract price depends upon whether it is equitable to permit him to do so in the particular case.

City of Philadelphia v. Tripple, a Pennsylvania case, discussed the Doolittle Case and distinguished it, but cannot in our judgment be said to have expressed approval of it. Rather the reasoning of that case may fairly be said to be opposed to the reasoning of the Doolittle Case as explained in the Wellston Case. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court in that case adopted as its opinion the report of the referee. The claim was made, as in the Doolittle Case, that to permit the plaintiff to recover on a quantum meruit in excess of the contract rates would allow him to make a profit where, if he had fully performed the contract, he would have suffered a loss. The court said, however, at page 706 of 79 A., 230 Pa. 481:

"Even, however, if it be assumed that McMenamy, if allowed to complete his work, would have lost money in so doing, the referee is of opinion that the act of the defendant Dietrich, in discharging the plaintiff from further obligation to perform, gave rise to a right on the part of the plaintiff to recover for his disbursements. Let it be assumed that, in an extreme case, a builder has actually expended in the course of his work a sum in excess of the contract price and has not yet completed performance. If, under such circumstances, the builder finishes his work, the owner, upon paying the contract price, will receive the benefit of a large expenditure actually made, in return for the payment of a smaller sum of money. This result, which may well involve a hardship upon the builder, is made necessary by a proper regard for the contractual rights of the owner. The owner has made a valid contract, and this contract must be protected and enforced, even if the builder suffers.

"Let it further be supposed, however, that the owner, who finds himself in this position of advantage, voluntarily puts an end to his contract rights in the premises. This in legal effect he does if he himself breaks the contract or discharges the builder from his obligation to perform it. The situation which then presents itself is one in which the builder has in good faith expended money in the course of work done for the benefit of the owner, and has, in the absence of contract, an equitable claim to be reimbursed. The owner, on the other hand, has deprived himself of the legal right which would have sufficed to defeat the equity. He accordingly stands defenseless in the presence of the builder's claim.

"Such, it is submitted, is the legal analysis of the situation in which the parties to this action find themselves. It may, of course, be contended that Dietrich did not receive an actual benefit coextensive with McMenamy's expenditure. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to observe that (upon the facts as heretofore found) McMenamy expended the money in good faith and in the course of attempted performance. This is sufficient to give him an equitable claim for reimbursement.

"The defendants do not dispute the general proposition that a plaintiff may, as if in the absence of contract, recover the cost of work and materials in case he is prevented by the owner from finishing his work. The defendants earnestly contend, however, that the rule meets with an exception in case the disbursements exceed the contract price. In other words, they regard the difference between the price specified in the contract and the sum of the disbursements as the measure of recovery, and they insist that if the aggregate of disbursements equals or exceeds the contract price there can be no recovery at all.

"This view, as is indicated by the analysis made above, appears to the referee to involve a confusion of thought. How can the plain-tiff's claim for disbursements actually made be met by the limitation contained in a contract, unless the defendant retains the right to enforce the contract? And how can it be contended that the defendant retains such a right when the contract has been discharged by his own act? It may well be that a plaintiff, upon defendant's breach, may offer the discharged contract as evidence of the value of that for which he is seeking recovery. The plaintiff in such a case has not broken the contract; he may fairly contend that its terms are at least an admission by the defendant which the jury should take into consideration."

It will thus be seen from this examination of the cases relied on by Storrie & Co. and Storrie's sureties that in only three of them is the rule contended for by them actually applied, and in only two, the Rodemer Case and the Doolittle Case, was the application of the rule necessary to the decision; since under the law of Maine the recovery would have been limited to the contract rates in the Farnum Case in any event.

[8, 9] We are not impressed by the rule announced in these two cases. It being settled as the general rule that upon prevention of performance the injured plaintiff may treat the contract as rescinded and recover upon a quantum meruit without regard to the contract price, why should he be limited to the contract price in case payments for portions of the entire contract have been made or liquidated? Those payments were received in full only on condition that the entire contract be performed. But, if the contract is rescinded, the prices fixed by the contract are also rescinded. As aptly said by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in the passage quoted supra from City of Philadelphia v. Triple: "Where the defendant undertakes to limit the plaintiff's recovery by treating the contract price as a limitation upon such recovery, he is asserting a right under the very contract which he himself has discharged."

To hold that payments under the contract may limit recovery where the contract is afterwards rescinded through the defendant's fault seems to us to involve a confusion of thought. A rescinded contract ceases to exist for all purposes. How then can it be looked to for one purpose, the purpose of fixing the amount of recovery? "A contract is extinguished by its rescission." Civ. Code, § 1688. "Generally speaking, the effect of rescission is to extinguish the contract. The contract is annihilated so effectually that in contemplation of law it has never had any existence, even for the purpose of being broken." 6 R. C. L. p. 942; Dyer Bros. Golden West Iron Works v. Central Iron Works, 72 Cal. App. 202, 209, 237 P. 386; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25. In Clark v. Manchester, 51 N. H. 594, a case wherein payments for a portion of the services had been made according to the contract, the court said: "The contract being entire, the defendants cannot break one part of it and still insist upon the performance of the other part. When the defendants rescinded the contract, they put it out of their power to enforce it upon the other party, but the other party may consider it as rescinded and claim pay just as though it had never existed."

In Steele v. Formilli, 38 Cal. App. 194, 175 P. 806, where a building contract was breached by the owner and the contract provided for an estimate of the work done and materials furnished every three weeks and the payment of 75 per cent. of the value thereof upon such estimates, a recovery was had on quantum meruit for all the work done. The court said at pages 195, 196 of 38 Cal. App., 175 P. 806: "The principal point made by the appellant is that the work done and materials furnished during each three weeks constituted, under the terms of the contract, a separate contract, and the settlements made at the end of the three-week periods became accounts stated. This same point is presented in several ways, but the effect is the same. The point is not new. It has been expressly held that the contract provision in question does not operate to make the contract separable, but is a means provided by the contracting parties for estimating the amounts of the progress payments."

In this case the Rodemer Case was cited to the court, and it refused to follow it.

In Woodward on Quasi-Contracts, § 269, the author has this to say of the Rodemer and Doolittle Cases: "This rule is doubtless a sound one when applied to an agreement which is severable in the sense that it really constitutes two or more separate contracts. But the propriety of its application to cases like Rodemer v. [Gonder &] Hazelhurst and Doolittle v. McCullough is at least questionable. Payments pro tanto in such cases are not received in extinguishment of the defendant's liability; or, at most, the extinguishment is subject to the condition that the contractor be allowed to complete the job and receive compensation, at the contract rate, for the whole of it. This is very clearly pointed out in a New Hampshire case, Clark v. Manchester (1872) 51 N. H. 594."

In Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation, 60 Cal. App. 516, at pages 532, 533, 213 P. 529, 536, the court quoted from Williston on Contracts, § 1459: "More frequently, however, the plaintiff is allowed to recover the real value of the services, though in excess of the contract price. The later rule seems more in accordance with the theory on which the right of action must be based—that the contract is treated as rescinded." The author adds: "and the plaintiff restored to his original position as nearly as possible."

We conclude that the rule of the Rodemer and Doolittle Cases is illogical and not supported by reason; that a contract rescinded is no longer in existence for any purpose; that the defendant, by his own wrong having put an end to the contract, cannot insist on its terms to limit the recovery, even though part payments have been made for part performance because the payments are received as satisfaction only on condition that the entire contract be performed according to its terms; but that, the contract having been rescinded through defendant's fault, he should place the plaintiff as nearly as possible in statu quo by paying the reasonable value of plaintiff's performance.

Storrie & Co. and Storrie's sureties say that to permit such recovery in this case is to allow Boomer to recover over $250,000, when if he had completed the contract, he would have received no more than $20,000. The answer to this is found in the language of City of Philadelphia v. Tripple, quoted supra:

"Let it be assumed that, in an extreme case, a builder has actually expended in the course of his work a sum in excess of the contract price and has not yet completed performance. If, under such circumstances, the builder finishes his work, the owner, upon paying the contract price, will receive the benefit of a large expenditure actually made, in return for the payment of a smaller sum of money.

"Let it further be supposed, however, that the owner, who finds himself in this position of advantage, voluntarily puts an end to his contract rights in the premises. * * * The situation which then presents itself is one in which the builder has in good faith expended money in the course of work done for the benefit of the owner, and has, in the absence of contract, an equitable claim to be reimbursed. The owner, on the other hand, has deprived himself of the legal right which would have sufficed to defeat the equity. He accordingly stands defenseless in the presence of the builder's claim."

Even if it were true, then, that Boomer would only have received an additional $20,000 for the completion of his contract, we are of the opinion that that does not prevent him from recovering the reasonable value of his services upon its rescission for Storrie & Co.'s breach. But Boomer points out that he had large claims for damages against Storrie & Co. for continued delays and increased expense of operation due to their misconduct. If this is so, it would furnish an additional reason for disregarding the rule of the Rodemer and Doolittle Cases even if we felt disposed to follow them. It was stated in the Wellston Case that the rule of the Doolittle Case should only be applied where it was equitable to do so. Upon the rescission of the contract, it ceased to exist for all purposes, including the purpose of relying upon its terms for the purpose of recovering damages for any breach. 13 C. J. p. 623, § 684. If Boomer had valid claims for damages arising under the contract by reason of the fact that his cost of operation had been wrongfully increased, it would seem inequitable to limit him to the recovery of the contract price upon a rescission for Storrie & Co.'s failure of performance.

[10] The jury might well have found that Boomer's cost of operation had been substantially increased by Storrie & Co.'s continuing breaches. There is substantial evidence that Boomer suffered delays and increased costs by Storrie & Co.'s failure to deliver materials to the job as rapidly as required. There is evidence that Boomer's costs were considerably increased by failure of Storrie & Co. to excavate the cut-off trench as rapidly as should have been done. There is evidence that the diversion of air from the compressors to other portions of the work and the delay in restoring the burned air compressors hampered Boomer and increased his costs. As to the latter items of cut-off trench excavation and operation of the air compressors, Storrie & Co. points out that under the contract the cut-off trench should have been excavated by Boomer and the air compressors operated by him. The court instructed the jury as follows: "The obligations of the parties under the contract were not changed by the fact that in carrying out the work one party may have from time to time done and performed part of the work which the agreement contemplated should be performed by the other party, unless you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the parties agreed that the obligation should be shifted. Mere performance of an act by one party for the benefit of the other, or acquiescence by one party in the performance by another, would not operate to shift the contractual obligation as to performance."

No complaint is made of this instruction, and the record does not show at whose request it was given. We may therefore assume that it was requested by Storrie & Co. Under this instruction, the jury could find that the parties agreed that these obligations should be shifted if there was substantial evidence to support such finding. Such an agreement might be express or implied from the conduct of the parties. "An implied contract is one, the existence and terms of which are manifested by conduct." Civ. Code, § 1621; Williston on Contracts, vol. 1, § 3; 6 Cal. Jur. p. 20, § 7; 13 C. J. pp. 241-243, § 8.

[11] As to the cut-off trench, Boomer testified that Storrie & Co. in 1926 refused to let him take over its excavation. It is true, as pointed out by Storrie & Co., that the supplemental agreement of 1927 provided that Storrie & Co. should continue the work required of Boomer under the original contract until Boomer should notify Storrie & Co. that he was prepared to resume work on the scale contemplated by the supplemental agreement,

But this referred to all the work as a whole, not to the cut-off trench alone. Boomer resumed the rest of the work, and Storrie & Co. continued to excavate the cut-off trench. Boomer constantly complained to Storrie & Co. about their delays in such excavation, and Storrie & Co. at no time replied that the obligation was Boomer's, or in fact made any reply. Upon these facts the jury would be justified in finding that Storrie & Co. impliedly agreed to assume the obligation of excavating the cut-off trench. The same is true of the operation of the air compressors. Boomer frequently complained of the diversion of air to other parts of the work, and, after the compressors were burned, insistently demanded that they be replaced promptly. Storrie & Co. did not suggest that Boomer take over their operation and assumed to have the burned compressors repaired and replaced. The jury could well find that Storrie & Co. impliedly agreed to assume these obligations.

That the jury must have so found is made clear by another instruction given to the jury: "In determining the reasonable value of work performed by Boomer prior to the termination of his contract, if you find that he was prevented from completing the same, this finding should be limited to the reasonable cost and expense of performing the work contemplated by said agreement, or extra work performed by him, if any, at the instance of Storrie & Company, under the conditions which actually existed at the time of performance, but the reasonable value so estimated does not and should not include any loss or damage suffered by Boomer as the result of his own failure to perform the whole or any part of his obligations, express or implied, under said agreement in a reasonably efficient manner, if you find that any loss or damage did result from such causes."

[12] Counsel for Storrie & Co. are at pains in their brief to demonstrate that in the amount awarded by the jury the items of increased cost due to delay in excavating the cut-off trench and the operation of the air compressors and the failure to replace the burned air compressors were included. If the jury did include these items we must assume in support of their verdict that they found that these obligations were not Boomer's, but had been assumed by Storrie & Co.

[13, 14] Storrie & Co. and Storrie's sureties insist that Boomer's election to rescind came too late, and that the right to treat the contract as rescinded was waived by the filing of the mechanic's lien suit in the first instance in which Boomer alleged the completion of his contract. They admit "the general rule in California that the plaintiff does not need to elect his course of action between contract and quantum meruit until the case is tried, and that a complaint may contain inconsistent counts." But they say: "The rule for which we contend is that a plaintiff cannot make his election at the time the alleged breaching occurs to stand on his contract as having been completed, and then later turn and say that it was not in fact completed." In support of this contention they cite no California cases. Boomer quit the job after a prevention of performance. He then had the right to pursue either of the three remedies mentioned in McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., supra, including the right to treat the contract as rescinded and sue on a quantum meruit. The doctrine of election of remedies is based upon the ground that, if the defendant is prejudiced thereby, plaintiff is estopped to pursue one remedy after having adopted another. Campanella v. Campanella, 204 Cal. 515, 521, 269 P. 433; Roulard v. Rosenberg Bros. & Co., 193 Cal. 360, 224 P. 449; Cullinan v. Mercantile Trust Co., 80 Cal. App. 377, 387, 252 P. 647; Mansfield v. Pickwick Stages, 191 Cal. 130, 215 P. 389. Storrie & Co. knew that Boomer had not completed his contract, but had quit after they failed to supply him with materials. They could not have been prejudiced in any way by the filing of the mechanic's lien suit so as to estop Boomer afterwards to treat the contract as rescinded and sue on a quantum meruit.

[15] Storrie & Co. asked the court to submit certain special interrogatories to the jury. This the court refused to do. The matter was one in the discretion of the court. Oberholzer v. Hubbell, 36 Cal. App. 16, 171 P. 436. We find no abuse of discretion in this regard.

[16] The witness Wapple was permitted to testify as to yardage in a drainage trench in excess of the engineer's estimates. The contract having been rescinded, the engineer's estimates were no longer conclusive, and the testimony was material to the reasonable value of the work.

On the whole case, without further discussing the evidence, we are satisfied that the money judgment finds ample support and should be affirmed. Having reached this conclusion, it necessarily follows that the judgment against Storrie & Co. in their action for damages against Boomer and his surety must likewise be affirmed.

[17] The amendment to conform to the proof from which Storrie & Co. have taken a separate appeal should likewise be affirmed. The case having been tried on the theory of rescission, it was proper to allow Boomer to amend the complaint in the mechanic's lien suit to state that theory. We cannot see how Storrie & Co. were prejudicially affected by the fact, if it be a fact, that some of the allegations of the amendment find no support in the evidence.

[18, 19] This leaves for consideration only the appeal from the order granting Storrie's sureties a new trial. The order granting the new trial was made on the single ground that under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure Storrie's sureties could not be held liable for any amount in excess of the price agreed upon between Storrie & Co. and Boomer. Section 1183 provides that: "Said several liens shall not in any case exceed in amount the reasonable value of the labor done or material furnished, or both, * * * nor the price agreed upon for the same between the claimant and the person by whom he was employed. * * *" It is the contention of Storrie's sureties that this language limits a recovery on the bond given by them under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the price agreed upon between Boomer and Storrie & Co., in view of the fact that the reasonable value exceeds the agreed price. If the contract had not been rescinded, this might well be true, although Boomer's counsel argue that the limitation applies only to an action to foreclose the lien and not to a recovery on the bond. But, the contract having been rescinded, is there any longer a price agreed upon between Boomer and Storrie & Co. within the meaning of the Code section? We have heretofore pointed out that a rescinded contract has no existence for any purpose. How then can it have an existence for the purpose of fixing a "price agreed upon"? If Boomer had undertaken the work originally at the request of Storrie & Co. without any contract as to price, he would be entitled to recover from Storrie & Co. the reasonable value, and, there being no agreed price, he would likewise be entitled to a lien for the reasonable value. But, having elected to rescind the contract, Boomer is in exactly the same position. He has done labor for which he is entitled to recover the reasonable value because there is no longer an agreed price. He is therefore entitled to recover the reasonable value, likewise, from Storrie's sureties. The words "price agreed upon" must refer to a legally enforceable "price agreed upon," and are intended to give the owner as favorable treatment as the contractor. To give them the effect contended for by Storrie's sureties would permit the owner to profit by the contractor's wrongful conduct at the expense of the materialman or mechanic. There are apparently no express authorities on the question of whether a rescinded contract can be held to establish a "price agreed upon" within the meaning of this Code section, but we are satisfied that a rescinded, i. e., nonexistent, contract cannot be made the basis of proving an agreed price for the purpose of this section any more than it can be so used between the parties to the contract themselves.

The money judgment in favor of Boomer is affirmed.

The judgment against Storrie & Co. in their action for damages against Boomer and Aetna Casualty & Surety Company is affirmed.

The order granting Boomer leave to file an amendment to the complaint to conform to the proof is affirmed.

The order granting a new trial to Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, Globe Indemnity Company, Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, Maryland Casualty Company, and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

T. Russo was convicted of murder in the first degree, and, from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

Affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Appellant was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and in accordance with the recommendation of the jury was sentenced to imprisonment for life in the state prison. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal, the main contention made being that the evidence at most establishes only the crime of manslaughter; that the verdict of first degree murder was the product of an undue prejudice created against him by certain evidence about which he admits no complaint was made during the trial, but which he now claims was inadmissible, and by the emphasis placed on such evidence by the district attorney in his argument to the jury; and he asks, therefore, that the judgment of conviction be modified by reducing the crime of which he was convicted to manslaughter or that said judgment be reversed and he be granted a new trial. The trial judge, after having given careful consideration to the same contention in hearing the motion for new trial, determined that the verdict of the jury should be allowed to stand, and from our examination of the entire record we find nothing therein to prove that the conclusion reached by the trial judge is not well founded.

The circumstances leading up to and immediately following the homicide were as follows: Russo, the appellant, and Taylor, the man appellant killed, were itinerant laborers working in the fruit industry in the vicinity of Brentwood, Contra Costa county. With several others, named Iesiello, Green, Garland, Haley, and Hall, they had been camping for two weeks or more in the railroad stock pens or corrals near the Brentwood Station. On Saturday, August 13, 1932, the day preceding the homicide, Russo, Iesiello, and Green purchased an old automobile, and the next morning, accompanied by Hall and Haley, started out in the machine intending to drive to a swimming pool. Taylor and Garland remained at the camp. Shortly before noon a man named Coatney called at the camp to see Green, but, finding him absent, stayed and visited Garland. Meanwhile, on the way to the swimming pool, an argument arose between the five men, and Haley and Hall quit the party; Haley returning to the camp. Upon entering the stock pen he took a coat belonging either to Russo or Iesiello from the fence and immediately departed, his whereabouts afterwards being unknown. About an hour later Russo, Iesiello, and Green returned. Coatney, Garland, and Taylor were there at the time, and Russo immediately started an altercation with Taylor about the missing coat; Taylor replying in substance that he had about all he could do "to look after his own stuff." At the same time Taylor took his own coat from the fence and placed it over his arm. Continuing the altercation, and advancing toward Taylor in a menacing attitude, Russo called Taylor the vilest kind of a name, and told him "to get the hell out of the camp"; that, if he did not do so he (Russo) would kick him out. As Russo continued to advance toward Taylor, the latter threw his coat to one side, and Russo immediately struck him. A fist fight followed, and soon after it started Iesiello ran up behind Taylor and struck him on the head with a bucket. Garland then interfered to drive Iesiello away, which started another encounter between the latter two. They fought their way out of the pen, and Iesiello, who was much the younger man, picked up a club and struck Garland with it. Russo and Taylor, continuing their fight, eventually grappled each other and fell to the ground; and at this juncture Russo commenced to stab and cut Taylor with a paring knife having a blade some four or more inches long, which, unknown to any of the parties present, Russo had picked up from the top of a box in the pen just as the fight started or during its progress. As soon as Taylor was stabbed, he quit fighting, and Russo jumped up, yelled something in a foreign language to Iesiello, both of whom were Sicilians, and ran toward the automobile, at the same time commanding Green to get in the automobile and bring with him a sack of provisions which was hanging in the pen. Immediately Iesiello stopped fighting with Garland and rushed to the automobile, and Russo, Iesiello, and Green drove away in it. Both Coatney and Garland realized that Taylor had been hurt, but did not know he had been stabbed; and Coatney left at once to summon medical aid. As soon as Coatney had gone, Taylor succeeded in getting up and staggered out of the stock pen. Garland went to his assistance, but Taylor dropped to the ground and died almost instantly. Garland then discovered that Taylor had been stabbed. In this connection the evidence shows that he was stabbed four times, once near the heart, once just below the ribs on the left side, again in the back on the left side near the kidneys, and in the left hip. The evidence further shows that the wound in the hip was not a clean cut, the knife having been thrust into the flesh and then "churned around," as one witness described it, cutting much of the flesh from the bone. Some four or five days later Russo was arrested in a camp in the river bottom near Turlock. Iesiello had disappeared. The circumstances showing the manner in which Taylor was killed were established by the testimony of Coatney, Garland, and Green. So far as the record shows, Russo made no statement at any time with reference to the killing, nor did he testify at the trial. Evidently he rested his case on the cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution.

[1] The distinction between murder and manslaughter is clearly pointed out by the Code sections, and the jury was fully instructed accordingly; that is to say, murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought (Pen. Code, § 187); while manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice (Pen. Code, § 192). And the Code sections proceed to declare that such malice may be express or implied, that it is express when there is manifested a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature, and that it is implied when no considerable provocation appears or when the circumstances attending the killing show an abandoned or malignant heart. Continuing, the Code sections declare that all murder which is perpetrated by means of poison, or lying in wait, torture, or any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which is committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate certain enumerated felonies, is murder of the first degree. Pen. Code, §§ 188 and 189. And it is well settled, that although the intent to kill must be the result of deliberate premeditation, and must be formed upon pre-existing reflection, there need be no appreciable space of time between the intention to kill and the act of killing; they may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind.

[2] It will be seen from the evidence hereinabove narrated, which is without any substantial conflict, that Russo was the aggressor; that, after starting the fight, he took an unfair advantage of his adversary by obtaining possession of and using a knife. Furthermore, it shows that Taylor was not armed with any instrument or weapon whatever, but was fighting fairly with his fists. In other words, there is nothing in the record indicating that Russo used the knife in self-defense or that he was in any danger of great bodily harm when he began to stab Taylor therewith. It is true, as appellant contends, that the unlawful killing of a human being, without malice, upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, is manslaughter and not murder. But in the present case the fact that appellant obtained possession of the knife at the beginning of the fight or during its progress, and stabbed Taylor three times in vital parts of the body, and the further fact that he used the knife in an unusually cruel manner in inflicting the fourth wound, together with the other circumstances above mentioned, showing that he started the fight with little or no provocation and carried it on by unfair means, were sufficient to justify the belief on the part of the jury that there was manifested a deliberate intention on his part unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature, and that the circumstances attending the killing showed an abandoned and malignant heart. It is beyond the power of this court, therefore, to interfere with its verdict finding appellant guilty of first degree murder.

[3-6] The evidence about which appellant complains as being inadmissible consists mainly of certain photographs, introduced by the prosecution, of Taylor's body, showing the location of the wounds inflicted by the knife, the testimony as to the vile name appellant called Taylor at the commencement of the altercation, and the testimony given by Green, Garland, and Coatney in redirect examination by the prosecution showing that previously Russo had engaged in unprovoked altercations with them and others in the camp, from which it would appear that he was possessed with a quarrelsome disposition. As already stated, appellant concedes that he made no objection whatever to such evidence during the trial. For that reason alone he is not entitled to complain about the matter on appeal; but, aside from such reason, it is at once apparent that there is no legal ground whatever upon which to base such complaint. The photographs were clearly admissible in evidence (People v. Magsaysay, 210 Cal. 301, 291 P. 582; People v. Gomez, 209 Cal. 293, 286 P. 998; People v. Ferlin, 203 Cal. 587, 265 P. 230; People v. Saenz, 50 Cal. App. 382, 195 P. 442), as was the declaration of the appellant made at the commencement of the fight tending to show hatred and malice toward the deceased; and the testimony as to previous quarrels was elicited from said witnesses on redirect examination only after appellant had gone into the matter on cross-examination in an effort to show an unfriendly feeling on the part of said witness toward appellant. Therefore, since such testimony was properly admitted, the district attorney was entitled to comment on the same in his argument to the jury. Nor is there any merit in the further contention that the witness Harrison was disqualified from testifying in connection with said photographs as to the appearance of the wounds on Taylor's body merely because he was in the employ of the district attorney's office as an investigator. His testimony was confined to a description of the wounds as he observed them, and was not given in the nature of expert testimony.

[7] Appellant complains also of the conduct of the district attorney in asking certain leading questions and in commenting in his argument to the jury on the nationality of appellant. No assignment of error was made thereof during the course of the trial, however, and consequently the matter is not open to review on appeal; moreover, we have found nothing in the conduct of the district attorney nor in his argument to the jury to warrant a reversal. The record shows that at all times the trial judge was alert in seeing that the trial was fairly conducted and that appellant was accorded all his legal rights; and from our examination of the case we cannot say that the verdict has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

WARNKE v. GRIFFITH CO. et al.

Civ. 7867.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

July 28, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 25,
1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1).

Instruction that linemen's helper, standing near pole in street being paved when struck by paving contractor's hired truck, was mere licensee as to such contractor, which was not required to provide him safe place to work, held not error prejudicial to him, even if he was invitee.

2. Negligence ⇨105.

Even invitee assumes obvious dangers on premises he is invited to enter.

3. Automobiles ⇨163(1).

Street paving contractor's liability for injuries to linemen's helper, struck by contractor's truck while standing near pole in street, held dependent on failure to exercise ordinary care, whether helper was mere licensee or invitee.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(58).

Instruction that linemen's helper, struck by street paving contractor's truck while standing near pole awaiting lineman's audible signal to lower fuse box, had right to assume that dangerous instrumentalities would not be thrust on him without warning, held properly refused.

Court instructed jury that workman is not required to exercise same diligence to avoid accidents while performing duties on premises as pedestrians using place merely for locomotion, and helper testified that trucks backed in every four or five minutes, that he was standing about 2½ feet from pole, watching lineman tying fuse box on hand line to see when he could lower it, without looking for trucks backing in, and was reaching for line after lineman hollowed for him to lower box when hit by truck.

5. Automobiles ⇨206.

Linemen's helper, standing near pole in street being paved, could not assume that he would not be injured by paving contractor's passing truck, but was required to keep such lookout therefor as ordinarily prudent person would have kept under similar circumstances.

6. Automobiles ⇨219.

Linemen's helper, struck by street paving contractor's truck while standing near pole in street, was bound to use greater care and look more vigilantly for trucks, if noise of concrete mixer affected his ability to hear them, than otherwise.

7. Negligence ⇨65.

While test of negligence is conduct of ordinarily prudent person under same or similar circumstances, amount of care required varies with differences in circumstances surrounding parties.

8. Negligence ⇨141(4).

Instruction that it was plaintiff's duty to exercise his faculties of sight and hearing to apprise himself of danger, and to use ordinary care at all times in exercising such senses, held not erroneous as instructing jury that it was his duty to exercise such senses at all times to apprise himself of danger.

9. Automobiles ⇨246(58).

Instruction that to look or listen carelessly is not to look or listen at all held warranted by evidence in action for injuries to one struck by truck.

10. Automobiles ⇨246(30).

Instruction that parties to personal injury suit assumed ordinary risks involved in being on and moving over ground where others were working held not erroneous as leading jury to believe that plaintiff assumed risks of defendants' negligence.

11. Automobiles ⇨246(30).

Instruction that linemen's helper, standing in rut behind backing truck, driver of which could not see him, assumed ordinary reasonable risks of dangers which were or should have been apparent to him, held not error, even if susceptible of construction as meaning that he assumed risk of truck driver's negligence in backing truck against him.

12. Automobiles ⇨246(30).

Instruction, in action for injuries to pedestrian struck by defendant's truck, that duty of each party to exercise ordinary care was equal, held not erroneous as informing jury that plaintiff must exercise same amount of care as defendant.

13. Automobiles ⇨160(1), 216.

Both truck driver and pedestrian must exercise degree of care which ordinarily prudent men would exercise under circumstances for pedestrian's safety.

14. Automobiles ⇨160(1), 216.

Amount of care required of truck driver for safety of pedestrian is greater than that required of latter for his own safety.

15. Automobiles ⇨246(4).

Instruction that driver of motor vehicle, a "dangerous instrumentality," is charged with greater care than pedestrian for latter's safety, held properly refused as confusing, erroneously classifying truck as dangerous instrumentality and indicating that jury should compare amount of care required of driver thereof with that required of pedestrian.

16. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1).

Admission of testimony of three truck drivers as to noise made by backing trucks after three other drivers testified practically to same effect without objection by appellant held not prejudicial error.

17. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1).

Instruction submitting question whether driver of truck injuring plaintiff was defendant's employee or independent contractor held not ground for reversal of judgment for defendant; presumption being that jurors found plaintiff contributorily negligent, as defendant contended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Richard O. Warnke, by Myrtle Weber, his guardian ad litem, against the Griffith Company, a corporation, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Nimmo, Leighton & Heath and Mark A. Hall, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Finlayson, Bennett & Morrow, Henry L. Knoop, and Penn Cummings, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Griffith Co.

David D. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for respondent Alexander Marrett.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

From a judgment in favor of defendants in an action for personal injuries plaintiff has appealed.

For convenience of description we shall assume that, near the scene of the accident involved here, East Fourth street in the city of

Los Angeles runs east and west and the intersecting streets run north and south. Merrick street intersects it at right angles from the north, but does not extend beyond it. About one city block west of this intersection Hewitt street comes into Fourth from the south. The city of Los Angeles, at the time in question, was improving East Fourth street, which was originally 40 feet wide, by acquiring a strip 20 feet wide on the north side thereof between said intersecting streets. Defendant Griffith Company had the contract for the construction of gutters, new curb, and paving. At the time of the accident the old curbing had been removed along the old north line of Fourth street and header boards had been set in its place, which rose from 6 to 8 inches above the ground level and acted as retainers for the fresh concrete. A curb had been constructed along the new north line of the street to within from 100 to 200 feet of Merrick street, and forms had been set or were being set for the rest of the new curb and gutters. Along the south edge of the strip, about 1 foot north of where the old curbing had been, there was a row of electric light poles which carried wires belonging to the bureau of power and light of the city of Los Angeles and others belonging to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. A row of new poles had been set just north of the strip, outside the new curb line, and it was necessary to dismantle and remove the old poles, one of which stood near the place which had formerly been the northwest corner of Fourth and Merrick, designated on the map introduced in evidence as "old pole No. 1," and another, west of old pole No. 1 about 120 feet, designated as "old pole No. 2." This dismantling and removal was being done under an order of the bureau of power and light, which authorized a joint pole agreement for such work. This work of dismantling and removal was being carried on at the time of the accident by about fifty employees of the bureau of power and light and the electric corporation.

Plaintiff was an employee of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation as helper to the linemen. His duty required him to remain on the ground near the pole on which the linemen were working and assist them by raising and lowering materials or tools by means of a pulley and hand line suspended from a crossbeam of the pole. At the time of the accident two of the linemen were engaged in dismantling old pole No. 1, and plaintiff was assisting them. At the same time defendant company was engaged in paving the 20-foot strip and had already laid the pavement thereon from the westerly end of the strip to within approximately 215.4 feet west of Merrick street. This operation had for some time required the trucks carrying materials to the concrete mixer from the company's plant at Ninth street and the Los Angeles river to back into the strip from Merrick street, in order to dump their loads at the mixer. On the day of the accident there were eight trucks being so employed and they followed each other in regular order, one coming out over the strip as another was backing in. All of the trucks were of about the same design and size. None of them belonged to the Griffith Company, but were engaged by it to do such hauling at an agreed price per load. The above-mentioned forms and their braces extended some 2½ feet into the strip from the new curbing. At the northwest corner of Merrick and Fourth streets there was a small pile of lumber next to the forms, and a carpenter, Fred Felix, was working on the forms. This forced the trucks to enter the strip from Merrick street at some distance from the new curb, and the evidence shows that they followed one route, marked by ruts made in the soft dirt over which they traveled. Just prior to the accident plaintiff had been called by one of the linemen on old pole No. 1 to lower some materials, and he took his position, standing north of the hand line and from 2 to 3 feet from the pole. The line was hanging from 12 to 18 inches due north of the pole. Plaintiff stood looking up the pole, watching the lineman tie a fuse box onto the hand line, waiting for that to be done so he could lower it to the ground. While so standing defendant Marrett backed his truck, loaded for the mixer, into the east end of the strip. The right rear corner of the truck struck plaintiff, knocking him headlong to the ground. The right rear double wheels pinned his foot down, and the backing vehicle ran up plaintiff's legs and onto his pelvis, severely injuring him. Marrett was then warned by some one, and immediately drove the truck forward and off the injured man's legs.

Appellant concedes that, if the case had been submitted to the jury under what he terms "proper instructions," the evidence would support the verdict; and also that, if proper instructions had been given, the jury would have been justified in implied findings that plaintiff's injuries were caused by the negligence of both defendants, and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that the jury would most probably have so found. He contends, however, that the court erred (1) in giving instructions regarding the question of whether Marrett was an employee of Griffith Company or an independent contractor; (2) in instructing the jury that plaintiff was a mere licensee; (3) in giving and refusing instructions relative to plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence, his rights and duties as a workman, and the quantum of care required of him; (4) in instructions concerning the relative amount of care required of plaintiff and defendants; and (5) in excluding certain evidence and permitting the introduction of other evidence, overruling certain objections to evidence, and denying motions to strike same, and in refusing as well as in giving certain other instructions. In view of the conclusion reached we shall leave the discussion of the first contention until the last.

Marrett's truck was so constructed that he could not see any one of ordinary stature for some distance directly back of it, either by looking around the left side where he sat or through the window at the back of the cab, much less any one back of the opposite rear corner of the vehicle, which struck plaintiff. There were but six of the fifty utility employees engaged about the job directly engaged, as was appellant and the two linemen working with him, making but two "ground men" and four "linemen." It does not appear from the evidence that the second "ground man," who was working at old pole No. 2 while appellant was working at old pole No. 1, at any time stood in the strip over which the trucks were constantly passing. At this distance (at least 120 feet) he heard the lineman shout to appellant, "Get on the hand line." Respondent Marrett knew that the utility men were working around the job, but did not see appellant in the strip before he backed. Likewise appellant knew that the trucks were backing into the strip and passing out, and had already seen "not more than six or eight trucks in all" back past him before he was hurt. The latter testified that before he stepped onto the strip he looked toward Merrick street, but did not see any trucks. Attorneys for defendants have united in filing a joint brief for both respondents, as most of the exceptions involve them mutually.

[1-3] 2. We see no error prejudicial to appellant in the giving of the instructions here complained of. The court did not say that plaintiff was a "mere licensee." After advising the jury by the instruction that plaintiff "had a legal right to be on the premises where he was performing his work," the court said (italics ours): "However, so far as the defendant Griffith Company was concerned, the plaintiff was a mere licensee: that is, the defendant Griffith Company was not required to provide a safe place for him to work." The court neither in this nor any other instruction we find defines what the words "mere licensee" mean, nor did it say what the duty of the Griffith Company was to "a mere licensee, as compared with an invitee." The only thing the jury could have understood by the use of the words in the instruction was that the Griffith Company was not required to provide plaintiff with a safe place to work. Appellant was not an employee of the defendant Griffith Company, nor was he performing any work for them. He was working solely in the interest of his employer, the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation, which had an equal right with the Griffith Company, though a different job to do, upon the premises—which belonged to the public, although the public was excluded from their general use while the improvement was under way. In the same instruction the court did tell the jury that “it was the duty of the defendant Griffith Company to refrain from committing any overt act of negligence in connection with its direction and control of the manner and place in which the trucks were necessarily required to pass”; that “if, therefore, you conclude that in the exercise of such reasonable prudence and care, under all of the conditions as they appear to have existed in connection with the backing of the trucks, taking into consideration the difficulty, if not impossibility, of the drivers of the trucks to see in the rear and both sides of the trucks as they backed in, and taking into consideration the further fact that workmen were working along and near the path of the moving trucks, the Griffith Company should have maintained a flagman or other means of notifying the workmen of the approach of each truck, then the defendant Griffith Company was guilty of negligence.” In our opinion the instruction given is as favorable as appellant could have asked, even assuming he was an invitee. Even an invitee assumes all obvious dangers on the premises he is invited to enter. Shanley v. American Olive Company, 185 Cal. 552, 197 P. 793. In view of the last sentence of the instruction, which we have quoted, the jury could not conclude from the statement made (of which appellant does not complain) that it was the duty of the Griffith Company to refrain from committing “overt” acts of negligence in connection with the use of its trucks; nor in view thereof could the jury infer from such last statement that the Griffith Company would be liable only for such “overt” acts. Other instructions given show that the case was presented to the jury, not upon the question of the degree of care due a “mere licensee,” but liability based upon the failure of such company to exercise ordinary care in carrying on its operations, which we are of the opinion is the true measure of its liability.

[4] 3. Appellant urges that there was only one place he could stand and do his work, and also, evidently, that he was required at all times to keep his eyes on the linemen; that he was not bound to neglect his work in order to maintain a constant lookout for approaching danger; that he was not bound to assume the risk caused by the negligent use by others of instrumentalities likely to cause him injury, and that he had a right to presume that such others would not run him down without warning; that, such being the law, the court erred in instructing the jury (a) that he was required “constantly” and

“at all times” to keep on the lookout for approaching danger, (b) that he assumed the risks from the negligent operation of dangerous instrumentalities at the place where he was working, and (c) in refusing to instruct the jury that he had a right to presume that dangerous instrumentalities would not injure him without warning.

(c) At the request of plaintiff the court, in substance, instructed the jury that there is a difference between the amount of care required of a pedestrian who might enter premises where there is danger of being injured by motor vehicles or other instrumentalities and that required of a workman forced to be upon the premises in performance of his duties—“not that the workman is bound to exercise any lesser degree of care, but because the care to be exercised must be determined from a different standpoint”—and that what might be negligence on the part of a pedestrian or stranger might be due care on the part of the workman; that in both cases the parties are required to exercise ordinary care and to use their senses before entering upon a place of danger, “but that the duty which devolves upon the pedestrian or stranger to continue to exercise his sense of sight does not devolve with the same strictness upon the workman. The workman is not called upon to exercise the same amount of diligence in avoiding accidents as pedestrians or others who use the same place merely as a medium of locomotion. * * *” The court refused to give as a part of such instruction the further statement that such workman was not bound to neglect his work in order to avoid an injury which might be caused by want of ordinary care on the part of operators of vehicles, but has a right “to assume that other persons will exercise due care for his safety,” “that dangerous instrumentalities will not be thrust upon him without warning,” and that “it should not necessarily be said that he contributes to his own injuries by doing that which his employment required him to do.”

We are of the opinion that under the testimony of appellant himself there was no place in the instructions for the portions thereof refused. He testified that the trucks backed in on an average of one every four or five minutes; he must have known from observation that the driver operating the truck in question could not see any one standing by the pole; he knew he was standing in the depression made in the dirt by the truck wheels. Knowing all that, he testified that just before the accident he was standing 8 or 10 feet west of the pole; that he heard one of the linemen “holler” to him and he “walked in a northeasterly direction toward where the hand line was hanging, just north of the pole. As I walked forward, I looked ahead of me to see if any trucks were ready to back in. I could see clear across Merrick street. There was no truck approaching or backing in. The hand line was hanging about 15 inches north of the pole. I took my position just north of the hand line, and faced to the south, with the hand line between me and the pole. I was standing about 2 feet or 2½ feet north of the pole. I looked up the pole to see what the lineman wanted, and I saw Mr. Bolton tying a fuse-box, or bird-cage, onto the hand line. I stood looking up at him, watching to see when he would have it tied on so that I could lower it. I stood there about a minute while he was tying it on; all that time I was looking up at him, and during that time I did not look to the east to see if any trucks were backing in. I did not change my position during that time. Mr. Bolton hollered for me to lower the bird cage, and I was just reaching for the hand line when I felt something hit me on the rear portion of my left side." Appellant could just as well have watched the lineman tying the load on the line from a safe position. He was certainly not performing any part of the duty required of him by watching the lineman perform his duty, and, if he had glanced occasionally in the direction from which danger approached him, until the lineman gave the signal to lower the fuse box which it is evident he was waiting for, the deplorable accident could not have happened. In our opinion the only instructions warranted under the circumstances shown by plaintiff's own evidence were those given by the court. It is true there was evidence that the line had to hang where it was on the pole and that the lineman placed it, and not appellant; but the only reason shown by the evidence as to why appellant had to stand where he did instead of closer to the pole is "because if I had done so I would have been in danger from something falling down the pole. Sometimes the linemen drop things out of their hands, or drop pliers or other things out of their belts," and "you have to stand with your face to the pole in order to control the hand line and keep the materials on the line from swinging in toward the pole." It is evident from appellant's own testimony that he was not yet operating the hand line when struck, but was simply waiting for the load to be tied on and the signal given; and, even though plaintiff testified that he was "looking up the pole to see when the lineman was ready for him to lower," it is evident from his own testimony that it was an audible signal that he was waiting for and upon the giving of which he reached for the line.

[5] (a) The court instructed the jury to the effect that defendant Marrett had a right to back his truck over the strip of ground, and that such right was equal in every respect to the right of appellant to be where he was at the time of the accident; that just as their rights were equal, so also was the duty of each to exercise ordinary care under all the circumstances; and that "plaintiff could not assume or act or rely upon the assumption that he would not be injured" by a truck passing by the place when he was working, "but that he was required to keep such a lookout for such trucks as under similar circumstances an ordinarily prudent person would have kept for his own safety and protection." Appellant urges that, under the case of Egan v. Southern Pacific Company, 15 Cal. App. 766, 115 P. 939, 940, and Jones v. Southern Pacific Company, 74 Cal. App. 10, 239 P. 429, he had a right to assume the very thing the court instructed the jury he could not. In the case of Egan v. Southern Pacific Company, supra, an employee of the railroad was struck by a string of cars which passed him on the way up grade, and after switching a car apparently remained motionless on the track, with no one in sight except the fireman, "who was sitting in the cab door with his feet upon the steps." Seeing this, the plaintiff resumed his work upon the track, and while so engaged was struck by the cars, which, "without any warning or signal, backed the same down the track, and by reason of the grade no indication of their approach was observed by plaintiff." The court there said that plaintiff had a right to assume that the train would not be backed down upon him without warning, and that it should not be said that he contributed to his own injury in the doing of that which his employment required that he should do. The verdict in that case was in plaintiff's favor, and it was one of the contentions of appellant that contributory negligence was shown on the part of plaintiff. That the court did not intend the statement made should be used as an instruction to the jury under the facts of this case is clear, not only from the great difference in the facts of the two cases, but from the use of the following language, which would seem to be applicable to the facts here, viz.: "It cannot be disputed that one familiar with the dangers connected with an employment as a general rule assumes the risks, incident thereto." Plaintiff in the instant case testified that he "knew it was a dangerous place." There is testimony that the noise made by the trucks in backing the heavy load was greater than would be made by a horn. Mr. Ward, the other ground man, who was working at the time at old pole No. 2, at least 120 feet closer to the mixer, testified that when the mixer was 100 feet away the truck could be heard at a distance of 25 feet. The statement we have quoted from Egan v. Southern Pacific Company approves the principle of law criticized in the instruction given and which we think is peculiarly applicable to the facts of this case. In the Jones Case, supra, the deceased was an employee of an independent corporation which had been requested by defendant to make necessary repairs on defendant's tracks, and, as in the Jones Case, the statement was in the nature of an argument by the court showing that under the facts of that case plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, but that such question was one of fact properly submitted to the jury. In view of what we have said, we see no error in the instruction complained of in appellant's ninth specification of error.

[6, 7] Nor do we see any error in the instructions given to the effect that, if the jury found that the noise of the concrete mixer affected appellant's ability to hear the trucks as they were backing up, "then I instruct you that the plaintiff was bound to use a greater amount of care for his own safety and protection and to be more vigilant in looking than if his hearing were not so affected." The amount of care varies with the circumstances surrounding a party. While the test which determines negligence or lack of it is the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person under the same or similar circumstances, necessarily the amount of such care varies with the differences in such circumstances. This instruction but calls the attention of the jury to the fact, which is a commonplace, that, if the circumstance of excessive noise is present, alertness to danger must increase; that is, the amount of care must be greater in order that the common measuring stick of ordinary care may be applied.

[8, 9] The court also instructed the jury that: "It was the duty of plaintiff to exercise his faculties of sight and hearing to apprise himself of danger, if any, and to use ordinary care at all times in exercising his senses of sight and hearing. To look in a careless manner or to listen in a careless manner is not to look or listen at all." To the first part of such instruction appellant urges that it was error to instruct the jury that "it was plaintiff's duty to exercise his senses of sight and hearing at all times to apprise himself of danger." We do not believe that construction can be placed on the language used by the court. That it was appellant's duty to exercise such faculties for such purpose and to use ordinary care at all times in such exercise could hardly be questioned, and that is all the court said. The only objection made to the last phrase of the instruction is that there is "no evidence at all that plaintiff looked or listened 'in a careless manner' or that he did 'not look or listen at all.'" In our opinion there is ample evidence to support either conclusion on the part of the jury.

[10, 11] (b) The court gave three instructions designated as C, E, and G, respectively, of which appellant complains in his thirteenth, fourteenth and seventeenth specifications of error. The general ground of such objection is that the court failed to apply the law applicable to workmen bound to carry on their employment in a place of danger. We have already shown that in our opinion such contention is not good under the evidence in this case. The instructions properly state the law applicable to this case. Instruction E says in part: "Each [referring to plaintiff and defendants] in turn assumed the ordinary risks involved in being upon and moving over ground where others were occupied in working and handling or moving objects that might cause injury." And we fail to see anything in such language which the jury could construe as meaning that appellant assumed the risks of respondents' negligence, as urged, particularly in view of all the instructions given by the court. The same objection is made as to instruction G, wherein the court said: "The plaintiff went upon the premises and assumed all of the ordinary and reasonable risks of the dangers involved in the general conditions as they existed there, as they were apparent or should have been apparent to him." Even if such a construction could be placed thereon by the jury, we are of the opinion that, if it was apparent to appellant that the truck drivers could not see him if he was standing in the ruts made by the vehicles' wheels as they were backing into the strip (and it would seem to be plainly apparent to anyone), such negligence in so backing might very well be one of the ordinary dangers involved, and, if appellant failed to use ordinary care in performing his duties as the court otherwise instructed, he might well be said to have "assumed" the risks of such negligence.

In his eighteenth and nineteenth specifications of error appellant attacks the following instruction as not properly stating the law relating to workmen and in calling for constant vigilance and watchfulness on the part of one in a position of constant danger: "While the plaintiff was only required to exercise ordinary care for his own safety and protection, nevertheless the amount of that care which he was required to exercise must be measured by the extent of his exposure to danger. A person who is in a position of danger must exercise care proportionate to the danger; he must be as vigilant and watchful as the danger of his position requires. If he is in a position of constant danger he must be constantly vigilant and watchful. He must exercise such amount of care which an ordinarily prudent person in a like position of danger would exercise for his own safety and protection. Therefore, if you find that at and immediately prior to the accident the plaintiff was in a position of danger and that he failed to exercise an amount of care commensurate with such danger, then he was negligent, and if you further find that such negligence proximately caused or contributed to the accident and injuries he cannot recover, and in such event your verdict should be in favor of both defendants."

In the case of Kenna v. Central Pacific R. Co., 101 Cal. 26, 35 P. 332, 333, plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendant as a plumber in fitting and connecting pipes alongside its tracks in the construction of a signal tower, and while walking upon the end of the ties on the outer tracks from the tower to his work bench, for the purpose of cutting a piece of pipe, the deceased was struck in the back by a locomotive and killed. Defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted. The Supreme Court said, in affirming the judgment of nonsuit: "It may be assumed, however, that the defendant was guilty of negligence to such a degree that, in the absence of any other evidence, it would be liable in damages, but the contributory negligence of the deceased was, nevertheless, such as to prevent a recovery against the defendant. It appears from the evidence that Fallon was a prudent, cautious man, 22 years old; that he knew the danger of the place in which he was working; had talked with his uncle about it; had had the experience of several days in which to learn the frequency with which the trains passed over the track, and to become acquainted with the danger; and that owing to the curve in the track, and the obstruction caused by the tower, he could not see an approaching train until it came within a few rods of him. It was therefore incumbent on him to exercise a corresponding care and vigilance to avoid danger, rather than negligently and recklessly expose himself to injury. 'His employment and the theater of his services may not be disregarded. They made him conversant with the locality, the character and frequency of trains, the necessity for incessant vigilance to avoid injury, and the fact that no one could venture upon the tracks, and escape injury, without the greatest circumspection.' Bresnahan v. Railroad Co., 49 Mich. 413, 13 N. W. 797. The law demands that one who is working in a place where he is exposed to danger shall himself exercise his faculties for his own protection, and does not permit a recovery for damages resulting from a neglect of this rule." The court there held plaintiff negligent as a matter of law. Here the trial court left the question to the jury, and in our opinion but one conclusion could be reached under the facts presented, and we think the court properly advised the jury as to the law applicable. "The care required must be in proportion to the danger to be avoided and the consequences that might reasonably be anticipated from the neglect. The greater the risk of danger the greater must be the care. What is ordinary care in the case of extraordinary danger would be extraordinary care in a case of ordinary danger." 29 Cyc. 428, 429, quoted with approval in Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 98, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. See, also, Ramos v. Service Brothers, 118 Cal. App. 432, 5 P.(2d) 623, wherein plaintiff, an experienced road worker, was ordered by his employer to remove some oil which had leaked on the road (these last facts appear only in the transcript) and was struck by a backing truck.

[12-15] 4. The court refused to give a very long instruction requested by plaintiff which in part charged, so far as the driver of the truck was concerned, that, while both plaintiff and defendant Marrett were charged with the same degree of care, "the amount of care exacted of the driver of a motor vehicle is far greater than the amount of care exacted of the foot-passenger. The driver of a motor vehicle—a dangerous instrumentality capable of inflicting fatal injuries—is charged with a greater amount of care than the pedestrian." Another phase of the same instruction combined the two defendants and instructed the jury that, if it should find "that the truck which Mr. Marrett was driving, and the operations which the Griffith Company was carrying on, were dangerous instrumentalities, and that they were more likely to injure the plaintiff than he was to injure them * * *, that in order to exercise the same degree of care" defendants were required to exercise a greater amount than plaintiff, and, if the jury found that they failed to exercise the degree of care required of them, and that plaintiff did exercise the degree of care required of him, that then they should find for the plaintiff. The particular part of the instruction above referred to is urged to have been erroneously refused.

The court did instruct the jury that "all persons must exercise ordinary care when their conduct may affect any other person, or when they may be affected by the conduct of any other person," and that "it is as much the duty of a person to exercise ordinary care for his own safety and protection as it is his duty to exercise ordinary care with respect to the safety and protection of others"; and then, applying such instructions to the case on trial, the court said: "It was as much the duty of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care for his own safety and protection as it was the duty of defendants, or either of them, to exercise such care with respect to the plaintiff's safety and protection." In another instruction given the jury was told that Marrett had a right to back his truck over the strip of ground, and that such right was equal in every respect to the right of plaintiff to be where he was at the time; that "just as their rights were equal, so also was the duty of each to exercise ordinary care under all the circumstances equal." The quoted language is urged as erroneous, just as the language of the instruction previously referred to, in that it informs the jury that plaintiff was required to exercise the same amount of care as defendants, and the same complaint is made of certain language taken from instruction E, heretofore mentioned, which says that the "obligations of the plaintiff and the defendants were coequal, in a sense, and reciprocal." We cannot agree with appellant that such is the effect of the instructions when read as a whole. As so read they clearly conform to the rule that each is required to use that degree of care which ordinarily prudent men would exercise under the circumstances in which each found himself; and while it is undoubtedly true that the amount of care required of the driver of the truck was greater than that required of appellant, as set forth in the part of the instruction refused by the court, and while such instruction sets forth a correct principle of law, we are of the opinion that the charges given by the court are equally sound as principles of law. In addition to being sound, those given afford some help to the jury. The one refused does not. What would a jury get out of the one refused? Nothing but confusion. It seems clear the only hope one might have in proposing it would be that the jury might get the idea that in some way, in the eyes of the law, appellant was in a more favored position than defendants, regardless of the facts. Nor do we think the proposed instruction fair in stating that the truck is a "dangerous instrumentality." That language has been used, inadvertently we think, in referring to motor and other vehicles propelled by power. They are only dangerous, in themselves, in the hands of an incompetent or careless driver. That there is possibility of great danger from them if carelessly operated, or if pedestrians or others are negligent around them, is undoubtedly true, but that of itself is not enough to warrant so classing them in an instruction—which would only seem to have the purpose of inflaming a jury at a helpless and inanimate piece of machinery, with the hope possibly that the feeling would spread to the driver or owner. How would the jury compare the amount of care required of the driver with that required of the pedestrian? Of course, that is impossible. How would it help even if they could do so? It clearly could not. Furthermore, in our opinion, such proposed instruction clearly indicates to the jury that some such comparison is to be made, and it can only be in the final analysis a comparison of negligence, which they were properly instructed by the court they could not make, as appellant admits. Similar instructions have been by different appellate courts approved as not constituting error. This court so held in the case of Morgan v. Los Angeles R. & G. Corp., 105 Cal. App. 224, 287 P. 152.

We are of the opinion that, while such a charge might not be erroneous if given in connection with proper instructions as to the degree of care necessary for each to use to avoid being negligent, still it falls short of being a good instruction in many particulars; and we think the court exercised sound judgment in refusing to give it. We are not unmindful of the fact that the refusal of a similar instruction has been held to be error, in the case of Vedder v. Bireley, 92 Cal. App. 52, 267 P. 724, but with the conclusion reached there as to such instruction we cannot agree.

[16] 5. The drivers of three of the trucks used on the work referred to, testified without objection as to the noise made by their machines in backing into the strip and as to conditions generally prevailing as to noises. We see no prejudicial error in permitting three other drivers to testify thereafter, over appellant's objection. The testimony of the last three was practically the same as that of the first three, whose evidence was already in the record. It would seem to be more a matter of weight than competence anyway, considering that it was unquestioned that the trucks were of practically the same size and design and carried about the same weight and were operated over the same tracks, and that some of them were coming out while others were going in, at least two of them being in close proximity at the time of the accident.

We find no merit in the other miscellaneous errors urged by appellant.

[17] 1. If the jury had found Marrett guilty of negligence and appellant free from contributory negligence, the question of whether or not he was an employee of Griffith Company would have been material. If the jury found him guilty of negligence, but also found appellant guilty of contributory negligence, it would still have had to find for Marrett. In view of the fact that we find no error which prejudiced appellant, we must assume that the jurors found him to have been negligent himself, in which event it would have been immaterial whether he was employed by the Griffith Company or not, or whether one or both of the defendants were negligent. Nor could an instruction leaving the question of employment to the jury have changed the verdict in any respect.

KNOX v. BENBO.
L. A. 14081.

Supreme Court of California.
Sept. 14, 1933.

New trial $\S$ 104(1).

New trial was properly denied, in action to have paternity of child adjudicated, where allegedly newly discovered evidence was cumulative only and would not have changed result.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles D. Ballard, Judge.

Action by Rueben Knox against Jane Doe Benbo, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Willis O. Tyler, Edwin L. Jefferson, and Floyd H. Bowers, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Orbison & Irwin and Charles J. Orbison, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff brought this action to have the paternity of a minor child of the defendant adjudicated. The complaint alleged that the defendant claimed that the plaintiff is the father of the child, but that the claim is without foundation. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint alleging that the plaintiff is the father and prayed for judgment so declaring and awarding support for the child. Findings and judgment were made and entered in favor of the defendant and cross-complainant, and from the judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

Two points are made in support of the appeal: First, that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings; and, secondly, that the court erred in denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

It is deemed unnecessary to relate the evidence adduced in support of the findings. The record has been carefully reviewed. Although sharply conflicting, the evidence on behalf of the defendant is amply sufficient to support the findings. We find nothing therein which would justify the conclusion contended for by the plaintiff that the testimony on behalf of the defendant is inherently improbable.

The motion for a new trial was made on the ground, among others, of newly discovered evidence. It appears that the evidence alleged to be newly discovered was at the time of the trial known by and available to the then counsel for the plaintiff, who was substituted out of the case and does not appear as counsel on the appeal. However, the evidence, if produced, would have been cumulative only and in view of the record presented would not have changed the result. The motion for a new trial was therefore properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

SANTINI v. JUSTICES' COURT OF SAN BERNARDINO TP. et al.
L. A. 14067.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 21, 1933.

Prohibition $\S$ 5(1).

Writ of prohibition held not to lie to restrain issuance of execution to enforce judgment.

In Bank.

Application by August Santini for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Justices' Court of San Bernardino township, San Bernardino county; George W. Holbrook, Justice of Peace of the township.

Peremptory writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

Joseph R. Rensch, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

T. T. Clark, of Colton, for respondents.

SHENK, Justice.

Prohibition to restrain the respondents court and justice of San Bernardino township from taking any steps to enforce a judgment rendered in said court, in an action entitled Joseph Holdener v. August Santini.

The action was on a promissory note, and the judgment was for the plaintiff in the sum of $92.50. On appeal to the superior court the judgment was affirmed and the record returned to the respondent court. The issuance of an execution is threatened, and it is sought in this proceeding to restrain its issuance.

The foundation for the petitioner's position is the fact that the justice of the peace who tried the cause in the respondent court was called in by the respondent justice pursuant to section 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but was ineligible to sit in that court because he was a justice of a township of less than 30,000 population and was not and is not admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of this state as required by section 922 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 4185a of the Political Code (added by St. 1929, p. 839).

In the original briefs counsel discussed rather extensively the rules which should apply under the facts presented as to the right of the justice of the peace called in to try the case in the respondent court. By a supplemental brief the respondents have raised the question of the propriety of the writ of prohibition to restrain the issuance of an execution (a ministerial act) to enforce a judgment.

The point thus raised effectually disposes of the present proceeding in favor of the respondents. Harris v. Recorder's Court, 15 Cal. App. 103, 113 P. 687, and cases therein cited; 50 C. J., p. 660.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO.,
Limited, et al., v. STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION.*
L. A. 14008.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 1, 1933.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 31, 1933.

1. Taxation ☞382.

Gross receipts of public utility corporation's subsidiary are computed as part of gross proceeds from parent company's operations in assessing taxes thereon (Const. art. 13, § 14).

2. Taxation ☞382.

Taxes of electric company and its subsidiary railroad company held properly computed on basis of gross receipts of each, including amount paid latter by former for transporting materials and supplies (Const. art. 13, § 14).

In Bank.

Application by the Southern California Edison Company, Limited, and another for a writ of mandate to the State Board of Equalization.

Alternative writ discharged, and petition denied.

Roy V. Reppy and E. W. Cunningham, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

CURTIS, Justice.

Petitioners, the Southern California Edison Company, Limited, a corporation, and the San Joaquin & Eastern Railroad Company, a corporation, filed herein their petition asking for an alternative writ of mandate requiring respondent, the state board of equalization, to grant certain credit on future payment of taxes to become due from petitioners, and to issue the certificate to the state board of control provided for under subdivision 3 of section 3669 of the Political Code, stating the amount of said credit. Petitioners further pray, upon a hearing after the return on said alternative writ, that the writ be made peremptory. The alternative writ was issued and regularly served upon the respondent. The return of respondent to the writ is a demurrer thereto on the ground that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or any ground for relief.

Petitioner Southern California Edison Company, Limited, hereinafter referred to as "Edison Company," is engaged in the business of generating and distributing electric energy as a public utility. A part of its generating system, known as the Big Creek project, is located in the mountains of Fresno county. Petitioner San Joaquin & Eastern Railroad Company, hereinafter referred to as "Railroad Company," was originally organized at the instigation of Pacific Light & Power Corporation, Edison Company's predecessor in the ownership of the Big Creek project, for the purpose of building and operating a short line railroad between El Prado and Big Creek, Fresno county, Cal., to be used in constructing, maintaining, and operating the Big Creek hydroelectric plants. At the time Edison Company acquired the Big Creek project in 1917, it also acquired the ownership of all the stock of the railroad company, and since that time has operated the railroad through its subsidiary, the railroad company, as a necessary adjunct to the maintenance and operation of the Big Creek project. The railroad system has also at all times been operated as a common carrier, and during the past few years the railroad company has also operated in connection with its railroad system the highway transportation system between Fresno and Huntington Lake, which is a part of the Big Creek project. This highway transportation system, like the railroad system, has been operated as a common carrier, and also for the transportation of freight and express used by the Edison Company in the maintenance and operation of the Big Creek project.

In computing petitioners' taxes for the fiscal year 1932-1933, respondent board included in the gross receipts of the railroad company intercompany revenue derived by the railroad from carrying materials and supplies as freight and express for the Edison Company in connection with the operation and maintenance of the Big Creek project. This method of computing the taxes has resulted in an increase over what it would have been if computed by the old method of $448.86 on the railroad system, and of $474.22 on the highway transportation system. At the same time, respondent board assessed taxes against all the operative properties of Edison Company used by it in the generation and transmission of electric energy.

The first half of the tax thus assessed on the railroad company's property has been paid by petitioners under protest, and, after making this payment, they filed with the board a claim for credit on the next taxes to become due from them, after the allowance of such claim, on account of the alleged erroneous method followed by the board in computing the taxes against the railway system and the highway transportation system of the railroad company. These claims are for $224.43 on account of the overpayment of taxes on the railroad system and for $237.11 on account of the overpayment of taxes on the highway transportation system. These claims the respondent board denied on the ground that the intercompany revenue should be included as a part of the gross receipts upon which such taxes are computed.

Subdivision 3 of section 3669 of the Political Code provides that whenever any taxes, paid to the state treasurer, shall have been paid more than once, or shall have been erroneously or illegally collected, or shall have been computed contrary to law, the state board of equalization shall certify to the state board of control the amount of said taxes collected in excess of what was legally due, from whom they were collected, or by whom paid, and, if approved by said board of control, the same shall be credited to the person or company to whom it rightfully belongs, at the time of the next payment of taxes.

[1, 2] It is the contention of petitioners that the two amounts of $224.42 and $237.11, aggregating the sum of $461.53, were erroneously collected from them as taxes for the fiscal year 1932-1933. This claim is based upon the fact that the amount paid by the Edison Company to the railroad company during said year for the transportation of materials and supplies as freight and express in connection with the operation and maintenance of its light and power enterprise—referred to above as intercompany business—should not be included as a part of the gross receipts of the railroad company. There seems to be no question that the railroad company is but a subsidiary company of the Edison Company, the latter company being the legal owner of all the stock of the former. In such a case its gross receipts are computed as a part of the gross proceeds of the Edison Company. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys. v. Johnson, 210 Cal. 138, 154, 155, 291 P. 197. Therefore petitioners contend that, when the Edison Company paid the railroad company freight and express charges for carrying its own commodities, it was in reality paying these charges to itself, and that such receipts by the railroad company should not be considered in computing its gross receipts. We must admit that the argument of the petitioners is quite persuasive, and, were the question an open one, we would be inclined to give the same considerable weight. But the same question was before this court in the case of Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 176 Cal. 183, 167 P. 845, 847, and was decided adversely to the present contention of the petitioners. In that case the facts show that plaintiff did business in a certain locality through a subsidiary corporation, the Suburban Light & Power Company. During the year it sold at wholesale rates gas and electricity to the Suburban Company at a cost of $52,717.99. The Suburban Company then distributed this gas and electricity to its consumers residing in the locality served by it, and for that year its gross receipts were $188,401.60. The plaintiff, the parent company, paid taxes on its gross receipts, including said sum of $52,717.99. It also paid taxes on $188,401.60, the gross receipts of the Suburban Company. The taxes on the gross receipts of $52,717.99 were paid under protest, and in that action the plaintiff sought to recover them from the state treasurer. This court construed the words "gross receipts from operation" used in section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution as the basis for fixing the amount of taxes to be paid upon certain classes of property used exclusively in the public service, and held that these words were not the equivalent of "gross earnings" or "gross profits," but that the clear intent of this provision of the Constitution "was to base the tax upon the income derived from the exercise by the corporation of functions reasonably within their charter powers." In applying this construction of the Constitution to the question before it in that case, the court held: "So in the case now before us the money paid by the Suburban Company for gas in bulk was paid to appellant and received in its capacity as a wholesale dealer, while the amounts received by the Suburban from its customers were paid for delivering gas to them—an entirely different service. There is no more reason to make a deduction because the two corporations were engaged in the same sort of business than there would be to subtract from the grand total of plaintiff's gross receipts the amounts paid for oil used in the manufacture of gas by said corporation."

Applying the rule thus announced to the facts in the present case, it follows in our opinion that the action of the board of equalization must be sustained and that the board correctly computed the taxes due from petitioners by taking the gross receipts of each as the proper basis for making such computation. The service rendered by the railroad company was entirely different from the service rendered by the Edison Company, and therefore the amount of tax which each should pay was properly based upon the income derived from the exercise by each of its corporate functions.

Other questions raised by respondent, in view of the above conclusion, need not be given consideration in this opinion.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged, and the petition is denied.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to quiet title. The defendant Fidelity Philadelphia Trust Company, trustee of the estate of Thomas A. Scott, deceased, is the sole appellant.

The complaint alleged title and possession in and to numerous parcels of land in township 1 south, range 2 west, H. M., in Humboldt county. The appellant filed an answer and a cross-complaint seeking to establish the right in the estate in and to oil, gas, and mineral rights in certain lands described in the complaint, lying south of a line running easterly and westerly through the center of sections 15 and 16 in said township.

The plaintiff proved record title and possession in himself and his predecessors in interest, and the court found the allegations of the complaint to be true. The court also found the allegations of the cross-complaint to be untrue, and quieted the plaintiff's title as against the claims of the trustee of the Scott estate.

Other points are discussed in the briefs, but it is at once apparent that the subject-matter of the controversy on this appeal is res adjudicata.

[1] In January, 1915, J. C. McFarland, as the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Thomas A. Scott, deceased, commenced an action in Humboldt county to quiet the title of the estate of Scott in and to said oil, gas, and mineral substances as against the predecessors in title of the plaintiff herein. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants in said action. On appeal the judgment became final by affirmance thereof in April, 1919. MacFarland v. Walker, 40 Cal. App. 508, 181 P. 248. Said final judgment was interposed as a defense to the claim of the cross-complainant herein. The court found that the oil, gas, and mineral rights described in the cross-complaint were included in the same rights asserted and involved in the prior action, and that the plaintiff herein is the successor in interest and title of the defendants in the former action. These findings are conclusively supported by the record. While the plaintiff in the former action was the administrator of the estate and the appellant is the trustee, both were the representatives of the real party in interest, viz., the estate of Thomas A. Scott. We therefore find this case to be squarely within the rule declared by section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the many cases affirming the same doctrine: In re Estate of Clark, 190 Cal. 354, 212 P. 622; 15 Cal. Jur., pp. 95 et seq.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order setting aside a decree of foreclosure of street bonds.

The plaintiff was the holder of two street assessment bonds issued by the city of Los Angeles pursuant to proceedings taken under the 1911 Street Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 730, as amended). One bond was issued on May 13, 1921, and was made a lien on lot 20 of Tract 3263. The other bond was issued on November 20, 1924, and was made a lien on a lot in another tract, to wit, lot 30 of Tract 3440.

On October 31, 1929, the plaintiff sued to foreclose both bonds. The complaint sets forth a single cause of action. In it both bonds are described and it is alleged that all the defendants, sued under fictitious names, are the owners of said lots and that both bonds constitute liens on both lots. Without segregating the sums due on each bond, it is alleged that the defendants are in default in the payment of said bonds in the total sum of $153.14. The plaintiff prayed that the bonds be foreclosed; that the property be sold to satisfy the indebtedness and for attorney's fees and costs.

The defendants were served with summons and defaulted. Judgment was entered on August 23, 1930, foreclosing the bonds as prayed, fixing attorney's fees, and taxing costs. A commissioner was appointed, a sale was decreed, and the lots were sold en masse. After the time for redemption had expired, and in January, 1932, one of the defendants, the Pacific Construction Finance Company, moved to set aside the judgment on the ground that the same was void on its face. The motion was granted, and the plaintiff appeals.

[1] On the hearing of the motion it was first disclosed that when the action was commenced the Pacific Construction Finance Company was the owner of lot 30 and its codefendant was the owner of lot 20. This fact is not disclosed by the judgment roll. In cases such as the one now presented we must look solely to the judgment roll to determine its

1. Appeal and error ⇨865.

Supreme Court must look solely to judgment roll to determine validity of judgment foreclosing street bonds, on appeal from order setting judgment aside on motion of defendant who defaulted and failed to redeem.

2. Constitutional law ⇨143.

Judgment foreclosing street bond issued prior to statute permitting foreclosure of street bonds by court action held void (St. 1911, p. 763, § 76, as amended by St. 1921, p. 297, § 10).

3. Judgment ⇨28.

Circumstances showing that valid portion of judgment foreclosing street bond could not be separated from void portion foreclosing another bond, entire judgment was void and could be set aside on motion of defendant who defaulted and failed to redeem (St. 1911, p. 763, § 76, as amended by St. 1921, p. 297, § 10).

Circumstances disclosed that each bond was made a lien on a different lot; that judgment roll declared that all defendants owned both lots; the amounts due on both bonds were lumped in one sum, and no segregation was made as to the liability chargeable to each lot; the total sum was declared a lien on both lots; the lots were sold without segregation, and attorney's fees and costs of foreclosure were allowed as to both, also in a lump sum.

[2] Attached to the complaint and made a part thereof are copies of the bonds involved herein. The bond on lot 20 was issued prior to the amendment in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 297, § 10) of the act of 1911, § 76 (St. 1911, p. 763), permitting the foreclosure of such bonds by court action and the allowance of attorney's fees therein. As to this bond the court was without jurisdiction to entertain an action to foreclose the same. Jeffreys v. Point Richmond Canal, etc., Co., 202 Cal. 290, 260 P. 548. When the court entered a judgment of foreclosure of this bond and the sale of lot 20, it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Its action in this respect was not an error in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and the rule of Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520, and other cases to like effect, is not applicable. Here the court was without power to act in foreclosing said bond and its judgment in so doing was void.

[3] It is argued that the court had jurisdiction to order the foreclosure as to lot 30, and therefore that the judgment as to that lot is not subject to attack herein. But this is not a case where that portion of the judgment which the court had jurisdiction to order may be separated from the void portion and the judgment be immune from attack as to the valid part. See Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) vol. 1, pp. 647-649, § 324. Here the judgment roll declares that the defendants own both lots; the amounts due on both bonds are lumped as one sum; and no segregation is made as to the liability chargeable to each lot; the total sum was declared a lien on both lots; the lots were sold without segregation; and attorney's fees and costs of foreclosure were allowed as to both, also in a lump sum. Under these circumstances the charges for the unauthorized foreclosure must be held to have been imposed upon the Pacific Construction Finance Company to its prejudice and unlawfully. Since the void portion of the judgment cannot be separated from the valid portion, the entire judgment on the record here presented is void on its face. As such it may be set aside by the court at any time. Baird v. Smith, 216 Cal. 408, 410, 14 P.(2d) 749; 15 Cal. Jur. p. 55. The motion was therefore properly granted.

The order is affirmed.

I dissent. The complaint was to foreclose six street bonds, each of a different series, and four tracts of realty are described therein. The moving party herein was served as a defendant by a fictitious name. It defaulted and judgment passed for foreclosure of two of the six bonds. The fact that each of the bonds was a lien upon a separate tract is ignored. The decree foreclosed both bonds as though each bond was a lien on both tracts. Petitioner did not redeem or attempt to redeem the lot in which alone it was interested. It waited until after the period of redemption, and now, since the lot has for some reason become valuable (perhaps it may have a building on it), petitioner comes in and says the decree is void on its face because it included two bonds, one of which could not be foreclosed and, moreover, was never a lien on the lot sold and here involved. Now the lot was subject to sale for the proper amount; that gave the court jurisdiction to act and decree a sale. The debt for which it was sold was simply in excess of the just amount due. Petitioner did not object by appearing, but suffered default and never even essayed to redeem. Personally I think it should not be heard to claim the absence of jurisdiction.

Pen. Code, § 17, provides that crime punishable by fine or imprisonment in county jail or in state prison in court's discretion shall be deemed misdemeanor for all purposes after judgment imposing punishment other than imprisonment in state prison. Gen. Laws 1931, Act 5128, § 146, relates to felony of taking automobile without owner's consent, and sections 153 (c, d), 153½, specify punishment therefor.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

Application for writ of habeas corpus.

[1] Petitioner entered a plea of guilty to a charge of taking an automobile without the consent of the owner, a felony, in violation of section 146 of the California Vehicle Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, p. 2523). He was sentenced to pay a fine of $5,000, with an alternative of imprisonment in the county jail until the fine be satisfied, the court allowing a credit toward the payment of such fine of $2.74 for each day of imprisonment. In the event of nonpayment of the fine, this will necessitate petitioner's incarceration in the county jail for a period of five years. He has now served in excess of thirteen months, and urges that, by reason of the provisions of section 17 of the Penal Code, the imposition of a fine characterized his offense as a misdemeanor, and that under section 153 (c) of the California Vehicle Act, supra, the maximum period of confinement for a violation of the act amounting to misdemeanor is, in the absence of other provisions to the contrary, six months.

We cannot accept petitioner's theory. Under section 146 of the act, the driving or taking of an automobile without the owner's consent, to which charge petitioner entered a plea of guilty, is declared to be a felony. In the absence of a contrary provision, every person convicted of a felony for a violation of the provisions of the act "shall be punished by a fine of not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Section 153 (d). Section 153½ of the act declares that: "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine for any violation of this act may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied. But the judgment must specify the extent of the imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, nor extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted."

[2] In view of these several sections there can be no doubt as to the propriety of the trial court's action in imposing a $5,000 fine on petitioner, with alternative imprisonment of one day for each $2.74 of such fine unpaid. Nonpayment of the fine would not result in petitioner's incarceration for a longer period than that specified for such offense, viz., five years.

[3] We find nothing in section 17 of the Penal Code opposed to this conclusion. That section provides in part that, "when a crime, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, is also punishable by fine or imprisonment in a county jail, in the discretion of the court, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison." In Doble v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 556, 576, 577, 241 P. 852, we held, in effect, that the quoted provision had a prospective operation. It is only for purposes subsequent to judgment, if a fine or county jail sentence be imposed, that the offense is deemed to be a misdemeanor. Any other conclusion would nullify section 153 (d) of the act, authorizing the imposition of a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, for if, as petitioner urges, the imposition of a fine immediately and for all purposes characterizes the offense as a misdemeanor, the fine could not exceed $500 under section 153 (c), which section specifies the penalty for misdemeanors under the act. Such construction of the act is unreasonable and not required by the authorities.

The offense to which petitioner entered his plea of guilty is designated in the statute as a felony. It remained such until the court had completed the rendition of judgment, and, inasmuch as the judgment imposed was one authorized by the act, there can be no successful attack upon its validity. In other words, the offense not being a misdemeanor at the time judgment was pronounced, the court was empowered to impose any judgment consistent with sections 153 (d) and 153½ of the act. The judgment here in question complies with these sections.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner is remanded.

Application for modification of final divorce decree as to custody of children and allowance for their support and education was addressed to court's discretion (Civ. Code, § 138).

Under showing made, court was justified in modifying final divorce decree as to custody of children and allowance for their support and education (Civ. Code, § 138).

Under original decree wife had custody of sons and was allowed $750 monthly for their support and education. The modification awarded the custody of sons jointly to husband and wife with other provisions as to support. The court's power to modify the decree, under Civ. Code, § 138, was recognized in the property settlement agreement of the parties.

PRESTON, Justice.

Appeal from order of the San Mateo county superior court, modifying provisions of final decree of divorce, relating to custody of children and allowance for their support and education.

On January 23, 1928, these parties executed a written property settlement agreement whereby, after specifying the terms of property division, it was agreed that the wife should have the custody of the two minor sons of the marriage, Carlton Beal, then about thirteen years of age, and Thomas Evans

Beal, then about ten years of age, the husband reserving the right to visit them at all reasonable times. It was also agreed that the husband should pay to the wife $750 monthly for the support and education of said sons; that he should require no accounting as to disposition of said payments; that, in event of divorce, the decree should provide for their continuance, but, other than as set forth in said agreement, neither party should assert against the other any property claim. Lastly, said agreement provided: "Nothing in this agreement, however, shall interfere or be construed to interfere with the rights and powers of the courts of California with respect to children."

On January 27, 1928, plaintiff wife, upon grounds of extreme cruelty, secured an interlocutory decree of divorce, wherein the court adjudged said property settlement to be just, fair, and equitable, and awarded custody of the sons to her, with allowance for their maintenance as above set forth. On January 28, 1929, a final judgment of divorce was entered. It ordered that the provisions of the interlocutory decree relating to custody, control, maintenance, care, and education of the minors and the right of the father to visit them at all reasonable times and places "are hereby carried into this final decree of divorce, subject to the further order of the court."

Frequent controversies had from time to time arisen between the parties over attempts of the father to exercise his right to visit the children and he had, on occasions, invoked the aid of the court to secure orders permitting him to take the children out and to have them visit him during school vacations. In fact, on December 11, 1928, the wife was cited for contempt because of her failure to obey an order of the court permitting the father to take the sons to a Stanford-California football game and to dinner and places of amusement on nonconsecutive week-ends. Finally, in September, 1929, with the consent of both parties, the court made an order modifying the final decree of divorce by placing the elder son, Carlton, in the joint custody of the parents; leaving the younger son in the custody of the mother; relieving the father from said $750 monthly payments during the portions of the summer vacation that the children spent with him; ordering enrollment of the elder son in the Menlo School for Boys, to attend there until graduation, with rights to both parents to visit him; ordering the mother to pay his school expenses from said allowance and to permit him to rent a saddle horse and to have $25 a month spending money; and, lastly, giving the father the right to visit the younger son and to have both children during at least one-half of the summer vacation periods.

Some three years later, on October 4, 1932, the court made its further order modifying said final decree of divorce, which is the order here appealed from. It awarded custody of both sons jointly to husband and wife. It provided that until January 1, 1933, Carlton, then recovering from a severe injury, should live with defendant at Los Angeles; that Thomas should live with plaintiff and attend the San Mateo High School; that until said date defendant should pay plaintiff $375 monthly for support of Thomas, but that he should be relieved from paying anything to plaintiff for support of Carlton. It further provided that, if the parties should, on or before said January 1, 1933, file their written consent to placing said minors in a private boarding school, to be mutually selected by them, then the children should be placed in such school commencing with the January, 1933, term; that, if no written consent should be filed, then both children should be placed in the Menlo School for Boys at the opening of said school term, to remain in attendance there until the further order of the court; that beginning January 1, 1933, the father should pay directly to the school where the children attended, the entire expense for their tuition and living, and all incidental expenses, and should be relieved from making any payments to plaintiff for their support.

Plaintiff bases her appeal from said order upon three grounds: First, that the moving papers of defendant for modification of the decree, and the evidence presented by affidavit in support thereof, did not state facts sufficient to warrant the order; second, that a court may not arbitrarily substitute its own peculiar ideas as to the custody of minor children in place of those of the parents, without evidence of unfitness of the parents; and, third, that a court may not, upon the theory of making an order beneficial to the children, make a new contract for the parents, without evidence of unfitness.

[1-3] These contentions have no merit. The appeal is before us upon bill of exceptions which contains lengthy affidavits and counter affidavits, in addition to copies of all moving papers and orders of the court made prior to the giving of the order here in question. The showing so made is abundantly sufficient to support the action of the court. A finding as to the unfitness of one or both parents to have custody of the children was not essential; the application for modification was addressed to the discretion of the court. Section 138, Civ. Code; Guardianship of Shannon (Cal. Sup.) 23 P.(2d) 1020. Admittedly the elder son, who, pursuant to the order of September, 1929, had previously attended the Menlo School for Boys, was suffering severely from injuries received in an airplane accident, and, having been removed from the Stanford Hospital to the southern part of the state, was under medical care at the father's home there, and at his expense. This boy was standing on the very threshold of maturity; the younger son was also rapidly approaching that critical age when the counsel and companionship of his father would be invaluable. Admittedly also, there had been a great deal of friction between these parents in the matter of arranging for the father to see the children and the latter had contributed directly to payment of some of their bills in addition to making the monthly allowance to plaintiff, for which he received no accounting. Properly exercising its discretion in this situation, it is apparent that the court was wisely guided by the considerations specified in section 138 of the Civil Code, to wit: "(1) By what appears to be for the best interest of the child in respect to its temporal and its mental and moral welfare; * * * (2) As between parents adversely claiming the custody, neither parent is entitled to it as of right; but other things being equal, if the child is of tender years, it should be given to the mother; if it is of an age to require education and preparation for labor and business, then to the father."

We find in this record no basis for the claim that the efforts of the father, asserted to be for the welfare of the sons, were a mere subterfuge to cloak his purpose to be relieved of the monthly payments to the mother for their support. Indeed, the court has not relieved the father from supporting the sons; it has merely ordered that the payments be made direct to the school rather than through the mother. It is too clear for controversy that the court had power to so modify the final decree with respect to changing the custody of the children (Van Der Vliet v. Van Der Vliet, 200 Cal. 721, 254 P. 945, and cases cited), and that it had also the incidental and accompanying power to order that the payments for their support and education be made directly to the person, or school, actually furnishing such support and education. This inherent power, conferred by said section 138 of the Civil Code, was recognized in the property settlement agreement, as witness the provision thereof that "nothing in this agreement * * * shall interfere or be construed to interfere with the rights and powers of the courts of California with respect to children." Furthermore, such authority was also expressly reserved to the court by the final decree of divorce wherein are adopted the provisions of the interlocutory decree, relating to custody, control, maintenance, care, and education of the children, "subject to the further order of the court."

Cases cited by appellant, such as Parker v. Parker, 55 Cal. App. 458, 203 P. 420, and Johnson v. Johnson, 104 Cal. App. 283, 285 P. 902, involving awards of alimony against the innocent party, are not in point. The case of Armstrong v. Armstrong (Cal. App.) 23 P. (2d) 50, merely holds that the statutory power of the court to modify its decrees may not be denied where the property agreement, although incorporated in the complaint, is neither adopted by nor referred to in either interlocutory or final decree of divorce. Appellant's position seems to be that that case in effect holds that, where a settlement agreement is adopted by the court in its decree, the decree is thus rested on the agreement; hence the agreement is a part of the final judgment and can only be modified in the same manner as other final judgments. But this statement, if correct, would not be applicable here, for, as above set forth, both by the quoted clause of the property settlement itself and by the express language of the final decree, the court retained its authority to modify said decree with respect to matters affecting the custody of the children and their support, education, and general welfare.

The judgment is affirmed.

Statute held to require that newly elected member of state bar board of governors maintain law office outside city in which holdover member, representing same district, maintained office (St. 1927, pp. 39, 40, §§ 9, 14, as amended by St. 1933, c. 430).

It is matter of judicial knowledge that attorneys in city of Oakland outnumber those in other portions of same state bar district.

Application by Philip O. Solon for a writ of mandate to the State Bar of California and others.

William H. Hollander, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner has filed an application for a writ of mandate directing the respondents to include his name on the list of candidates and on the ballot for the election of members of the board of governors of the State Bar, to be voted for in state bar district No. 3 at the election to be held between the dates of August 30 and September 13, 1933. It is not disputed by the respondents that petitioner has offered to the respondents for filing the necessary nomination papers required by the State Bar Act. Respondents, however, contend that, under the State Bar Act (St. 1927, p. 38) as amended by the recent act of the Legislature (St. 1933, c. 430), the petitioner is not qualified to be a candidate at said election in state bar district No. 3, for the reason that he now maintains, and if elected would maintain, his principal office for the practice of law inside the city of Oakland.

[1] Section 9 of the State Bar Act provides that two members of the board of governors shall be elected to state bar district 3, and that "one member of the board from State Bar District 3 to be elected in 1933 for a two (2) year term, and any successor to said member, at the time of his election shall, and any member from said district may, maintain his principal office for the practice of law outside of the city of Oakland." (Italics added.) Petitioner contends that the language just quoted refers only to the successor to the member of the board of governors elected in 1933, and does not apply to the one to be voted for and elected this year.

A further provision of the State Bar Act (section 14) provides that: "The eight (8) members of the board [of governors] whose terms of office do not expire until the annual meeting to be held in 1934 shall continue in office until the expiration of their terms, and shall be deemed to have been elected from the respective State Bar districts in which their respective principal offices were located at the date of their election." It appeared during the argument as a fact that one of the eight members of the board of governors elected at the election held in 1932, and whose term does not expire until the meeting to be held in 1934, resides in, and maintains his office for the practice of law in, the city of Oakland. Under the provisions of the State Bar Act just quoted, he will be a member of the board of governors representing state bar district 3 for the ensuing year. It seems reasonable, therefore, to apply the mandatory provision relative to the maintenance of his principal place of business to the member of the board from district 3 to be elected in 1933, and to hold that it was the intention of the framers of the amendment to the State Bar Act to require such member and his successor to maintain their principal offices for the practice of law outside of the city of Oakland, and to permit the other member from the district to maintain his office either within or without the city of Oakland.

[2] If it were not a matter of judicial knowledge, as we think it is, the roll of attorneys of this court shows that the attorneys in the city of Oakland outnumber the attorneys in other portions of district 3, composed, as it is, of the counties of Alameda, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara. The purpose of the framers of the amendment to the State Bar Act appears to have been to provide that at all times one member of the board of governors from the district shall maintain his principal office for the practice of law outside the city of Oakland. The same situation exists in state bar district No. 7, comprising the county of Los Angeles. A very much larger number of attorneys have their principal offices in the city of Los Angeles than in the rest of the county. The State Bar Act, as amended, contains a provision with reference to district 7 similar to that relating to district 3. The situation in these two districts furnishes the reason for the legislation, and assists us in arriving at the intention of the framers of the act.

The petition for the writ of mandate is denied.

Action by Henry Pothast against Cora S. PRESTON, Justice.

We have for review upon separate judgments, two causes heard together. Separate clerk's and one reporter's transcripts have been filed. The judgments were for Henry Pothast in both cases, he being a plaintiff in the one and a substituted defendant for Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank in the other; appellants are defendants in the one case and plaintiffs in the other. The judgments are consistent with each other and adjudicate the title to each of two lots, Nos. 35 and 36, both owned by said respondent prior to his negotiations with appellants, as a result of which his title to both was clouded by a written escrow agreement and its amendments. This agreement the trial court has, by its judgments, declared inoperative. The applicable principles of law are simple and require an affirmation of both judgments. The facts giving rise to the application of these principles, however, are quite complicated. But it suffices to say that on April 26, 1929, respondent and appellant Cly entered into a written escrow agreement, making defendant bank the escrow agent. The essence of the agreement was that respondent was to deliver to the escrow party deeds to Cly or his assigns for the lots, in return for two notes which were second liens on other property, together with another second lien on one of the lots to be conveyed, plus a cash payment of $2,000. This cash payment is to be noted as the important item in the consideration of these appeals.

The deeds were duly made and deposited by respondent and the deed to lot 35 was actually delivered to the grantee and recorded and later a mortgage lien was placed thereon by said grantee. This transaction was the subject of the judgment in the case of Pothast, Plaintiff, v. Kind et al., Defendants. The relief there given was a cancellation of the deed and mortgage, together with a decree quieting respondent's title to said lot on payment of the sum of $500. The second judgment decreed that respondent was entitled to a return from the escrow of the deed to lot 36.

The escrow agreement was indivisible and the delivery of the deed that was recorded was not a separate transaction as the consideration from the purchasers moved to respondent in bulk for both lots. Said agreement was dated April 26, 1929, and allowed ninety days for deposit of the above-mentioned cash payment of $2,000. The immediate controversy between the parties, however, is disclosed by the following additional facts: On June 24, 1929, appellants and certain third parties entered into a supplementary escrow with the same escrow agent, but to which respondent was not a party, pursuant to which $2,500 was paid to said escrow agent to be used under certain restrictions. From this sum appellants intended to have paid the $2,000 called for by said first-mentioned escrow agreement.

On July 16, 1929, by written notice, respondent undertook to cancel the entire escrow and demanded the return of his deed to lot 36, together with a reconveyance of lot 35. Following this event, and on July 22, 1929, the $2,500 in the supplemental escrow was returned to the party who advanced it. Appellants did not redeposit any sums whatsoever until August 3, 1929, some nine days after expiration of the time limit provided for by the escrow agreement with respondent. The whole controversy, therefore, turns upon the effect, if any, of respondent's attempt to cancel the escrow upon the duty of appellants to make and maintain said cash deposit during the prescribed period.

[1, 2] It is the contention of appellants that when respondent undertook to repudiate the escrow agreement, they were thereby relieved of any further duty to deposit said $2,000 and the deposit thereof was waived by such anticipatory breach of the agreement. But it seems clear that appellants have a misconception of the nature of an escrow agreement of the type here in question. When respondent delivered the deeds to the escrow party, pursuant to the mutual covenants of the parties, it became an irrevocable act upon his part and his attempted cancellation thereof during the escrow period was wholly ineffectual for any purpose. And, correspondingly, the duty of appellants to provide the $2,000 within ninety days was a continuing one, which could not be waived by the unauthorized action of respondent in the premises.

[3-5] This was not a case where the parties were dealing directly with each other and where an anticipatory breach by one might have excused performance by the other. Under well-settled rules of law, governing escrow agreements, the escrow agent was without power to deliver the deed after expiration of the ninety days unless all the terms of the escrow had been fully complied with. It is well settled that performance must be made within the time limit of the escrow agreement. The failure to have the cash deposited with the escrow agent within the time limit provided by the agreement therefore entitled respondent to the relief given him by both judgments. The provision of said agreement to the effect that the purchaser would carry out the escrow on his part after the expiration of the ninety-day period unless a written demand for return of the money and instruments deposited by him was made, does not alter the situation. Respondent had the right to rely upon the terms of the escrow that required deposit of the $2,000 within said prescribed period.

This opinion could be extended by a recital of further facts and the citation of authority but enough has been said to make applicable the settled principles of law above alluded to.

The several judgments are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by C. H. Hansen and another, co-partners doing business under the firm name and style of Hansen & Buchen, and also under the firm name and style of Hansen & Buchen Company, against George F. Covell, and cross-complaint by defendant, and actions against named plaintiffs and others, by the Stockton Plumbing Supply Company, by J. R. Bickel, and by J. M. Adams. From the judgment, the first-named plaintiffs appeal and the first-named defendant and another cross-appeal.

Judgment modified, and affirmed as modified.

SHENK, Justice.

The cross-appeals involved herein are from a judgment establishing a balance due from the defendant George F. Covell to the plaintiffs C. H. Hansen and Joseph C. Buchen, contractors under a building construction contract. The contractors sought to recover unpaid balances under the contract plus certain items of extras and damages alleged to be due from said defendant, who is the owner of the property involved. A cross-complaint was filed by Covell against the contractors alleging abandonment on the part of the contractors and the cost of completion by said defendant for which he sought recovery against the contractors and their surety. These two actions and three other actions to foreclose mechanics' liens were consolidated for trial. The word "plaintiffs" used herein refers, unless otherwise noted, to the plaintiffs the contractors Hansen and Buchen, and the word "defendant" refers to the defendant Covell, the owner.

On May 25, 1923, the plaintiffs and the defendant entered into a contract whereby the former agreed to construct, exclusive of the steel work on the real property of the latter situated in the city of Modesto, a four-story and basement hotel building, in accordance with certain plans and specifications, for the contract price of $125,500. The building was to be completed on or before the first day of October, 1923, plus such additional time as the contractors might become entitled to under the contract. The Globe Indemnity Company was the surety on the contractors' bond. The contract and the bond were duly filed for record.

Work was commenced on May 26, 1923, and possession of the structure was taken by the defendant on February 21, 1924. Progress payments were to be made as the construction proceeded, and final payment was due thirty-five days after completion. On February 21, 1924, a progress payment in the sum of $11,295 remained unpaid. The final payment in the sum of $12,550 also remained unpaid. In the meantime mechanics' liens of subcontractors were filed against the property. By their action the plaintiffs sought to recover the two sums of $11,295 and $12,550 with interest; also the sum of $3,303.65 alleged to be due for extras, and the further sum of $33,737, comprising twenty-one items of damages alleged to have been caused to the plaintiffs by the acts, neglect, and delay of the owner.

By his answer and cross-complaint the defendant resisted the claims of the plaintiffs and sought to recover from the plaintiffs the sum of $7,284.80 alleged to be the amount expended by the defendant in completing the building, and further sums totalling $29,592.65 as damages.

During the course of the trial the owner paid the claims of mechanics who had filed liens to the extent of $9,183.32, and the surety company paid off a similar amount. There remained for determination in the consolidated actions also the claims of Stockton Plumbing Supply Company for $7,719.50, J. R. Bickel for $6,334.30, and J. M. Adams for $345.76.

After a protracted trial on the numerous issues raised, the court found that the plaintiffs had substantially performed their contract so as to become entitled to a judgment for the sums of $11,295 and $12,550 remaining unpaid; but that the defendant was entitled to an offset for certain imperfections and defective workmanship, including the sum of $2,824.02 for the cost of removal and reinstallation of bathtubs; $512.50 for imperfect columns and plastering; and $50 for concrete sidewalks—making a total to be deducted for offsets of $3,386.52. The defendant was adjudged entitled to a further credit on account of the sum of $9,183.32 paid by him to lien claimants. The court found various items of damages caused to the plaintiffs by the delay of the defendant, including also damages for withholding portions of certain progress payments beyond the times when the same became payable in sums aggregating $2,827.99. Extras to which the plaintiffs were found to be entitled aggregated the sum of $495.65. Interest was also awarded to the plaintiffs on the two unpaid installments on the contract price from the dates they respectively were payable to the time of entry of judgment in the total sum of $8,195.35. The balance of $22,794.15, computed on the basis of the above counter awards, was decreed to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs with costs.

In addition to the above the court adjudged the amounts due to the three lien claimants, and decreed the amounts found to be due to be a lien against the property of the owner to the following extent: Stockton Plumbing Company, $4,855.48 with interest from the commencement of foreclosure proceedings in the sum of $1,608.16; J. R. Bickel, $5,818.50, with interest in the sum of $1,900.68; and J. M. Adams, $298.26, with interest in the sum of $97.03—a total as against the owner of $14,578.16. As against the contractors and the surety company, the court added to the above amounts respectively the sums allowed as a deduction to the owner for defective workmanship; or, in other words, as against the contractors and the surety company, the court allowed the claims of the subcontractors without deduction for the respective items of offset involved in their claims and allowed to the owner for defective workmanship, thus making the total principal due from the contractors or the surety company to the lien claimants the sum of $14,278.06, with interest in the sum of $4,697.75.

[1] The plaintiffs and the defendants Covell and Globe Indemnity Company have appealed from the foregoing judgments, the plaintiffs and the Globe Indemnity Company from that portion of the judgment awarding damages to the defendant in the sum of $3,386.52 for defective workmanship, and the defendant Covell from the whole of the judgment. A question is raised by the plaintiffs whether the notice of appeal filed by the defendant Covell has the effect of an appeal by him from the whole of the judgment. However, the notice of intention to appeal and to prepare transcript, also filed by the defendant Covell, contained such a notice and as such has the effect of a notice of appeal from the whole judgment. Purity Springs W. Co. v. Redwood Ice Delivery, 203 Cal. 286, 263 P. 810.

A consideration of the record leads us to the conclusion that the contentions relating to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the awards to the plaintiffs for extras and damages, and to the defendant on account of imperfections and defective workmanship, are unfounded and that such awards may not be disturbed on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support them. The defendant, however, contends that the plaintiffs have by the contract waived any damages which might otherwise accrue by delay caused by the acts or neglect of the owner. The contract provides that "the time during which the contractors may be delayed by the acts or neglect of the owner or his employees * * * or by the act of God * * * which are not caused by, or the continuance of which is not due to any reasonable acts or conduct on the part of the contractors, shall be added to the time of completion." Throughout the record it is shown that the contractors applied for extensions by virtue of the very acts of delay for which the court awarded damages. By the terms of the contract the contractors were also expressly entitled to an extension by virtue of the withholding of any progress payment by the owner, in addition to which the owner agreed to pay any damages suffered by the contractors for delay in making progress payments. No agreement to pay damages by reason of any other cause of delay was included in the contract.

[2-5] The obvious purpose of providing for the extension in the event of delays for the causes named is to prevent the operation of another clause in the contract which made the contractors liable to the owner at the rate of $25 per day for each day the completion of the building was delayed beyond the contract period. The case of Seebach v. Kuhn, 9 Cal. App. 485, 99 P. 723, relied upon by the defendant as in point, does not involve the precise question nor an interpretation of that clause in the contract with reference to its effect on the liability of the owner for damages for delay caused by him. That case, however, does indicate and is authority for the proposition that the parties may lawfully designate who shall bear the loss under specified contingencies; and elsewhere it has been held that the inclusion of such a clause in the contract indicates the exclusive remedy available to the contractor for any delay caused by the acts or neglect of the owner. It has been held that by such an agreement the damages otherwise collectible are waived, when the contractors agree to accept an extension of time for the delay caused by other contractors (W. G. Cornell Co. v. Schuylkill County (C. C. A.) 222 F. 876; Goss v. Northern Pacific Hospital, 50 Wash. 236, 96 P. 1078; Haydnville Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Art Institute (C. C.) 39 F. 484); or for delay caused by the owner himself (Richard v. Clark, 43 Misc. 622, 88 N. Y. S. 242); and that the acceptance of the extension of time and the waiver of damages by the owner is intended as the exclusive remedy to the contractors for the delay of the owner or other contractors. See, also, 9 C. J. 790, 791. The trial court found that the time for completion was extended by the delay of the owner and his architect. The parties had a right to agree upon the exclusive remedy available to the contractors by reason of such delay. The trial court therefore erred in awarding damages to the plaintiffs caused by the owner's delay, except such as may properly be awarded by way of interest charges as hereinafter noted. The items of damage attributable by the trial court specifically to the delay caused by the acts or neglect of the owner total the sum of $2,694, leaving the sum of $227.99 due to the contractor as damages for delay caused by withholding progress payments as hereinabove noted and other damages not attributable to delay for other causes.

There is another item which should here be mentioned. As to this item there was a concession by stipulation on the part of the plaintiffs which, probably through oversight, was not included in the award of offsets in favor of the defendant. That item is the installation of the mail chute, which was done by the owner although included in the contract, and a credit therefor in favor of Covell is conceded in the sum of $958.61.

An examination of the record also discloses that the findings of the trial court in effect that the defendant was guilty of defaults and breaches of contract causing vexatious delay to the plaintiffs in the completion of their contract, and that such defaults and delay on the part of the defendant were responsible for the filing of mechanics' liens and the commencement of foreclosure proceedings thereon, are supported by the evidence.

[6] The trial court applied the principles relating to the doctrine of substantial performance which are correctly stated in the case of Seebach v. Kuhn, supra, at page 488 of 9 Cal. App., 99 P. 723, and we perceive no justifiable criticism of the resulting finding that the contract was substantially performed by the plaintiffs. That finding is the foundation for the conclusion that the unpaid and liquidated balances provided by the terms of the contract became due and payable on the respective dates hereinabove mentioned.

It is contended by the defendant that the court incorrectly awarded interest to the plaintiffs. It is urged that the application of section 3287 of the Civil Code renders the net balance, if any, owing from the defendant to the plaintiffs an unliquidated sum on which the plaintiffs are not entitled to an award of interest prior to the entry of judgment. The position thus taken by the defendant is that whenever a liquidated sum becomes due under a contract but which is subject to deduction by reason of an unliquidated offset, the balance due is not a sum "capable of being made certain by calculation" because the "person liable does not know what sum he owes, and therefore can be in no default for not paying." Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 67, 18 P. 100, 104, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164.

[7] On the theory that a debtor may not defeat the creditor's right to interest on a liquidated sum by setting up an unliquidated claim as an offset, the result reached in the case of Pearson v. Ryan, 42 R. I. 83, 105 A.

513, 3 A. L. R. 805, has been applied in a number of jurisdictions. In a note to that case in 3 A. L. R. p. 809 et seq., the general rule is stated that: "Where the amount of a claim under a contract is certain and liquidated, or is ascertainable but is reduced by reason of the existence of an unliquidated set-off or counterclaim thereto, interest is properly allowed on the balance found to be due from the time it became due. * * *". California is credited with having adopted that doctrine in the case of McCowen v. Pew, 18 Cal. App. 482, 123 P. 354, 355. The trial court in the present case applied the rule, which is also stated in the same note, that where the plaintiff's demand is liquidated, the plaintiff is given interest on the full amount and the defendant's unliquidated demand is treated as a discount and not as a payment. See Smith v. Turner, 33 Or. 379, 54 P. 166; note 3 A. L. R. at pages 812, 813 and cases cited. The latter principle, however, appears to be applicable in cases where the claim for deduction could not be said to be demandable at the time when the original liquidated claim became due, but was rather the proper subject of a counterclaim for damages than of an offset in the nature of a payment.

[8] In McCowen v. Pew, supra, the court stated and approved both rules, either being properly applicable depending upon the circumstances of the particular case. Thus the same rule later adopted in Pearson v. Ryan, supra, that the offset for defective workmanship may reduce the liquidated demand but "does not impair the claim for interest on the balance when adjusted by the verdict of the jury" was quoted with approval from the case of Tappan & Noble v. Harwood, 2 Speers (S. C.) 551. The court also cited and quoted with approval the same rule from the case of Healy v. Fallon, 69 Conn. 228, 37 A. 495, 497. The case of McCowen v. Pew is also authority for the equitable view, announced in effect in the case of New Zealand Ins. Co. v. Earnmoor S. S. Co., 24 C. C. A. 614, 79 F. 368, that where delay in payment is due to vexatious conduct on the part of the defendant, "it is only just that he should repair the damage that has followed from the breach of his obligation" although the balance due to the plaintiff is "in a certain sense unliquidated." Healy v. Fallon, supra. Application of the foregoing principles resulted, in the case of McCowen v. Pew, supra, in an award of interest on the balance due after deduction of the offset. The leading case of Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 P. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164, which confirmed the rule under the present Code section that interest on unliquidated demands is not recoverable, expressed the view of the court illustrated by cases cited in the opinion that the rigid test there laid down as to what constitutes a liquidated or unliquidated demand was by no means not subject to modification. Among other cases the court especially referred to Mix v. Miller, 57 Cal. 356. We have seen that further exceptions to the rule there stated have since become established.

[9, 10] An award of interest to the plaintiffs in the present case therefore is supported by authority and the only question to be determined is on what amount is the interest properly chargeable. We conclude that the two bases hereinabove mentioned are consistent and that one or the other is applicable, where interest is chargeable, depending upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Where, therefore, in cases such as here presented, the deduction is for defective workmanship, or is otherwise of a character such as to constitute payment to the contractor, and on the theory that the contractor is entitled to interest only on such amount of the use of which he has been deprived during the period of default, the court may properly allow interest only on the balance found to be due after deduction of such offsets and payments. The reason is that to that extent only has the plaintiff been damaged. The court properly disallowed interest on the amount found to be due to the plaintiffs for extras. Stimson v. Dunham, Carrigan, Hayden Co., 146 Cal. 281, 285, 79 P. 968. It follows that the plaintiffs here are entitled to interest on the balance of the two liquidated principal sums after deduction of the amounts found to be due to the defendant for defective workmanship and the installation of the mail chute, and the amount paid by the defendant to lien claimants.

Cases relied upon by the defendant, such as Perry v. Magneson, 207 Cal. 617, 279 P. 650; Stephens v. Phoenix Bridge Co. (C. C. A.) 139 F. 248; Delafield v. Village of Westfield, 41 App. Div. 24, 58 N. Y. S. 277; and Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde, 90 App. Div. 4, 85 N. Y. S. 732, where the plaintiff sued upon an unliquidated claim, cannot control in cases where the action is upon a demand originally liquidated.

The result reached on these appeals is not to be construed as interfering with the application in a proper case of any general rule that where the liquidated demand is subject to reduction by virtue of an unliquidated claim the balance due is deemed to be an unliquidated sum upon which interest is not recoverable. Still v. Hall, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 51; Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde, 181 N. Y. 11, 73 N. E. 494, 106 Am. St. Rep. 493. What we do hold is that the principles hereinbefore stated are applicable in cases such as the one before us, and that the award of interest under the facts herein and the authorities hereinabove cited is limited to the balance of the original liquidated amounts found to be due after the deductible cross-demands have been established.

It is urged by the plaintiffs that the application in this case of these principles and authorities results in an award of interest to both parties, to the plaintiffs on the full amount of their liquidated claim and to the defendant on the deductible offsets involved, which as to the interest thus allowed to the defendant it is claimed is contrary to section 3287 of the Civil Code and the cases relied upon by the plaintiffs. We may say that if the result of the authorities deemed controlling is to cause the modification of the general test or the exception to the general rule as to what constitutes a liquidated sum to be applied to the deductible offsets involved, that fact must obviously be taken as the established result, rather than as constituting any cogent or compelling reason why the authorities should not be followed.

We are not persuaded that there is merit in the defendant's contention that he is entitled to attorney's fees for defending twelve actions commenced by lien claimants. The trial court found that the defendant was not entitled to such fees and on the record presented the finding should not be disturbed.

It is readily apparent that the claims involved on these appeals may be disposed of by a modification of the judgment. From the foregoing discussion these results will follow: The plaintiffs C. H. Hansen and Joseph C. Buchen will be entitled to receive from the defendant George F. Covell the sum of $23,845 (being the sums of $11,295 and $12,550 remaining unpaid under the terms of the contract), less the sum of $13,528.45 (comprising the sums of $3,386.52 for defective workmanship, $958.61 for installation of mail chute, and $9,183.32 paid to lien claimants). On the balance of $10,316.55 the plaintiffs are entitled to interest at 7 per cent. per annum from February 21, 1924, to the date of the entry of judgment, to wit, February 7, 1929, amounting to the sum of $3,580.71. The plaintiffs are also entitled to recover from the defendant Covell the further sums of $495.65 due for extras, and $227.99 for damages, making a total on these items of $723.64, which latter sum will draw interest only from the date of the entry of judgment. It thus appears that the plaintiffs are entitled to have a judgment entered in their favor against the defendant Covell in the sum of $14,620.90.

[11-13] In view of the established liability of the defendant under the supported findings, it is a matter of no concern to him that the lien claimants are awarded interest on their claims, and neither the plaintiffs nor their surety have appealed from that portion of the judgment. The total of the lien claims plus the interest thereon awarded as against the owner, viz., the sum of $14,578.16, deducted from the amount found due to the plaintiffs from the defendant, still leaves a balance due to the plaintiffs, and this condition under the findings also disposes of the contention that the contractors are not entitled to their costs in the trial court. It further appears, however, that the trial court erred in depriving the defendant Covell of any rights of subrogation which he might have against the Globe Indemnity Company. The defendant Covell complied with all of the statutory requirements by which such rights would become created in his favor. The redress of the surety company for any breach on the part of the defendant herein involved is its right to become subrogated to the rights of the contractors to damages awarded on account thereof.

The condition of the record and the application thereto of the principles herein stated sufficiently answer all of the questions raised by the parties, and no other point need be noted specifically.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment herein be modified as follows: By striking therefrom the amounts therein adjudged to be due to the plaintiffs and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs, C. H. Hansen and Joseph C. Buchen, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Hansen & Buchen and under the firm name and style of Hansen-Buchen Company, do have and recover of and from the defendant, George F. Covell, the sum of $14,620.90, and their costs incurred herein taxed at $——."

It is ordered that the judgment be modified further by striking from the paragraph therein which commences with these words: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that if the defendant and cross-complainant George F. Covell shall pay and discharge any of said judgments in favor of any of said plaintiffs, viz., Stockton Plumbing Supply Company, J. R. Bickel, and J. M. Adams, the amount or amounts so paid by him in discharge thereof shall pro tanto discharge and satisfy said judgment in favor of said C. H. Hansen and Joseph C. Buchen, copartners as aforesaid, against said defendant and cross-complainant George F. Covell," all of that portion thereof following the portion herein immediately above quoted, and inserting in lieu of the stricken portion the following: "and any such satisfaction or discharge by said defendant Covell of any of said judgments in favor of said lienholders, in excess of the sum found due from the defendant Covell to the plaintiffs C. H. Hansen and Joseph C. Buchen, shall subrogate said Covell to any rights of such lienholders against the defendant Globe Indemnity Company."

It is ordered further that the next immediately succeeding paragraph in said judgment be modified by adding thereto, after the words "discharged by it" at the end thereof, the following: "provided that such rights of subrogation shall not extend, as against the defendant Covell, beyond the amount of the judgment awarded to the plaintiffs C. H. Hansen and Joseph C. Buchen against said defendant Covell."

It is ordered further that said judgment be modified by striking therefrom the award of costs in favor of the defendant Globe Indemnity Company against said defendant George F. Covell.

Said judgment in all other respects shall remain without modification.

The judgment, as so modified, is affirmed; neither party to recover costs on appeal.

In re HINKEL'S ESTATE.

HINKEL v. HINKEL.

S. F. 14745.

Supreme Court of California.

July 31, 1933.

Trusts ☞ 262.

Evidence showed that trustee willfully commingled and used bonds and proceeds therefrom as trustee's own property; hence trustee was chargeable with entire loss of principal to trust fund which followed mingling and with simple interest at legal rate (Civ. Code §§ 2236-2238).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Hinkel, deceased. Objections by Undine H. Hinkel and another to the report of Ada M. Hinkel, testamentary trustee, were sustained, and the trustee appeals.

Affirmed.

Chas. C. Boynton and John T. Boynton, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John L. McVey, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHENK, Justice.

This is an appeal by Ada M. Hinkel, former trustee under a testamentary trust, from a judgment in favor of American Trust Company, her successor as such trustee, and Undine H. Hinkel, the beneficiary of the trust. The court sustained objections of American

Trust Company, as such successor, and of the beneficiary, to the report of the testamentary trustee, established the account of said trustee, and judgment was entered for the sum of $21,237.14 found to be due from said Ada M. Hinkel to American Trust Company as the balance remaining in the trust fund.

On May 25, 1926, John Hinkel, husband of Ada M. Hinkel, died testate. To his will was attached a codicil which provided that "in case Undine H. Hinkel, my son's wife, shall survive me, I hereby give, bequeath and devise to my wife, Ada M. Hinkel," the sum of $30,000 in trust to be invested and reinvested by the trustee and, in accordance with the terms of a certain property settlement agreement entered into between Undine H. Hinkel and the decedent's son, Hulbert, to which the decedent was also a party, to pay to Undine H. Hinkel the sum of $200 per month out of interest and principal, if necessary, until she remarried and in any event until her younger son attained the age of twenty-one years. Upon the termination of the trust the funds remaining were payable to Ada M. Hinkel or the legatee entitled thereto under her will. Undine H. Hinkel has not remarried. Ada M. Hinkel was named the trustee, and the executrix of her husband's will. At the time of the distribution of the estate of John Hinkel, the value of the estate approximated a sum between $600,000 and $700,000.

By the terms of the decree of distribution the sum of $30,000 was ordered distributed to Ada M. Hinkel in trust to carry out the provisions of the codicil. Prior to distribution the executrix had expended the sum of $1,725 as the proportion of the inheritance tax payable out of said trust property, and the sum of $2,400 to Undine H. Hinkel pursuant to the provisions of the trust. At the time of distribution there was due to the trust from the distributee the sum of $25,875.

The first and only report and account of Ada M. Hinkel as trustee was filed on January 15, 1932. By her second amended first report she admits that at the time of the distribution of the estate the decedent's estate was not possessed of cash in the sum of $30,000 and that she received no money from the estate as such trustee, but that nevertheless she, as trustee, executed a receipt to the estate for that sum. It is alleged in the report that, upon the advice of her attorney, in lieu of converting securities into cash, she selected from the estate distributed to her and set apart thirty $1,000 irrigation and reclamation district bonds which she designated as the "Undine H. Hinkel Trust." It was found by the court that said bonds could at that time have been sold for $28,500 or more and that on that date Ada M. Hinkel was willing to set apart said bonds as trust property in lieu of the sum of $25,875. The report accounts for interest received from said bonds and for payments of $200 per month made to Undine H. Hinkel for February, 1932. The report further shows that in November, 1930, five of said bonds were sold for $1,600; that in December, 1930, ten were sold for $3,000; and that in February, 1931, ten were sold for $3,700. The cash balance on hand as of the date of the report is alleged to be $2,046.56, and possession of the remaining five bonds at a valuation of $4,112.77 is also alleged. It is stated in the report that the trustee conferred in good faith with her attorney and was acting in good faith and with the intent to serve the interests of the beneficiary; and that such breaches of trust as occurred were committed without any wrongful intent, guilty knowledge, or consciousness of wrongdoing, and in reliance upon advice of counsel.

The court found that none of the bonds was set apart by Ada M. Hinkel as trustee as alleged; and that none of the bonds constituted any part of the corpus of the trust; that the purported transactions whereby the same were sold were individual transactions of Ada M. Hinkel; and that the moneys received from sales were converted to the use of Ada M. Hinkel, individually, and of her son, Hulbert Hinkel. The court made a finding that the allegations concerning the good faith of the trustee were immaterial. The balance of the principal sum of $25,875, after crediting the monthly payments to the beneficiary, with simple interest on the decreasing balances at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, amounting in all to the sum of $21,237.14, was found to be due from Ada M. Hinkel as trustee. From the judgment entered on that finding the trustee appeals.

The main point made on the appeal is that the court should have made a finding on the issue of the good faith of the trustee. The appellant contends that, contrary to the trial court's conclusion, section 2238 of the Civil Code is applicable to the case, pursuant to which she claims complete exoneration for any breach of trust committed by her. That section provides: "A trustee who uses or disposes of the trust property in any manner not authorized by the trust, but in good faith, and with intent to serve the interests of the beneficiary, is liable only to make good whatever is lost to the beneficiary by his error."

The theory of the appellant is that the violation, which is assumed by the argument to be the setting apart of the bonds in lieu of converting property into cash, and investing and reinvesting as authorized by the trust provisions, was a mistake committed in good faith, on the advice of the counsel who had previously advised and acted for the testator and drawn the will (although not the counsel now representing the appellant); and that such setting apart was made with the intent to serve the interests of the beneficiary and did in truth benefit the trust which gained by the difference between the sum of $25,875 then due from the estate and the sum of $28,500 found by the court to be the value of the bonds at that time; and that inasmuch as the trust was the gainer by the excess, no loss was caused to the beneficiary by the error.

If all the facts were found as they are stated by the appellant, the point contended for by her might be resolved in her favor. Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 448, 449, 44 P. 182. But neither the findings nor the record supports the premise upon which the appellant relies to relieve her from her unfortunate predicament. The court found that, although the trustee was willing at the time she executed a receipt for $30,000 as trustee, to set apart the designated bonds, said bonds were not in fact so set apart; that they and the proceeds therefrom were converted by the trustee and her son Hulbert Hinkel to their own use, and were treated in all respects as their individually owned property. That the findings are supported by the evidence and in turn support the judgment, and that the liability of the trustee is at least that declared in the case of Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, at page 445, 44 P. 182, is shown by the following briefly stated facts appearing in the record:

In March, 1922, Hulbert Hinkel, the son of the testator, and Undine H. Hinkel were husband and wife and had two minor sons. At that time Hulbert Hinkel and the testator, as first parties, executed a written agreement with Undine H. Hinkel, as second party, whereby the former agreed and guaranteed to pay to the latter the sum of $200 during her natural life, unless she remarried, and in any event until the younger son attained the age of twenty-one years. The testator further agreed, in the event he predeceased second party, that the payment of said sum monthly should be made a charge against his entire estate, except that in the event he should by his will direct the sum of $30,000 to be deposited in trust for the uses and purposes as provided in the codicil to his will, it was agreed among the parties that he and his estate should be discharged from any further liability.

In 1926, when John Hinkel died, Ada M. Hinkel was seventy-one years of age. The son Hulbert lived with his mother. He acted as her agent in all her business affairs, including the matter of the trust here involved. At no time was a separate account kept of any of the proceeds of the bonds claimed to have been set apart for the trust, and at no time was any account kept, either as a bank account or in any other manner, purporting to be an account of the trust funds. Hulbert testified that the bonds designated herein as having been sold were sold through his own individual account, and that the proceeds from the sales were deposited partly to his own and partly in his mother's individual account. Other investments and reinvestments were made with these proceeds and no separate or any account thereof was given or kept. The admissions and undisputed testimony of the conduct on the part of the trustee and her son fully support the conclusion that the entire matter was considered by them as a family affair, with no duty devolving upon the trustee or her son except to make the payment of $200 monthly to Undine H. Hinkel. Under such a state of facts, viz., where trust funds have never been set apart but have been willfully and unnecessarily commingled with and used as the trustee's own property, the liability of the trustee is settled and is at least the liability imposed by the court's decree herein. Sections 2236, 2237, Civ. Code; Estate of Cousins, supra, 111 Cal. 445, 44 P. 182; 26 R. C. L. pp. 1322, 1323, § 184; 39 Cyc. pp. 424-430. Pursuant to the facts and the findings herein, the application of the provisions of section 2238 may affect only the rate of interest with which the trustee is chargeable (Estate of Cousins, supra; 39 Cyc. pp. 428 et seq., § 5), which in this case the court found was simple interest at 7 per cent. per annum on the decreasing balances. The court, therefore, in effect did apply the provisions of said section in so far as the same are applicable to the facts presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

et al. v. STOLL et al.*

Sac. 4754.

Supreme Court of California.

Rehearing Granted Sept. 14, 1933.

Parent and child ¶12.

Son, who relinquished profitable employment to manage aged father's business until final distribution in consideration of salary and child's share as in case of intestacy, had such beneficial interest in subject-matter that contract was not terminated by father's subsequent incompetency (Civ. Code, § 2356).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by the Capital National Bank of Sacramento, as guardian of the estate of John T. Stoll, an incompetent person, and others, against Edwin P. Stoll, sometimes known as E. P. Stoll, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Reversed, with instructions.

Inman & West and Sheridan Downey, all of Sacramento, Morgan V. Spicer, of San Francisco, and Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs declaring that a contract employing the defendant Edwin P. Stoll was terminated by the incompetency of his father and employer, John T. Stoll, and restraining the defendant Edwin P. Stoll from interfering with the possession of the property or its management by the guardian. The facts necessary to understand the controversy are few and free from complications. All the defendants are sons of John T. Stoll, one of the plaintiffs. The plaintiff Jennie T. Stoll is his wife and the stepmother of the defendants. We do not include the bank as a plaintiff for reasons hereinafter to be stated.

For more than eight years before October 26, 1929, Edwin P. Stoll had been employed by the Remington Arms Company, and on the date mentioned, and for about four years prior thereto, was manager of its western cutlery division at a salary of $350 per month, together with his traveling and other necessary expenses when away from his home. His prospects with that company were very good and the opportunity for further advancement excellent. He saw his father rather frequently at the latter's home in Sacramento—probably four or five times a year. For some time prior to 1929 his father had desired him to give up his employment with the Remington Arms Company and take over the management of his father's affairs. The son had put his father off. Finally, in June of that year he received a letter from his stepmother as follows: "Your father wishes me to write you that he is not able to write, let alone go down to Oakland, and he would like to have you come up." In response, he went to Sacramento, where his father, then eighty-seven years of age, insisted that he could no longer put him off, else he would have to make other arrangements. Edwin P. Stoll told his father that he would assume the burden if he could be protected in the term of his employment and his interest in the estate; which employment should continue until the decree of distribution was signed. After consulting with his father's counsel, and after three different drafts of an agreement were submitted, the following contract was signed:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 26th day of October, 1929, by and between E. P. Stoll, of San Francisco, California, party of the first part, and John T. Stoll, of Sacramento, California, the party of the second part.

"Witnesseth: That the parties hereto are father and son:

"That the party of the second part being advanced in years desires the services of the first party to manage his business and properties during the remainder of his life, and thereafter until final distribution of the estate of said second party has been made, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth;

"That said first party is now employed at a salary of $350 per month, and his interests are such that he cannot afford to relinquish said position without assurance of such employment as is herein provided, and this agreement is, therefore, predicated upon such relinquishment of employment by said first party and his employment, as herein set out, by said second party.

"That in consideration of the foregoing said second party agrees to employ, and said first party agrees to accept, such employment for a period of time commencing upon the 1st day of December, 1929, and ending with the final distribution of the estate of the second party, as above set forth, at a monthly salary of $350, payable monthly.

"That in consideration of the foregoing, first party agrees to devote his entire time and his best ability to the management, control and operation of the business and property of said second party during said term.

"That in further consideration of first party surrendering his said position said party of the second part agrees to take no action whatsoever that will in any manner reduce the share of the estate of said second party to which first party shall or would be entitled as an heir at law."

Edwin P. Stoll entered upon his employment as agreed and continued therein for two years. On December 2, 1931, his father was adjudged incompetent and the Capital National Bank was appointed guardian of his estate. On January 8, 1932, this action was commenced to have it declared that the contract was terminated and to restrain Edwin P. Stoll from interfering with the possession or management by the guardian of the property of his father. The first complaint was brought by the bank as guardian, but an amended complaint was filed wherein John T. Stoll appeared by the bank, the wife electing to join with the plaintiff, and the other sons with the defendant. The property consisted of three hotels, stores for thirteen or fourteen tenants, three ranches, and notes, etc., aggregating in value at the time of the contract $350,000 or more, with a monthly income of $1,800 or $2,000. Further, it was stipulated that Edwin P. Stoll performed the terms of his contract, and that there was no objection to his conduct of the position.

Various contentions are advanced by appellants. They complain that the action was commenced by the bank as guardian, but of necessity their argument in this particular must be accorded no further consideration in view of the amendment of the complaint to conform to the recognized procedure. Their other propositions may be included in the general problem of whether in the particular contract the power of the appellant Edwin P. Stoll was coupled with an interest so as to prevent the termination of the contract by virtue of the provisions of section 2356 of the Civil Code, which reads: "Unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency, it is terminated, as to every person having notice thereof, by:

"1. Its revocation by the principal;

"2. His death; or,

"3. His incapacity to contract."

We have an unusual situation—a son sacrificing his employment and chances of further preferment in order to manage an aged father's estate upon the assurance that his employment shall continue until he receives his interest therein, which, it is agreed, shall not by any act of the father be reduced below that which he would take if his father were to die intestate. The intention of the parties is clear and unmistakable. Whether the appellant Edwin P. Stoll was possessed of an interest in the subject of the contract, as a matter of law, it is evident that the contracting parties, including his brothers, and at the time at least Mrs. Stoll, endeavored to so arrange, declare, and contract. We should have no hesitancy at all in declaring under the circumstances of the case, if John T. Stoll, possessed of all his faculties, were attempting to revoke the employment of his son under subdivision 1 of the above-quoted section, that he had parted with his right so to do, and that he would be answerable in damages for such a breach. Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364-368, 17 P. 427; Roth v. Moeller, 185 Cal. 415-418, 197 P. 62. Nor can it be seriously questioned that in the event of his father's demise and the fulfillment of his part of the contract by Edwin P. Stoll he would be able to receive his share of the estate under the contract. Rogers v. Schlottlerback, 167 Cal. 35, 138 P. 728; Roy v. Pos, 183 Cal. 359-367, 191 P. 542. And yet, while these observations are helpful, they do not answer the question of whether the intent of the parties is to govern in the disposition of the case. In Todd v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 406, at page 419, 184 P. 684, 689, 7 A. L. R.

938, it was said: "It is plain from the foregoing authorities that the interest which the attorney in fact must have in the subject of the power in order to render the power irrevocable is such a beneficial interest in the thing itself, apart from the proceeds, that if the power were revoked he would be deprived of a substantial right. In other words, the relation of the attorney in fact to the subject-matter must be such that a revocation of the power would be inequitable." In Lane Mortgage Co. v. Crenshaw, 93 Cal. App. 411, 269 P. 672, 679, in which case we denied a hearing, it is said: "Each case is determined from its own facts and the conclusions reached by a consideration of the entire instrument creating the power in question." Again, in Norton v. Whithead, 84 Cal. 263, 24 P. 154, 156, 18 Am. St. Rep. 172, this language was employed: "The power of attorney also provides that it is irrevocable; and, although this is not conclusive, it nevertheless tends to prove that the parties understood that plaintiff had an interest in the subject-matter upon which it was to operate." In the instant case Edwin P. Stoll had not merely the expectancy of an heir. By the contract he could not be divested of that interest. It was to his advantage to so manage and operate the property that it would not be impaired or wasted. It was his security against the approach of years and the loss of his former employment. Nor is it an answer to say that he might have predeceased his father. First, because in the ordinary course of events such things do not ordinarily occur where the father is as aged as in the present case; second, an expectancy (and the instant interest is much more than that) is a valuable right, assignable in equity, as the following quotation from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, approved in Bridge v. Kedon, 163 Cal. 493-499, 126 P. 149, 152, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404, will demonstrate: "'The assignee of an expectancy, possibility, or contingency acquired at once a present equitable right over the future proceeds of the expectancy, possibility, or contingency which was of such a certain and fixed nature that it was sure to ripen into an ordinary equitable property right over those proceeds as soon as they came into existence by a transformation of the possibility or contingency into an interest in possession. There was an equitable ownership of property in abeyance, so to speak, which finally changed into an absolute property upon the happening of the future event.'" See, also, In re Garcelon, 104 Cal. 570, 38 P. 414, 32 L. R. A. 595, 43 Am. St. Rep. 134.

Considering, then, the intent and purpose of the parties to create an interest in the subject-matter of the power as an inducement to Edwin P. Stoll to relinquish his legitimate expectation of advancement in his previous occupation, we cannot but conclude that it would be manifestly unjust and inequitable to hold that his power or contract of employment was not coupled with an interest.

This conclusion renders a discussion of other arguments unnecessary, and inasmuch as the facts are not in dispute the trial court ought to enter judgment for the defendants.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the lower court to enter judgment for the defendants.

BERKELEY GUARANTEE BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. CUNNINGHAM et al.
S. F. 14940.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 25, 1933.

Appeal and error ⇨44.

Appellate and Supreme Courts held without jurisdiction to review judgment of superior court on appeal from justice's court of Brooklyn township in Alameda county in unlawful detainer action (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 76, 112, 1161a; Const. art. 6, §§ 4, 4b, 11a, 13).

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County.

Action by the Berkeley Guarantee Building & Loan Association, a corporation, against James R. Cunningham and another. From a judgment of the superior court affirming a judgment of the justice's court in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss the appeal.

Motion granted, and application for supersedeas denied.

See, also, 18 P.(2d) 703.

H. H. McPike, of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. S. Hutchinson, of San Francisco, and Robinson, Price & MacDonald, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal in this cause. The action was one in unlawful detainer under the provisions of section 1161a of the Code of Civil Procedure, filed in the justices' court of Brooklyn township, Alameda county. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants. On appeal to the superior court of Alameda county, the judgment was affirmed, and remittitur was issued on May 9, 1933. Defendants thereupon gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment of the superior court. The motion is to dismiss this appeal on the ground that the judgment of the superior court of the county of Alameda affirming the judgment of the justices' court was final. The motion must be granted.

The Constitution, art. 6, §§ 11a and 13, provides that the Legislature shall determine the jurisdiction of the inferior courts of the state. Section 76 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it read when this action was filed, gave the superior court jurisdiction in civil cases and proceedings except cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction was given by law to municipal or to justices' or other inferior courts. Under section 112 of the same Code, it is provided that justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more shall have jurisdiction of actions of forcible or unlawful entry or detainer where the rental value is $100 or less per month, and where the whole amount of damages claimed is $1,000 or less. The foregoing provisions establish the jurisdiction of the justices' court of Brooklyn township in this cause.

Neither the District Court of Appeal nor the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction in such a cause. Const. art. 6, §§ 4, 4b. If it be contended that the title to real property is involved in this action, and the justices' court cannot try such title, the exact question has been but recently decided contrary to the contention. Hewitt v. Justice's Court of Brooklyn Township (Cal. App.) 21 P.(2d) 641. As to the finality of the decision of the superior court on appeal from the justices' court, see *Johnston v. DIAMOND MATCH CO. v. SAVERCOOL et al.

Sac. 4695.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 18, 1933.

1. Dedication ⚡14.

In action to quiet title to road, evidence held to support finding, in effect, of implied intention to dedicate road to public based on use by public for approximately 50 years and acceptance by public, constituting dedication.

2. Dedication ⚡15, 31.

To constitute dedication, there must be intention by owner to dedicate land to public use, and acceptance either by public user or formal resolution.

3. Dedication ⚡15.

Intention of owner to dedicate land to public use may be found in his acts and conduct, and may be either express or implied.

4. Dedication ⚡15.

Implied intention of owner to dedicate land to public use exists when his acts and conduct indicate clearly intention to devote land to public use.

5. Dedication ⚡15.

Intention to dedicate land to public use will be implied from long acquiescence in use of land for highway purposes under common-law presumption of dedication by adverse user.

6. Dedication ⚡20(2).

To establish dedication of highway by user, user must have been adverse, continuous, and with knowledge of owner, for required period of time.

7. Dedication ⚡41.

To establish dedication of highway by user, adverse character of use and knowledge and acquiescence of owner may be inferred from circumstances.

8. Dedication ⚡41.

Long-continued adverse user of road establishes against owner conclusive presumption of knowledge and acquiescence.

9. Dedication ⚡39.

Where owner of strip of land used as road permitted other landowners to acquire and improve their lands in reliance on apparent dedication of road without asserting claim to road as private property, owner held estopped to deny public character of road.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by the Diamond Match Company against James Savercool and others. From a judgment in favor of the defendants J. H. Davison and S. S. Errington, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, for appellant.
McCoy & Wetter and Wetter & Rankin, all of Red Bluff, for respondents.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

This is an action to quiet title to a road, approximately fifteen miles in length, running through plaintiff's timber lands in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in Tehama county. The defendants Davison and Errington alone defended the action. Judgment went in their favor, and plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff contends that the road is a private road and that defendants' use thereof has been permissive only and not such as to give rise to any right. Defendants urge that it is a public road, dedicated as such by many years' user, and that the plaintiff is estopped to deny its public character.

At the conclusion of the trial the court found that the defendants and other persons, and the public generally, have repeatedly used the road; that such user has been open, notorious, and adverse to the plaintiff and under claim of right; that such user has been uninterrupted since 1870; that plaintiff by means of a gate and lock, has attempted to interfere with but has never wholly prevented the use of the road by the public; that it is a public road dedicated as such by the plaintiff and its predecessors in interest; that the defendants, their predecessors in interest, the public generally, and the board of supervisors of Tehama county, have accepted such dedication; that the lands of the contesting defendants can be reached by vehicle only by said road; that the defendants acquired and improved their lands in the belief that the road was a public road; that during the improvement of said lands the plaintiff at no time asserted that the road was a private road; that had they been so informed defendants would not have improved their lands; that without the use of said road the lands of the defendants would be practically valueless; and that the plaintiff is estopped to assert that the road is a private road.

[1] Plaintiff contends that these findings are unsupported by the evidence. While there is considerable conflict in the evidence, defendants' showing is ample to warrant the findings and conclusions of the trial court. Under elementary rules of appellate procedure, we are bound by the findings of the lower court.

The witness McKenzie, called by the defendants, testified that he had lived in Tehama county over sixty years; that he first went over the road in question in 1870; that he then lived in the vicinity and hauled produce over the road many times. James Savercool, called by the defendants, testified that he lived in Mill creek canyon and that over a period of twenty-five years had used the road many times and had seen others using it during all of that time; that there was no other road capable of accommodating vehicles in this territory. A son of this witness substantiated much of his father's testimony. The witness Gallagher testified that he purchased land in the vicinity of the disputed road in 1918; that there was then no obstruction on or across the road; that he had no knowledge of the fact that any one claimed the road as a private road until 1924, when a gate was placed across the road; that the gate was closed only during the deer-hunting season; and that he repeatedly used the road. The defendant Davison testified that he purchased his property in 1923; that the road was then free of barriers of any kind; that at the time of purchase he spoke to agents and employees of the plaintiff and no one stated or intimated that the road was not a public way; that he and others having occasion to use the road did so many times without interference; that he improved his property with materials purchased from the plaintiff and was at no time informed that the road was claimed by it as a private road; that the plaintiff placed a gate across the road at its present location in 1928; and that the road in question is the only means of ingress and egress by vehicle to and from his property. The witness Kopplin, county clerk of Tehama county, produced the official record of the minutes of the board of supervisors of the county, wherein it appeared under date of May 5, 1879, that one D. Howard was directed to remove all obstructions from the road in question, and under date of June 9, 1879, the county roadmaster was directed to open the road and remove all obstructions therefrom. There is also evidence to the effect that persons using the road had from time to time worked on it, and that the forestry service occasionally runs a grader over it. In 1922 a portion of the road was rerouted by the federal government at government expense and the same has been since used by the public generally.

[2-5] The foregoing, and other evidence to which reference need not be made, amply supports the findings and conclusions of the court below. To constitute a valid and complete dedication, there must be an intention by the owner, clearly indicated by his words or acts, to dedicate the lands to public use (City of Venice v. Short Line Beach L. Co., 180 Cal. 447, 450, 181 P. 658), and an acceptance either by public user or formal resolution (Brown v. Bachelder, 214 Cal. 753, 7 P.2d 1027). The intention to which courts give heed is an intention manifested by the owner's acts and finding expression in his conduct. City of Los Angeles v. McCollum, 156 Cal. 148, 103 P. 914, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 378. It may be either express or implied, and is implied when the acts and conduct of the owner indicate clearly an intention to devote the land to the public use. People v. Myring, 144 Cal. 351, 354, 77 P. 975, 976. The law will imply an intention to dedicate from long acquiescence in the use of land for highway purposes, for it is settled that the common-law rule as to the presumption of dedication by adverse user is applicable in this state. Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 592, 41 P. 448.

In People v. Myring, supra, it is declared: "The dedication of a road as a public highway is the setting it apart by the owner of the land for the use of the public, and the subsequent use thereof by the public operates as an acceptance of the same, and makes it a public highway. Such dedication may be express, as by a grant to the public, or it may be implied from the circumstances under which the road is set apart and used. The adverse user of the road by the public, with the knowledge of the owner, for a period of time corresponding to that fixed for conferring a title by prescription, establishes, as against the owner, a presumption of dedication. 'It affords the conclusive and indisputable presumption of knowledge and acquiescence, while at the same time it negatives the idea of mere license.'"

[6-8] Of course, where the dedication of a highway is sought to be established by user, it must be shown that the user was adverse, continuous, and with the knowledge of the owner, for the required period of time. City of San Diego v. Hall, 180 Cal. 165, 168, 179 P. 889. So far as the element of time is concerned, periods varying from five to forty years have been held sufficient. Plummer v. Sheldon, 94 Cal. 533, 29 P. 947; Barnes v. Daveck, 7 Cal. App. 487, 94 P. 779. The adverse character of the use and the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner may be inferred from circumstances, and long-continued adverse user establishes against the owner the conclusive presumption of knowledge and acquiescence. Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, supra; People v. Myring, supra.

Though conflicting, there is substantial evidence in the record now before us to establish, in accordance with the trial court's findings, that the defendants and the public generally over a long period of years have openly, adversely, and under claim of right, used for highway purposes a definitely defined strip of land running through plaintiff's property, and that not until 1924, approximately fifty years subsequent to its original use for that purpose, did the plaintiff or its predecessors object to or attempt to interfere with such user by the public. Under the authorities this is sufficient to show an implied intention to dedicate and an acceptance thereof by the public. In addition thereto the board of supervisors appears to have exercised jurisdiction over the road as early as 1879. Plaintiff's tardy attempt to interfere with the public use of the road has proved unavailing and has not resulted in a loss of such right by nonuser, for there is evidence in the record tending to indicate that those members of the public having occasion to use the road continued to do so after plaintiff's attempted obstruction of the same, in some instances the lock having been shot from the gate erected by plaintiff.

[9] In conclusion, it should be added that, so far as the contesting defendants are concerned, the evidence tends to show that they, to plaintiff's knowledge, acquired and improved their lands in reliance on an apparent dedication of the road. At no time did the plaintiff or its agents inform defendants that the road was claimed as private property. Under the circumstances, the court below properly found that the plaintiff is estopped to deny the public character of the road.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by John Morris against R. C. Cole and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a motion to discharge an attachment, defendants appeal.

Appeal from order denying motion to discharge attachment and denying a new trial dismissed; judgment affirmed.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Rowan Hardin, of Sonora, and Paul R. Hutchinson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Justice.

[1] Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff that he recover from defendants $15,000, the purchase price of certain mining property, paid by plaintiff to defendants as the result of fraudulent representations made to him by them. A writ of attachment was issued upon the filing of the complaint and thereafter levied. The defendants made a motion to discharge the writ, which motion was denied. The appeal is from the judgment, from the order denying the motion to discharge the attachment, and there is a purported appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. Inasmuch as the last-mentioned order is not appealable, an order dismissing the appeal therefrom will be found at the end of this opinion.

[2, 3] In so far as the appeal from the order refusing to discharge the attachment is concerned, it apparently presents nothing but an academic question. The record discloses that subsequent to the rendition of judgment a writ of execution was levied upon the attached property and it was sold thereunder. It does not appear from appellants' brief or otherwise how any disposition that we might make of the order could materially affect the interests of the parties. It is a familiar rule of law that courts will not consume time and labor by attempting to decide moot questions, for which reason there will also be found at the end hereof an order dismissing the appeal from the order denying the motion to discharge the attachment.

Turning therefore to the appeal from the judgment, we discover that the court found that on February 5, 1931, the defendants owned a lease and option on certain mining property known as the "Twin Pines Placer lying about 400 feet above the Goodwin dam on the south bank of the Stanislaus river," in Tuolumne county; that on that day and immediately preceding it the defendants represented to plaintiff and his agents that the earth and gravel therein "contained values of pure gold running from $18.00 to $20.00 per ton"; that they had run a drift or incline through a large deposit of gravel on the property which yielded from $18 to $20 per ton; that plaintiff was denied time to prospect or mine within the property, and that defendants represented that they had other parties standing ready and willing to purchase said lease or take a sublease thereon and pay $20,000 in cash for the same and if the plaintiff was to acquire the property he would have to take it immediately. It was also found by the court that defendants represented they had acquired from the owner of adjoining property the right to dump gravel taken from the mine upon his property; that they "had been taking from said property $100.00 per day or $3,000.00 per month, and that such values had continued through thirty or forty feet of the workings; that they could not produce receipts for the values thus obtained from said property as they had shipped such values and disposed of the same through channels other than through the mint or bank as they did not want the people in the vicinity of said property or around Oakdale to know of the rich values being taken from said property." The findings also disclose that defendants represented that one of them, D. V. Cole, was an experienced mining man of twenty-two years' experience and that the gravel channel was an ancient river channel, all of which representations induced the plaintiff to pay the $15,000 for a sublease of the property.

There then follow findings to the effect that all of the foregoing representations were false and known by the defendants to be false; that in truth, from all the work done by them on the property the defendants had not extracted in excess of $250; that, instead of being in an ancient river channel, the small deposit of gravel was made "by the modern river on a bench while in the process of cutting the present channel of the Stanislaus River."

[4] It would serve no useful purpose for us to set down here all of the testimony adduced by the plaintiff to support these findings. Suffice it to say that we have scrutinized it with care and each of the recited findings is amply supported. That the trial court might conceivably have adopted a different version of the affair from the testimony of the defendants is no reason why the reviewing tribunal should attempt to weigh the evidence. The conclusion of the lower court in such cases is, as has so frequently been said, final.

[5] It was also found that plaintiff had offered to restore everything of value received by him under the contract, and in fact the findings disclose that he did. Under such circumstances and findings there was nothing left for the trial court to do except enter judgment for the plaintiff.

[6, 7] The evidence discloses that respondent succeeded in extracting $489.61 from the property during his operation thereof. Appellants contend that since the notice of rescission did not specifically tender this sum it was for that reason insufficient. There is no merit in the contention, for, as developed by the findings, the respondent had as a direct result of the misrepresentations expended greatly in excess of the mentioned amount, and had allowed appellants credit therefor. Of course, it is elementary that in rescinding on the ground of fraud the injured party is not required to restore that which, in any event, he would be entitled to retain. Richards v. Fraser, 122 Cal. 456, 56 P. 246, and cases there cited.

[8] Appellants also contend that on March 10, 1931, respondent was in default under the provisions of the lease, which required him to pay to them as lessors twenty-five per cent. of all the gold recovered in any month on or before the 10th of the succeeding month, which position was assumed by them in the trial court, pursuant to a notice dated March 17th, in which they asserted their election to declare a forfeiture of the lease for the identical reason. A complete answer to this argument is set forth in the findings, based upon substantial testimony, that plaintiff did not make a complete or general clean-up of gold until after March 1, 1931, and that no royalties or rental fell due on March 10, 1931.

Whether the giving of the last-mentioned notice by the appellants, followed by the notice of rescission of respondent, amounted to a mutual cancellation of the lease, as found by the court, could not alter the outcome of the cause—hence discussion thereof is not necessary.

As already indicated, the following disposition of the appeal should be made: The appeal from the order denying motion for a new trial is dismissed. The appeal from the order denying the motion to discharge attachment is dismissed, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Separate actions by the San Mateo Planing Mill Company against the Davenport Realty Company, Incorporated, the North American Building Loan Association, and others, and against the Peninsula Properties Company, North American Building Loan Association, and others. From judgments for plaintiff in each case, the North American Building Loan Association appeals.

Judgment against Davenport Realty Company and others affirmed, and against Peninsula Properties Company and others modified and as modified affirmed.

Fabius T. Finch and Paul F. Fratessa, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Kirkbride, Wilson & Brooks, of San Mateo (John D. Willard, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

These two actions were instituted by the plaintiff against certain defendants who are the same in each action, although in the first action the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., is named as the first defendant, and in the second action the Peninsula Properties Company is named as the first defendant. The material defendants in each action are the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., the Pacific American Building-Loan Association (hereinafter referred to as the Pacific American Association), and the North American Building-Loan Association (hereinafter referred to as the North American Association). In the first action plaintiff recovered a joint and several judgment against said three defendants in the sum of $567.13. In the second action plaintiff recovered a like judgment against the same defendants in the sum of $1,891.06, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from certain dates stated therein. From these judgments the North American Association alone appeals. These two cases were tried together and by stipulation they are brought up on a single appeal.

The facts of this controversy, or rather controversies, although the two transactions involved are so closely connected that they might well be considered as one transaction, had their inception in a plan of the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., to construct a couple of houses upon two lots in a subdivision in San Mateo county, known as the Belmont Country Club. The Davenport Realty Company, Inc., purchased these two lots, which we will refer to as lots 28 and 34, from the Peninsula Properties Company for $500 each. It then negotiated two building loans to be secured by trust deeds from the Pacific American Association, one for $4,000 on lot 28, the proceeds of which were to be used to construct a dwelling house on said lot, and the other loan for $6,000, the proceeds of which were to be used to construct a building on lot 34. A second trust deed was executed in favor of the Peninsula Properties Company, on each lot to secure the sum of $500, being the purchase price of said lot, but by agreement of all parties interested the liens in favor of the Peninsula Properties Company were subordinated to those of the Pacific American Association. These trust deeds were all placed of record in the office of the county recorder of San Mateo county prior to the commencement of any work on either of said buildings. Thereafter the plaintiff furnished certain building materials which were used in the construction of said houses. The reasonable value of the materials so furnished and which were used in the construction of the dwelling house on lot 28 was $567.13, and those used in the construction of the house on lot 34 was $1,891.06. The materials for the house on lot 28 were furnished on or about April 14, 1930, and on that day the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., gave an order for the amount thereof, $567.13, on the Pacific American Association for said sum, which was accepted and payment guaranteed by said association on said day. Building materials of the value of $1,891.06 were furnished by plaintiff to the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., for the construction of the house on lot 34. Three orders totaling the sum of $1,318.75 were during the months of May and June, 1930, given by the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., on the Pacific American Association, and said association accepted and guaranteed the payments of said three orders. Thereafter negotiations were entered into between the Pacific American Association and the North American Association which resulted in a written agreement of sale of the assets of the Pacific American Association to the North American Association. This agreement was dated August 11, 1930, and was made subject to the approval of the building and loan commissioner, which approval was given in writing on September 10, 1930. By virtue of said agreement of sale the North American Association succeeded to the business and acquired all of the assets, with minor exceptions set out in said agreement of sale, of the Pacific American Association. Among the assets acquired was the sum of $3,950.63, which was designated in said agreement of sale as "Commitments on Incompleted Loans." Of this item, $101.93 was the part remaining of the $4,000 loan on lot 28, and $2,436.60 was the part remaining of the $6,000 loan on lot 34, and the balance was a part of a third loan with which we are not concerned. At the time of the purchase of the business and assets of the Pacific American Association by the North American Association, the house on lot 28 was practically completed while the house on lot 34 was in an unfinished state. On acquiring said business the two houses were completed, and the North American Association paid out for labor and materials used in their completion the total amount of said two loans, except the sum of $64.63 of the $6,000 loan.

Appellant, the North American Association, makes the following contentions on this appeal:

(1) Appellant bought no material from the plaintiff, and by its contract with the Pacific American Association did not assume any obligation of the Pacific American Association to the plaintiff.

(2) The court erred in refusing to permit the appellant to introduce parol evidence to explain the financial statement attached to the agreement of sale.

(3) The findings are not supported by the evidence as to the item of $572.31, which represented the lumber and building materials furnished by plaintiff in the construction of the building on lot 34, and for which no order in favor of the plaintiff was ever given to the Pacific American Association by the Davenport Realty Company, Inc.

[1] The decision of the first question raised by the appellant involves the construction of the agreement of sale whereby the appellant acquired the business and assets of the Pacific American Association. Preliminary to the decision of that question, it might be well to give a few further facts regarding the transactions which resulted in plaintiff supplying building materials for the construction of said buildings. Mr. Hurst, sales manager of the plaintiff, testified, and his testimony is uncontradicted, that at the time he agreed to furnish lumber and building materials to the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., for the construction of the house on lot 28, he knew of the two prior incumbrances against said lot and he was not willing to furnish said materials and rely upon a third lien against said lot as security for payment for said materials. He also knew that the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., was not able financially to construct said building without the assistance of said loan from the Pacific American Association. He, therefore, took up with this association the question of whether the money from the $4,000 on said lot 28 would be available to pay claims for materials furnished in the construction of the building on said lot. While he did not state the result of this interview, it must be inferred that he received satisfactory assurances that said money would be so available, for he immediately furnished materials amounting to $567.13, for the construction of said building, and thereafter an order was given for this amount and accepted by the Pacific American Association. When it came to the furnishing materials for the construction of the building on lot 34, Mr. Hurst stated that he knew of the two prior incumbrances on said lot, but he did not take up with the Pacific American Association the question as to whether the $6,000 loan would be available for the payments of materials furnished for the constructing of the building on said lot, but he did furnish to the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., lumber and other building materials of the value of $1,891.06, and received on account of the materials so furnished three orders which were subsequently accepted by the Pacific American Association, amounting in all to $1,318.75, which left an open book account of $572.31 as a balance due for the said materials. As to the four accepted orders, one against the proceeds of the $4,000 loan and the three others against the proceeds of the $6,000 loan, there can be no question of the liability of the Pacific American Association upon these orders. Having accepted them and guaranteed their payment under the circumstances just related, the Pacific American Association became legally liable for their payment and this obligation on its part was outstanding and unsatisfied at the time this association sold out to the North American Association.

Taking up the agreement of sale, the parts thereof material to our present purpose are as follows:

"Whereas, First Party [North American Association] is desirous of purchasing certain of the engagements, funds and property of Second Party [Pacific American Association] and assuming all liabilities and obligations of Second Party, excepting its guarantee capital stock, surplus and undivided profits, and Second Party is desirous of selling such assets and conveying such liabilities upon the payment to Second Party by First Party for said assets and good will in connection therewith, the sums hereinafter referred to:

"Now Therefore, for and in consideration of the premises, stipulations, agreements and conditions contained and other good and valuable consideration, it is agreed as follows:

"Second Party agrees to sell, assign, grant, transfer, set over and convey unto First Party all of its engagements, funds and profits and assets of whatsoever kind or nature, including moneys on deposit in banks, loans, furniture and fixtures, cash on hand, good will, and any and all property as a whole belonging to or owned by Second Party, of each and every character, kind or nature and wheresoever situated, be it real, personal or mixed property, tangible or intangible property or easements or choses in action, excepting however, the following items of Certificate Loan $75.00; Notes and Accounts Receivable $200.12; Supplies and Deferred Expenses $6,355.78; and Organization Expense $87.50, appearing on the financial statement of Pacific American Building-Loan Association bearing date July 31, 1930, copy of which is attached hereto. In consideration therefore, First Party assumes and agrees to pay all obligations of Second Party excepting any liability which may exist by reason of or under any outstanding guarantee capital stock and any guarantee capital stock surplus and any undivided profits. * * *

"For the purpose of calculating the amounts to be paid Second Party by First Party in accordance with the provisions of this agreement, the same shall be determined as of the 31st day of July, 1930, upon the financial statement of Thomas & Moore, certified public accountants, heretobove referred to and attached hereto."

[2, 3] We think it perfectly plain that by this agreement the North American Association assumed and agreed to pay all obligations of the Pacific American Association with certain minor exceptions therein stated, and that the claims of the plaintiff against the Pacific American Association were not within these exceptions. Appellant makes the further rather startling claim that the only reference in the agreement of sale to any assumption of liability by the North American Association is in the recital of said agreement where it is stated that the North American Association "is desirous of * * * assuming all liabilities and obligations of the Second Party," and that "no such statement is found in the contractual portion of the document." In the closing part of the next to the last paragraph of the agreement, which we have quoted above, is to be found a direct and express undertaking on the part of the North American Association "to pay all obligations of the Second Party" [the Pacific American Association] with certain exceptions which do not include the claims of the plaintiff. It is further contended by the appellant that according to the agreement of sale, the obligations assumed by it are those set forth in the financial statement prepared by Thomas & Moore, certified public accountants. But a casual reading of the quoted portions of the agreement, and they contain the only reference to the financial statement of Thomas & Moore in the entire agreement, shows that this financial statement was adopted as the basis "of calculating the amounts to be paid Second Party by First Party," and for no other purpose. Annexed to the agreement are the resolutions of the respective boards of directors of the two contracting parties authorizing the execution of the agreements by the proper officers. In these resolutions this financial statement of Thomas & Moore is referred to more in detail and a condensed report of assets and liabilities of the Pacific American Association is set forth therein. The claims of the plaintiff are not contained in said report of assets and liabilities, and there is no express authorization for the inclusion in the agreement of sale of any agreement to assume all the liabilities of the Pacific American Association by the North American Association. But reading these resolutions in their entirety, we think their intent and purpose were to authorize the purchase and sale of substantially all of the assets of the Pacific American Association, with a corresponding assumption of its liabilities and obligations, and that the agreement of sale as executed by the officers of the two associations was well within the authority granted them under said resolutions. Our conclusion in this matter is that the appellant by said agreement of sale assumed and agreed to pay the obligations of the Pacific American Association, including the legal claims of the plaintiff against said last-named association. This agreement has never been rescinded by the parties thereto, and having been made for the benefit of the plaintiff, it may enforce the same against appellant. Civ. Code, § 1559.

[4-6] We have already disposed of the four accepted orders in favor of plaintiff, drawn and accepted by the Pacific American Association, and having been assumed by appellant, the judgment against appellant as to these claims is valid and binding upon appellant. The claim for $572.31, for which no order was given, stands upon a different basis. The building materials, represented by this claim, were sold to the Davenport Realty Company, Inc., and were used in the construction of the dwelling house on lot 34. The Pacific American Association made no promise, either express or implied, to pay said claim. It had, however, certain funds in its hands to pay the cost of constructing said building, and it was in duty bound to apply said funds to that purpose. Smith v. Anglo-California Trust Co., 205 Cal. 496, 271 P. 898; Pacific Ready Cut Homes, Inc., v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 216 Cal. 447, 14 P.(2d) 510. When it transferred this fund to the North American Association, its transferee was under the same obligation to administer said fund. The evidence shows, however, that the total amount of this fund, except the sum of $64.63, has been paid out by the appellant for labor and materials used in the completion of said building, and if appellant is obliged to pay the three orders given against this fund and accepted by the Pacific American Association, as we have held that it is under legal obligation so to do, then said fund will be more than exhausted, and there is nothing in the hands of the appellant to which plaintiff's claim can attach. It is true that there are decisions which hold that the plaintiff had an equitable lien against said fund, and ordinarily equitable claims against a common fund, which is insufficient to pay all claims in full, share pro rata in said fund. Under the facts in this case, however, we are unable to perceive how the plaintiff is entitled to the protection of this rule of equity. While it did furnish materials for said building prior to the appellant's purchase of the assets of the Pacific American Association on August 11, 1930, yet it failed to notify either the Pacific American Association or the appellant of its claim of $572.31 until December 15, 1930. In the meantime the building had been practically completed, and appellant had expended, or had obligated itself to expend, substantially the whole fund. Under these circumstances, we think it would be inequitable to permit the plaintiff to share pro rata in said fund. Accordingly, there is no evidence in our opinion to support the finding of the trial court that the appellant became indebted to plaintiff for money had and received in the sum of $1,891.06, or in any greater sum than the difference between said sum of $1,891.06 and said sum of $572.31, which would be $1,318.75. The judgment in the second action should be reduced by deducting from the amount thereof the sum of $572.31.

[7] The assumption by the plaintiff that, by this agreement of sale above referred to, there was a merger of these two corporations and, therefore, the surviving corporation became liable for all the obligations of either of the original corporations, does not, in our opinion, help plaintiff's cause. We have shown that the Pacific American Association never became liable for the payment of plaintiff's claim of $572.31. Therefore, even under the theory of merger, appellant did not become liable for its payment. At most plaintiff had an equitable lien for this amount against the funds created by said $6,000 loan, whether such fund was in the hands of the appellant or the Pacific American Association, and by failing to give notice to either of said associations of its claim until the appellant had virtually expended said fund in the erection of said building, it lost its right to participate in said fund.

[8] Neither do we think that the notice served December 15, 1930, by plaintiff upon appellant, could be construed as a notice to withhold under section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, and thereby create an equitable garnishment of that part of said fund then in the hands of appellant. The notice provided for in said section applies only to the owner of a building, and since its amendment in 1911 this section has no mandatory effect. Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 761, 170 P. 1093; Hornlein v. Bohlrig, 37 Cal. App. 646, 648, 174 P. 697.

[9] The remaining ground relied upon by appellant for the reversal of both judgments relates to the rejection by the trial court of evidence tending to show that the claims of the plaintiff represented by said four accepted orders were not included in the financial statement prepared by Thomas & Moore. The court rejected this evidence on the ground that it was immaterial. We agree with this ruling. We have already given some consideration to this financial statement. The assumption of the obligations of the Pacific American Association by the appellant was not made in reference to, nor was it limited by, the terms of this financial statement. The only purpose of this financial statement, as we understand the agreement of sale, was to determine the amount which appellant should pay to the Pacific American Association for the assets of the latter company transferred to appellant.

[10, 11] A further point is made by appellant that the court erred in refusing to reopen the case some three weeks after the trial and before its decision by the trial court. The granting or denial of such a motion is largely within the discretion of the trial court. Mowry v. Starbuck, 4 Cal. 274. The evidence upon which the appellant based its motion to reopen the case pertained entirely to matters and events which took place between the appellant and the Pacific American Association before the building and loan commissioner at or about the date the agreement of sale was executed. This evidence must necessarily have been known to the officers of the appellant before the case was closed. It was not error, therefore, to deny the motion. Loftus v. Fischer, 113 Cal. 286, 45 P. 328. Besides, we think that this evidence did not relate to any material issue in the case.

It follows from the views hereinbefore expressed that the judgment in the second action should be modified by striking therefrom that portion thereof which permits a recovery by the plaintiff of said sum of $572.31, and interest thereon.

It is therefore hereby ordered that the judgment in the action entitled San Mateo Planing Mill Company v. Davenport Realty Company, Inc., et al., be and it is hereby affirmed, and the judgment in the action entitled San Mateo Planing Mill Company v. Peninsula Properties Company et al. is hereby modified by striking therefrom the last paragraph thereof, and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff have and recover judgment from and against the defendants Pacific American Building-Loan Association, a corporation, and North American Building-Loan Association, a corporation, in the sum of $1,318.75, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on $1,144.19 from May 22, 1930, and on $174.56 from June 10, 1930, and costs of suit in the sum of $23.95. The judgment as so modified is affirmed.

As the appeals are from two separate judgments, one of which was affirmed and the other affirmed after modification, we think that the proper order to make herein regarding costs on appeal would be that the appellant recover one-half only of its costs, and it is so ordered.

Action by August Reusche against Pearl Milhorn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

M. J. Cheatham, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

L. C. Smith, of Redding, for respondent.

WASTE, Chief Justice.

[1] Plaintiff obtained judgment in the court below for the sum of $91.33, together with interest and costs of suit; that amount being found by the trial court to be one-fourth of the cost of the construction of a division fence between the lands of the respective parties located in Shasta county. Although the amount is far below the jurisdictional amount warranting an appeal to this court, actions of this kind involve the title to real property. Jurisdiction to try the cause was in the superior court, and an appeal, therefore, lies to this court.

[2] The defendant, Pearl Milhorn, who appeals, is the wife of A. J. Milhorn, and it appears from the transcript of the testimony that this is the second suit brought by the respondent to recover one-half the cost of the building of the fence, which amount he is entitled to recover under the provisions of the act concerning lawful fences. Stats. 1859, p. 280, continued in force by the provisions of section 19 of the Political Code. In the first action the court allowed a recovery against A. J. Milhorn for but one-quarter of the cost, on the ground that the wife, defendant in this action, had an interest in the property which was subject to its proportion of the cost of the fence. It appears that the former case was tried by the same judge who presided in the present case. He and the parties were, of course, very familiar with the lay of the land comprising the holdings of the parties, and their respective locations. A diagram of the property was drawn upon the blackboard of the courtroom, and testimony as to plots, direction of roads, and location of fences was given with reference to that diagram, copy of which has not been brought here in the record. Much of the testimony is of that indefinite character frequently given by witnesses when referring to maps and diagrams in court, such as "beginning here," "running there." Discrepancies occur in the record in the description of sections, and in one instance two parcels of the plaintiff's land appear to be located some miles apart.

At the outset of the trial in the court below, appellant's counsel announced that he expected "to make a technical defense" to the case, and his attack on the judgment here is of the same nature. The necessity for the construction of the fence appears to lie in the fact that, without it, cattle belonging to each of the parties overrun and graze on the lands of the other. The cost of the fence is small, and the amount does not appear to be challenged. The claim should be paid.

While the record is not lengthy, we have found it well-nigh impossible, because of the manner in which the testimony was introduced in the court below, to determine all of the points urged by the appellant. We therefore accept the findings of the trial court as sufficiently determinative of all the necessary issues tried in the cause, and, as the findings support the judgment, the judgment is affirmed.

CURTIS, Justice.

[1] Defendant and three other persons were charged in an indictment presented by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco with the crime of conspiring to commit the crime of grand theft of a certain $500, and also as the overt act it was alleged that sum was actually stolen. The defendant pleaded not guilty. The case was set for trial and a jury impaneled to try the case. Thereafter the court, upon motion of the district attorney and without the consent of the defendant, dismissed said charge, and the jury was discharged. Subsequently, a second indictment was filed against the defendant alone, charging her simply with the crime of grand theft in taking the identical $500, which in the prior indictment she was charged with taking as the overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. To this second indictment the defendant pleaded not guilty, once in jeopardy, and former acquittal. Upon the trial under the second indictment, the jury found her guilty, and, upon her pleas of once in jeopardy and former acquittal, the verdict of the jury was for the people and against the defendant. The defendant has appealed from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

Defendant contends that, since the theft of the sum of $500 was an essential element of the crime of conspiracy, it having been alleged in the first indictment as the overt act committed in furtherance of the conspiracy, the dismissal of said indictment after the impaneling of the jury, under the circumstances detailed above, operated as an acquittal of defendant of the overt act as the substantive offense in the second indictment. It is admitted that the proceedings taken at the first trial, in legal effect, amounted to an acquittal of defendant of the crime of conspiracy. While there is some diversity of opinion upon the question presented, the overwhelming weight of authority is that the acquittal of a defendant of the crime of conspiracy to commit a crime is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution of said defendant for the commission of said crime, even though said crime is alleged in the conspiracy indictment as the sole overt act committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. 16 Cor. Jur. 280; Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 26 S. Ct. 688, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 362; Bens v. United States (C. C. A.) 266 F. 152; Bell v. United States (C. C. United States*, 60 App. D. C. 124, 49 F.(2d) 506. In the Bens and Fall Cases the Supreme Court of the United States denied a petition for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of reviewing the decision therein. Bens v. Power, 251 U. S. 634, 41 S. Ct. 8, 65 L. Ed. 449; Fall v. U. S., 283 U. S. 867, 51 S. Ct. 657, 75 L. Ed. 1471. We feel that these authorities are decisive of the questions. There are two decisions of the District Court of the United States (United States v. Rachmil et al., 270 F. 869, and United States v. Clavin, 272 F. 985) expressing a contrary rule. They are out of line with the vast majority of decisions upon the subject. There is also language in a number of the decisions of this state expressing approval of the majority rule. People v. Clensey, 97 Cal. App. 71, 274 P. 1018; People v. Eiseman, 78 Cal. App. 223, 248 P. 716; People v. Martin, 114 Cal. App. 392, 300 P. 130. Appellant relies with some assurance upon the case of Oliver v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. App. 94, 267 P. 764. In that case the court held that the acquittal of defendants of the crime charged as the overt act in the conspiracy charge was a bar to any further prosecution on the conspiracy charge. But the reverse of that rule is not true. (See authorities above cited.) The cases of People v. Keyes, 103 Cal. App. 624, 284 P. 1096; In re Getzoff, 104 Cal. App. 261, 286 P. 1044, and In re Berman, 104 Cal. App. 259, 286 P. 1043, are in no way helpful to appellant.

The above conclusion is the same as that reached by the District Court of Appeal when the case was before that court for decision, but we have deemed it advisable to rewrite the decision, for the reason that on reargument before us the parties presented many additional authorities not cited in their former briefs, nor referred to by the District Court of Appeal in its opinion.

[2] We are also in accord with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in its disposition of a further contention of appellant regarding the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. That court disposed of that point in the following language: "The defendant further contends that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury which found appellant guilty of grand theft by means of false pretenses, because it affirmatively appears that the persons who parted with their money did not rely upon any statements made by the defendant. The defendant quotes evidence which sustains her contention. The Attorney General quotes evidence which sustains the judgment. In other words, there was a conflict in the evidence on the subject. That conflict was for the jury's solution. This court may not disturb the verdict."

The order and judgment appealed from are hereby affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Ralph O. Mar-ron, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

The appellants, Florence B. MacMullen and Thomas D. MacMullen, are husband and wife. They were jointly indicted by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco with Pansy B. Connor and Herschel M. Connor, who are also husband and wife, and accused of the crime of conspiracy to commit grand theft. Each one of the four defendants entered a plea of not guilty to the charge. They were tried together, and, acting on the advice of the court, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty as to Mr. and Mrs. Connor. After deliberation the jury found the other two defendants guilty. From the order denying their motion for a new trial and the judgment of the court sentencing them to the state prison, they have appealed to this court.

It is contended by the appellants that, as a husband and wife are in law regarded as one person, and two persons are necessary to commit the crime of conspiracy, the acquittal of Mr. and Mrs. Connor also entitled them to an acquittal.

[1, 2] That the question thus presented may be better understood, it is undisputed that it is the law that on a charge of conspiracy, even though but one person is indicted, the statement of the offense in the indictment must show that two or more persons, even though the other person or persons are unknown, did in fact conspire together to commit the crime. Upon a trial for the offense, the evidence must show that at least two of the persons named in the charging part of the indictment committed the offense because the gist of the offense is the conspiracy. If these elements are not present, then a conviction cannot be had. Section 182 of the Penal Code provides that, if two or more persons conspire to commit any crime (and the crime here charged is grand theft), they are guilty of a felony.

[3] In People v. Richards, 67 Cal. 412, 413, 7 P. 828, 829, 56 Am. Rep. 716, it is said: "No one can dispute, or has ever disputed, that the offense cannot be committed by one alone, and it would seem that the husband and wife were one, in the sense that they could not conspire without the co-operation of another, at least." It is further said in this case, citing from Wharton's Criminal Pleading and Practice: "In an indictment for conspiracy less than two cannot possibly be joined; a wife and husband together not being sufficient. * * *

In People v. Miller, 82 Cal. 107, 22 P. 934, 935, a man and wife were charged with criminal conspiracy and convicted by the jury. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the sole contention was made that the information did not accuse the appellant of any crime because, a man and his wife being in law but one person, no prosecution for a conspiracy can be maintained against them. It was held: "That such was the rule of the common law we cannot doubt, and we find nothing in the Code or statute of this state to indicate an intention of the legislature to change it."

In the case of Dawson v. United States, 10 F.(2d) 106, 107, decided by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, on January 18, 1926, in a case arising in the state of Idaho, a man and a woman, claiming to be husband and wife, were charged with conspiracy to violate the White Slave Act (18 USCA § 397 et seq.). On a trial of the charge, evidence was admitted from which the jury could have found as a fact that the parties charged were husband and wife, and an instruction was offered on their behalf in the following language: "That if you find from the evidence that the defendants were man and wife during the period covered by the first count or charged in the indictment, and the evidence herein, you should find both defendants not guilty on that count. The charge is one of conspiracy to commit crime, and it is not legally possible for a wife so to conspire with her husband, nor a husband with his wife." An exception was reserved, and error is assigned on the refusal of this request. * * * In 12 C. J. 543, it is said: 'It has been uniformly held that, as husband and wife are considered one in law, they cannot be guilty of a conspiracy.' In 2 Bishop on Criminal Law (9th Ed.) § 187, the law is thus stated: 'Husband and wife, being regarded in the law as one person, cannot without other combination commit this offense. But, where there is another conspirator, a wife may be joined with her husband in the indictment.' The same rule is announced in a note in 4 A. L. R. 282. The language of these text-writers is supported by the following decisions: People v. Miller, 82 Cal. 107, 22 P. 934; Merrill v. Marshall, 113 Ill. App. 447, 456; Worthy v. Birk, 224 Ill. App. 574, 583; Commonwealth v. Allen, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 65, 66; State v. Clark, 9 Iloust. (Del.) 536, 540, 33 A. 310. The law is held to be otherwise in Smith v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 233, 89 S. W. 817, 820, 821, and Dalton v. People, 68 Colo. 44, 189 P. 37. The common-law rule unquestionably supports defendants' contention; a rule so well established and so generally recognized by the modern authorities should not be judicially repealed. We think the requested instruction should have been given. The government relies on Wilson v. U. S., 232 U. S.

563, 34 S. Ct. 347, 58 L. Ed. 723. This was not a conspiracy case. The court affirmed the conviction of a man and wife charged with violation of the White Slave Act."

In People v. Eppstein, 108 Cal. App. 72, 80, 290 P. 1054, 1058, while the point in issue was not directly involved, the court says: "It is true that it was flatly held in People v. Miller that a prosecution will not lie for the specific crime of conspiracy where the only parties charged with participating in it are husband and wife. No conspiracy, as such, has in the present case been charged in the information."

The people concede that by force of the decision in the case of People v. Miller, supra, the appellants would be entitled to an acquittal, except that since the rendition of that decision the status of married women has undergone a great change; and, although at common law the wife was little more than a chattel, at the present time she occupies before the law practically the same status as the male. In support of this contention, certain changes in the law relating to the civil rights and duties of women are cited, but these do not purport to affect the criminal responsibility of women.

In the cases of Smith v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 233, 89 S. W. 817, and Dalton v. People, 68 Colo. 44, 189 P. 37, relied upon by the people, it was held that the common-law rule has been abrogated by statute. But in People v. Miller, supra, after referring to the common-law doctrine, it is said: "We find nothing in the Code or statute of this state to indicate an intention of the legislature to change it."

It is worthy of remark that section 26 of the Penal Code makes all persons capable of committing crime with certain exceptions, one being married women who, acting under the threats, command, or coercion of their husbands, commit acts declared by the Code to be misdemeanors; and that section 182 of the same code, defining conspiracy, adds no exceptions to those contained in the above section.

In People v. Graff, 59 Cal. App. 706, 211 P. 829, a similar question was considered; namely, whether a married woman could commit the crime of embezzlement if her alleged criminal acts concerned the property of her husband. It was held that she might be guilty of the offense under such circumstances, and a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court. However, People v. Miller, supra, has never been overruled, and until this is done we are bound to follow that decision. Canadian Bank of Commerce v. Leale, 14 Cal. App. 307, 111 P. 759; Eddlemon v. Southern Pacific Co., 41 Cal. App. 340, 182 P. 811; Blair v. Williams, 86 Cal. App. 676, 261 P. 539; Capron v. West, 114 Cal. App.

633, 300 P. 149. Nevertheless, it appears to us that the question merits further consideration by that court or by the Legislature.

For the reasons stated, the order and judgment appealed from are reversed and the caused remanded.

Employee's claim for compensation brought more than six months after injury held not barred by limitation, where claim was brought within six months after last payment by employer to employee (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11, subd. b(1), and subd. c).

SEAWELL, Justice.

Petition by James P. Bulger, after order denying a rehearing, praying for a review of an order made by the Industrial Accident Commission denying petitioner compensation rating for an injury alleged to have been suffered by him arising out of and in the course of his employment, while engaged as assistant engineer and watchman at the Shredded Wheat Company's plant located in the city of Oakland, this state, on July 28, 1931. Respondent Shredded Wheat Company, a corporation, which is an adjunct of the National Biscuit Company, is self-insured. The commission held that petitioner's claim for compensation was barred, inasmuch as no claim was filed within a period of six months following the day of alleged injury, and no medicinal treatment was furnished or compensation paid, or other act done by the employer during or after the expiration of said six months' period which could be said to be sufficient to toll the statute. No other issue was decided.

Petitioner at the time of said injury was forty-six years of age, and apparently in sound health. He had been in the employ of the company continuously for a period of nine years and admittedly was a very trustworthy employee. His stipend was $43 per week. Prior to July 28, 1931, the duty of watchman was consolidated with his duty as assistant engineer, and he was working in such dual capacity at the time he claims to have received injuries which have resulted in total permanent disability. Permanent disability, rapidly following the incident which will hereafter be related, is admitted by respondent Shredded Wheat Company, and it was solely for this reason that his employment came to an end by order of said company. Petitioner's hours on the Sunday night in question were from 12 o'clock midnight to 8 o'clock the following morning.

The building in which petitioner was working is a four-story building proper. The roof also serves as a floor. The smokestacks are visible from the roof. A steel staircase leads from the basement in which the steam engines are located to the roof. These stairways, which have iron railings, are somewhat precipitous. At about 2 o'clock a. m., petitioner made his way to the roof of the building on his rounds, punching the time clocks which were placed on each floor. This took his attention from the boilers from fifteen to twenty-five minutes. No claim is made that petitioner was not at all times acting within the scope of his employment. While on the roof in the performance of duty, he observed that the smoke coming from the stacks appeared white, resembling steam. This indicated that the fires were out and quick action was necessary in reaching the boiler room, as the danger was great that the engine would back fire and blow the front out and cause serious damage. Such a casualty had occurred once before. With the seriousness of the situation in his mind, petitioner describes the hurried descent he made to the basement down a dimly lighted stairway. He was saved from falling headlong several times by grabbing the railing on his way to the engine rooms. Petitioner claims that his arms and body were badly wrenched and jarred by catching the railing to break the momentum of his descent. He also claims that he experienced severe pain through his shoulders and arms, especially in the left arm, before he reached the engine room. He testified that he related his experience to two fellow employees on the morning of the incident, but made no formal report to the company, as he did not then regard it as serious. Petitioner, though suffering pain, continued to work until August 7, a period of ten days from the day of injury, when he was compelled to lay off by reason of increasing pain and go under the care of a physician. On August 9 he was placed in a hospital, where he remained for a week under treatment. He testified that, immediately after making the violent descent described down the stairway, his troubles started and grew progressively worse until halted somewhat by hospital treatment which he received. He suffered severe pain in his arms, shoulders, and chest. His left hand and fingers also became seriously involved. Dr. Frank R. Makinson, the company's physician, who saw the petitioner twice, testified that he did not regard the case as a proper charge on industry. He diagnosed it as rheumatic endocarditis bearing no causal relation to the injuries which petitioner claimed to have suffered. When asked if a severe strain such as petitioner described could have been the proximate cause of the development of rheumatism or arthritis, his answer was that such things were debatable, and possibly within the realm of possibility, but not probability. When pressed further he said: "I say that it is within the realm of very remote possibility, but not probability. To say no, I think would be unfair. The picture is that of acute rheumatism. There is nothing unusual about this acute attack of rheumatism, as I see it."

Dr. H. L. Parish, the physician who had charge of the case from August 7, 1931, and made fifty-eight visits, ending August 27, 1932, in a very full report described the pain centers in the left shoulder, anterior chest wall, and right shoulder, all of which were swollen on his visit of August 9. The knees, ankles, wrists, and joints of the fingers were also badly swollen. The character of the approach, involving one joint after another, indicated to him the beginning of articular rheumatism. He felt positive that the original muscular strain furnished the evidence of an accidental etiology.

No other physician testified in the proceeding. What relation the mental and physical shocks may have had to the ills, if any, which have permanently afflicted petitioner, was not found by the commission, as compensation was denied on the ground that the proceeding was barred by the statute of limitation.

The question presented is whether as a matter of law petitioner's claim was barred, as held by the Industrial Accident Commission, by the provisions of section 11, subdivision (b) (1) and (c), of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of this state. The issue was decided by the commission upon the interpretation it placed upon certain letters and certain acts of the parties about which there is no dispute.

Subdivision (b) (1) of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 841) provides that proceedings for the collection of the benefit provided by the act for the collection of disability payment must be commenced within six months from the date of the injury. Subdivision (c) provides that the payment of compensation, or any part thereof, or agreement therefor, shall have the effect of extending the period, within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of agreement or last payment of such compensation, or any part thereof, or the expiration of the period covered by any such payment. The concluding language of said subdivision (c), however, excepts, from the bar of the six months' period, persons suffering from the following physical disabilities: "Provided, further, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to an employee who is totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury, during the continuance of such condition or until the expiration of six months thereafter." It is admitted that petitioner was totally and permanently disabled immediately following the alleged injury, as that was made the specific ground of discharge by the employer in February, 1932, after awaiting his recovery for several months. That he was bedridden at least for a long period and suffered severe pain following his return from the hospital on August 16, 1931, the testimony of the medical witnesses and the evidence obtained from other sources abundantly establishes. The evidence also would seem to justify without conflict a finding that petitioner was actually bedridden for a sufficient period of time immediately following July 28, 1931, the date of the alleged injury, to have tolled the running of the six months' statute, as provided by section 11, subdivision (c), of said act. This important question was not called to the attention of the commission, and consequently it was not considered by it in ruling that petitioner was barred by said statute of limitations. Unquestionably the matter is sufficiently important to require a ruling as to whether petitioner's condition, provided it be shown that he sustained a compensable injury, brought him within the bedridden exception provided in said section. As the case now stands, this important factor in the case, which bears directly upon the question whether or not the petitioner's claim is barred by the general six months' provision, has not been considered or adjudicated.

We now turn to the effect of the undisputed testimony and facts upon which the decision turned. It may be noted at the outset that the commission, as mildly suggested by its counsel, seemed to have entertained doubts as to whether the difficulty in the engine room, which gave reason for petitioner's alarm and caused him to descend the steep stairway in the manner related by him, actually occurred. And, if so, whether his rapid descent was the cause, or in any way contributed to the sudden and serious illness which immediately followed the day on which he claims the incident occurred. This, of course, goes to the merits of the proceeding and has no bearing on the ruling as to the bar of the statute. Without any purpose of prejudging the case upon its merits, we may state that we have read the record, and it cannot be said that petitioner's claim has not the color of merit.

We now direct attention to the consideration of the facts from which the commission drew its deduction to the effect that petitioner's claim was barred.

The morning of July 28, after having finished his night's assignment, petitioner told his fellow workmen, Bill Wharf and George Utley, the latter being in charge of the steam plant, of his hurried and stumbling descent from the fourth to the ground floor, and of the pains which he felt in his arm and chest immediately thereafter. He had never suffered similar pains before and they grew gradually more severe. Ten days later he was sent to the hospital by his physician, where he remained for a week. He was thereafter confined to his bed at intervals of various duration, and the prognosis as to returning health was not encouraging. On August 17, the day after petitioner had returned from the hospital, Dr. Frank R. Makinson, physician in charge of the compensation cases for the Shredded Wheat Company, called upon petitioner at the request of Mr. Campbell, manager of said company. The doctor made no physical examination of petitioner. He testified that his visit was limited to the sole purpose of ascertaining the cause of the accident, and the manner of its occurrence. Petitioner had previously testified as to Dr. Makinson's visit. In his testimony petitioner stated that Dr. Makinson, in concluding his investigation as to the cause of the injury, said: "I think you are just a faithful employee tending to the line of your duties. The employer will take care of everything; look out for all this."

It is the claim of petitioner that he was led to believe that the company, which was self-insured, was taking a paternal interest in his welfare and that his interests would not be allowed to suffer. There is testimony in the record to the effect that petitioner was told by the manager not to ask for compensation, as it would "hurt him on the job." Petitioner testified that his wife, who visited the manager in petitioner's behalf, reported to him the above advice as coming from said manager. No direct denial was made of this testimony. The time at which it was spoken is left in a state of uncertainty.

Dr. Makinson's attention being called to the testimony of petitioner to the effect that he (Dr. Makinson) assured petitioner on his visit of August 17 "that the employer would take care of everything," etc., gave the following testimony: "I don't exactly recall the line of questioning which would be peculiar to me in my questioning as to this. I probably asked him if it were not the fact of a faithful employee carrying out his duties, yes, but at no time did I tell him that the Shredded Wheat would accept responsibility. That I want specifically understood, both from your point of view and the viewpoint of the Shredded Wheat Company. I do not accept any responsibility financially. Mine is purely a medical opinion."

It will be observed that the doctor denied emphatically that his visit was for the purpose of examining petitioner or for the purpose of gaining any information as to petitioner's physical condition, but it was made solely as an investigator of the facts of the alleged injury as related by petitioner.

The physician was next asked: "Q. Did you say any such thing as this, that you imagined from the circumstances that he [petitioner] would be taken care of? A. I told him this would be properly disposed of, and he assumed, I presume, that that meant the company would assume responsibility. Properly taken care of may mean anything. From my point of view, the proper disposition of this case, that is what I meant." (Italics supplied.) We are of the view that petitioner was justified in inferring from the foregoing language that the company would see to it that he would lose no legal rights by intrusting himself to his employer's care. There is nothing in the doctor's evidence elsewhere which tends to qualify or refute the testimony above quoted.

Petitioner's application for adjustment was filed July 25, 1932. The accident is alleged to have occurred on July 28, 1931. Consequently, if the six months' period of limitation has not been tolled, the claim is barred. Petitioner performed no service after August 7, 1931. It seems, however, that two fellow employees put in extra time and performed petitioner's duties for a period of two weeks immediately following August 7, and that the compensation for said two weeks was paid by the company to petitioner, although he did no work. On December 22, 1931, approximately five months after said injury, said company sent to petitioner the following letter, inclosing a check in the sum of $86, the amount being one-half of his regular salary:

"December 22, 1931.

"Mr. James Bulger, 2215 62d Avenue, Oakland, California.

"Dear Jim: I am happy to enclose our check No. 8982 in the amount of $86.00 in payment of one-half of your regular salary for the month of December.

"This was made possible through the kindness of Dr. E. T. Oakes, manager at Niagara Falls, from whom we just received a wire of authorization.

"All the gang join me in wishing you and your family a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

"Cordially,

"Shredded Wheat Bakery

"National Biscuit Company Manager."

"BLC:B

In January, 1932, petitioner was sent two checks in the sum of $21.50 each. That sum equaled half pay for two weeks, and on February 6, 1932, he was given a check representing the sum of $86, which was half pay for the preceding four weeks. A short time after said last payment was made the company's physician made a physical examination of petitioner and pronounced him permanently disabled and unfit for future service, of which he was notified. He received no further assistance from said company thereafter. This was in February, 1932, a short time after the last payment of one month's half pay was made by the company, to wit, February 6, 1932, and also a short time after the six months' period of limitation, reckoning from July 28, 1931, had expired.

From a communication of Dr. H. L. Parish, dated September 9, 1932, addressed to the commission as explanatory of his bill for medical services rendered petitioner over a long period of his illness, and which is of record in the proceedings, we take the following excerpt: "This [bill for medical attention] included reports and long and frequent telephone communications with the authorities of the Shredded Wheat Biscuit Company, who, up to the time of merging into the National Biscuit Company, manifested the greatest interest in this employee, urging me to expedite his recovery and return to duty."

[1] Pyramiding the foregoing facts and other evidence which at least inferentially tended to create a belief in the mind of petitioner that he would be cared for by his employer, can it be said as a matter of law that either or both combined are sufficient to toll the statute on the ground that the employee was thereby lulled into believing that the employer had assumed responsibility for any compensable injury he may have suffered? We are of the view that they are.

[2] The Industrial Accident Commission has, from its very early decisions until the present case, held "that whenever compensation is due as a matter of fact * * * then payments for the benefit of the injured employee shall be treated as disability indemnity, whatever the motive may have been in paying them, and whether or not there was any acknowledgment of liability to pay compensation or of payment as compensation." Howell v. Lanfair, 5 I. A. C. Rep. 176. In the instant case the commission did not consider the question as to whether or not the illness which afflicted petitioner was the result of a compensable injury. If, as a matter of fact, it should prove to be such, the statute of limitations would not, under the decisions of the commission and the decisions of the reviewing courts of this state, bar petitioner's claim, as the application for the adjustment of his claim was filed within six months after said last payment.

We think the rule as stated in London Guarantee & Accident Company v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 92 Cal. App. 298, 268 P. 670, 672, which finds support in numerous decisions of the Industrial Accident Commission, is sound and should govern this case. We therefore adopt the following portion of said decision as applicable to and decisive of the instant proceedings:

"Under the provisions of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act the payment of compensation shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the last payment, and, as stated, the evidence here shows without dispute that, while Read was totally disabled in the hospital, his wages were being constantly paid by his employer. We are of the opinion that the payment of such wages, under the circumstances above related, constituted the payment of compensation for the injury, and that therefore, since Read's application was filed within six months after the last payment of such compensation, his claim was not barred by the statute of limitations.

"There appears to be no case adjudicated by the courts upon this particular point, but it has long been the rule of the commission that where, as here, an employee is totally disabled, and his employer continues to pay him full wages during the period of his disability, such payments do not constitute wages or gratuities, but are payments of compensation which operate to toll the statute during their continuance (27 Cal. Jur. p. 458; Oders v. Great Western Electro Chemical Co., 6 I. A. C. Rep. 95); and we find nothing unreasonable in the construction thus placed upon the terms of the act."

There is no merit in the point made by respondents that the case above cited is not authority for a like ruling upon the facts of the instant case on the ground that petitioner in said cited case was paid full compensation, while in the instant case the employee was paid on a half-wage basis. In each case the employee performed no services. One received full compensation, and the other half compensation. We are unable to see any reason why one should receive the benefits of the provisions of the act and the other should be excluded therefrom. It would seem that the one receiving half compensation would have greater reason for believing that he had been put upon a compensation basis than the one receiving full compensation. The former's compensation would more nearly agree with industrial compensation in amount than would the other's. In both cases there was nothing said by the employer to indicate that said employer repudiated responsibility. In fact, in the instant case, it carried the employee along on half pay during all of the latter six months' period to and past the limit fixed by the act as a bar.

We are of the view that petitioner's claim for compensation is not barred by the statute of limitations, for the reasons set forth herein. We express no opinion as to the merits of the claim, as that is a matter which must be determined solely by the commission.

The order of the commission denying compensation on the ground of the bar of the statute is annulled, and the cause is remanded to the commission, with directions to hear and determine the matter upon its merits.

It is so ordered.

CRUM et ux. v. MT. SHASTA POWER CORPORATION.*

ALBAUGH v. SAME.

Sac. 4752.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 28, 1933.

Rehearing Granted Sept. 25, 1933.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨39.

Lands beside pool above mouth of river flowing into it held riparian to such river during low water times, when bulk of water therefrom remained in pool, though there was no current therein, but not during flood water season.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1099(3).

Appellate court's opinion on appeal from judgment awarding damages for diversion of water of river that plaintiffs' lands were riparian thereto in summer months held law of case on subsequent appeal.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨46.

Riparian owner may use water to propel machinery, subject to lower riparians' domestic uses, but cannot divert water entirely around land of opposite riparian owner, if resulting in substantial damage to latter.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨78.

Owners of lands beside pool above mouth of river flowing into it could recover damages for power company's diversion of waters of river during low water times when they remained impounded in pool.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨84.

Riparian owner may recover damages for opposite riparian owner's diversion of waters of stream around former's land, though he has all water he needs, where quality thereof is materially impaired.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨84.

Riparian owner cannot recover damages for diversion of water of stream even as against appropriator without showing substantial, actual, or prospective damage; mere interference with his usufructuary title to water being insufficient (Const. art. 14, § 3).

7. Waters and water courses ⇨86.

Power company, diverting water of river flowing into pool, was entitled to minimize resulting damages to owners of lands beside pool by guaranteeing them water supply.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨87.

Stipulation that power company, diverting water of river flowing into pool, would maintain natural level of pool, should have been admitted in evidence in action by owners of lands beside pool for damages.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨84.

Owners of lands beside pool could not recover damages for diminution in quantity of water therein because of power company's diversion of water of river flowing into pool, where it restored natural level thereof by constructing dam.

10. Waters and water courses ⇨64.

Riparian owner is entitled, even as against another riparian, to substantially unpolluted stream, as well as undiminished flow of water.

11. Waters and water courses ⇨87.

Evidence held to show that quality of water in pool was materially impaired by power company's diversion of water of river flowing into it, so as to entitle riparian owners to recover damages.

12. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7).

Appellate court's statement in opinion on appeal from judgments awarding damages for diversion of water of river flowing into pool that there was no substantial evidence of pollution of pool thereby held not law of case, in view of substantially stronger evidence of pollution on subsequent trial.

13. Appeal and error ⇨1178(6).

Causes of action for diversion of water of river flowing into pool must be remanded for retrial on issue of damages, where evidence did not show amounts awarded for unproved diminution of quantity of water in pool and proved impairment of quality thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Merton Crum and wife and by William J. Albaugh against the Mt. Shasta Power Corporation. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded for a new trial on the issue of damages.

See, also, 124 Cal. App. 90, 779, 12 P.(2d) 134, 137.

William B. Bosley, Thomas J. Straub, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, and Frank R. Devlin, all of San Francisco, and Chenoweth & Leininger, of Redding, for appellant.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland (Annette Abbott Adams, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

These two cases are now before the appellate courts for the second time. On the first appeals, the District Court of Appeal reversed judgments in favor of the respective plaintiffs. Crum v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 117 Cal.

App. 586, 4 P.(2d) 564; Albaugh v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 117 Cal. App. 612, 4 P.(2d) 574. Petitions for hearing in this court were denied. After the reversals, the two above cases were consolidated for trial, and were retried before the court sitting with a jury. The jury brought in a verdict in favor of Crum in the sum of $32,100, and in favor of Albaugh in the sum of $96,300. Defendant has separately appealed from each judgment.

The controversy between these parties is of long standing, and grows out of the diversion by the defendant for power purposes of substantially all of the waters of Fall river above the confluence of that river with the Pit river. The Fall river empties into the Pit river in the northeastern section of Shasta county. The two streams come together at approximately right angles. The quantity of water flowing in Fall river in the summer time is much larger than the quantity flowing in the Pit river in those months. Pit river is a flashy stream with a maximum flow of 10,000 second feet in the winter months, and a minimum flow at Young's Falls of as little as 3 second feet in the summer months. The flow of Fall River, on the other hand, is much more uniform. It has a maximum flow of about 1,800 second feet, with a minimum of about 1,000 second feet.

[1] Plaintiffs' lands are located on opposite sides of the Pit river on what is referred to as Pitville pool, about 5 miles up stream from the confluence of the two rivers. Crum owns about 116 acres and Albaugh owns about 400 acres; both areas being adjacent to the pool on opposite sides thereof.

It is because of the physical characteristics of the Pitville pool that this action has arisen. About 500 feet downstream from the confluence of the two rivers, there is a natural rock reef or barrier extending nearly across the bed of the Pit river. This rock reef acted as a partial natural dam, and caused the waters of the two streams to back up, creating Pitville pool. About 8½ miles upstream from the rock reef, on the Pit river, is to be found Young's Falls, located at the town of Pittville. The stream from Young's Falls down to the rock reef is known as the Pitville pool. Plaintiffs' civil engineer, Mr. Mau, testified as to making a survey of the pool. He made a profile of the pool, which was introduced into evidence as Plaintiffs' Exhibit 3. From this exhibit and from the testimony of Mau interpreting it, it appears that the maximum depth of this pool opposite Albaugh's lands is over 27 feet lower than the top of the rock reef, and that the maximum depth of the pool opposite Crum's lands is over 19 feet lower than the top of the rock reef. This profile map demonstrates that the bed of the Pitville pool from the rock reef to Young's Falls is below the level of the top of the rock reef and runs slightly downhill from the reef. Stated another way, the bed of the pool from Young's Falls to the rock barrier runs slightly uphill, and at no place appears to be within about 7 feet of the height of the rock reef. This witness and others testified that the surface of the pool is practically level. Several of plaintiffs' witnesses testified that there was no noticeable current, and, in fact, no current in the pool in the summer months; that, in the absence of a wind, objects thrown into the pool would remain approximately stationary for many hours.

This physical condition, according to plaintiffs' theory, makes their lands riparian to Fall river in the summer months, although their lands are located more than 5 miles from where the Fall river empties into the Pit river. We agree with plaintiffs that the evidence introduced on this trial, as well as the law of the case, as established on the prior appeals, fully establishes that Pitville pool is a natural reservoir, which is filled with water in the summer months from both the Pit and Fall rivers, and that in those months plaintiffs' lands are riparian to both streams. We are of the opinion that the evidence establishes that Fall river, in the summer months, in a state of nature, contributed a large quantity of water to this pool, which water mingled with and became an inseparable part of the corpus of the water in the pool. In other words, Pitville pool is a miniature lake in the summer months, its waters in that period consisting of Pit and Fall river waters, mingled indiscriminately. We cannot add to what the District Court of Appeal said on this point on the prior appeal in the Crum Case. We adopt as a part of this opinion the following portions of the appellate court's decision [117 Cal. App. at page 596, 4 P.(2d) 564, 567]:

"It may seem like fiction to say that land which is located on a pond formed by a dam in the bed of one stream may still be riparian to another stream which is 5 miles distant from this land. While Fall river contributes a substantial quantity of water which mingles with and remains in Pitville pool, this pond may be deemed to be an inlet or arm of Fall river, in spite of the fact that there is no current in the pool by means of which the water of the last-mentioned stream may be actually traced to the locality of the land. It is not essential there shall be a current of the stream which actually washes the shores of plaintiff's land. It is sufficient if the waters of the respective streams mingle in the same reservoir to form the corpus of the same pool. The pond then becomes a basin which is tributary to both streams. This situation may then make plaintiff's land riparian to both rivers. The case of Turner v. James Canal Co., 155 Cal. 82, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 99 P. 520, 522, is authority for this exact conclusion. It is there said:

"The right of a riparian owner to the use of water bordering upon his land does not, as plaintiffs contend, arise from the fact that the water is flowing, and that any part thereof taken from the stream is immediately replaced by water from the current above it. It comes from the situation of the land with respect to the water, the opportunity afforded thereby to divert and use the water upon the land, the natural advantages and benefits resulting from the relative positions, and the presumption that the owner of the land acquired it with a view to the use and enjoyment of these opportunities, advantages, and benefits. Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 526, 89 P. 338. Out of regard to the equal rights of others whose lands may abut upon the same water, the law has declared, as will hereafter be more fully shown, that the use of the water for irrigation, so far as it affects the right of others similarly situated, must be reasonable, and must be confined to a reasonable share thereof; but, with this common limitation, the right to use water upon adjoining land applies as well to the water of a lake, pond, slough, or any natural body of water, by whatever name it may be called, as to a running stream. * * * We have never heard that riparian rights depended upon the character of the current in the water upon which these rights extend. They exist if the water be an artificial pond made by a dam in a water course, as well as when it is an unobstructed running stream.'

"So long as the bulk of water from Fall river remains impounded in Pitville pool, we may assume, upon the reasoning of the last-mentioned case, that plaintiff's land is riparian to Fall river.

"It must be conceded, however, that the same situation does not prevail in times of flood water during which these two rivers rush down over the dam with mighty velocity at a depth of many feet. It is apparent that under such conditions very little of the water of Fall river remains impounded in the pool. During the season when the flood water and current of Pit river carry Fall river water down over the dam, the plaintiff's land is not riparian to Fall river. It follows that, while the plaintiff's land may be riparian to Fall river during times of low water in the summer, it is not riparian to that stream during the season of flood water in the winter months.

"The appellant suggests upon rehearing that this court has misconstrued the application of the case of Turner v. James Canal Co., 155 Cal. 82, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 99 P. 520, 524, by holding that, because the Pit and Fall rivers both contribute to the supply of water in the Pitville pool, the land of plaintiff would become riparian to Fall river during the season when its water became an inseparable part of the corpus of that pond. It is pointed out that the Supreme Court held that the Fresno slough was an arm or inlet of the San Joaquin river only when the water from Kings river was not flowing into the slough; that the court did not hold that the land which was situated on the slough was riparian to both rivers at the same time. It is therefore argued that this court erred in holding that the plaintiff's land was riparian to both Fall and Pit rivers at the same time. We have re-examined that case with great care, and have concluded there is nothing therein contained which is in conflict with what was said in our former opinion [299 P. 822] and which is herein adopted as the law of this case respecting that subject." (Italics ours.)

[2] Under the above reasoning, which has become the law of the case, we take it to be settled that plaintiffs' lands, in the summer months, are riparian to both Pit and Fall rivers.

The defendant is a hydroelectric power company. It owns all the land on both sides of and riparian to Fall river, from where it empties into the Pit river, to a point about 2 miles up stream. It also owns all the land on both sides of Pit river and riparian thereto from a point about 600 feet above the junction of that stream with the Fall river, down the Pit river for about 7 miles. At this lower point on Pit river is located defendant's power plant. In 1920, defendant started construction of a dam, penstock, and tunnel on the Fall river about one mile above its junction with the Pit, for the purpose of diverting for power purposes substantially the entire flow of Fall river to the power plant on Pit river. By means of these diversion works, the entire flow of Fall river, with the exception of a small quantity allowed to remain for the use of certain lower claimants other than the plaintiffs, was diverted from a point above the confluence of the two streams to a point about 7 miles below. Thus the waters of Fall river were wholly and entirely diverted away from Pitville pool.

The diversion works and power plant were completed on September 30, 1922. The entire flow of Fall river was diverted on that day for a trial run. Immediately the level of the water in Pitville pool was lowered about 5 feet. The next day the water of Fall river was turned back by defendant into its natural channel, and the pool immediately was filled to its normal depth. To give an idea of the relative amounts of water contributed by each stream to the waters of the pool, plaintiffs' engineer Mau testified that in the summer months, if the pool were empty, it would take about 100 days for the flow of Pit river to fill the pool, while the normal flow of Fall river would fill the pool in one day.

As already mentioned, a short distance down stream from the confluence of the two rivers is located a natural rock reef, which serves as a natural dam and holds a portion of the waters of the two rivers in Pitville pool. This rock reef is on land owned by defendant. On the western end of this rock barrier was a large crevice some 8 feet in depth, which permitted a considerable quantity of water from the pool to escape down the Pit river. Some time between September, 1922, and January, 1923, the defendant constructed a concrete dam across the crevice in the natural rock dam; thus connecting the rock barrier with the western shore of Pit river. In January of 1923 defendant again diverted all of the waters of Fall river away from Pitville pool. The natural dam, as supplemented by the artificial dam, served to impound effectually the waters of Pit river, so that the level of Pitville pool was maintained at the same height as before the diversion. Sufficient water has always come down Pit river and its tributaries to keep the pool full, and to keep the water running over the dam. It is a conceded fact that, from the date of the diversion to the date of the last trial in 1932, the level of Pitville pool has thus been maintained as it was before the diversion. In other words, plaintiffs at all times since the diversion have had access to the same quantity of water as existed before the diversion.

Plaintiffs commenced the present actions in 1923; two causes of action being alleged. Plaintiffs alleged their ownership of lands on Pitville pool; that said lands were riparian to Fall river; that defendant had wrongfully diverted the entire flow of Fall river; that by reason thereof plaintiffs have been deprived of their riparian rights in and to the waters of Fall river. The first count of the complaint prayed for an injunction; the second count for damages. Defendant answered, denying that plaintiffs' lands were riparian to Fall river. This issue has been determined adversely to defendant. Defendant also alleged that it was diverting the water in the exercise of its riparian right; that it had constructed the dam at the rock reef; and that since its construction the level of the water had been maintained. As a separate defense, defendant set forth that it was using the waters of Fall river for the development of electric energy for the purpose of sale to the public; that plaintiffs knew of the construction of the power plant and permitted its construction without objection; that plaintiffs are estopped from preventing the diversion by reason of the fact that a public use had attached to the waters diverted. On the issues thus formed, the cases went to trial, resulting, as already stated, in judgments in favor of plaintiffs. While the appeals were still pending in the district court, plaintiffs abandoned their claim for an injunction. The appellate court reversed the judgments and sent the cases back for retrial. On the retrial, the pleadings were not amended, except as to the prayer of the answer. The original prayer was stricken, and, in lieu thereof, there was inserted a prayer asking for (1) a determination of the respective rights of the parties in and to the water, and (2) a determination that defendant's diversion and use of the waters was in the exercise of its riparian rights.

One other occurrence preceding the present trials must be referred to. After the first appeals had become final and the remittitur filed in the lower court, it was discovered that defendant as the successful party on appeal had been awarded its costs. Plaintiffs thereupon moved in the appellate court to recall and modify the remittitur to allow plaintiffs their costs, on the theory that the suits were inverse condemnation suits, and that therefore the condemnees were entitled to costs. The appellate court held the actions were not actions in eminent domain and that therefore plaintiffs were not entitled to costs. Crum v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 124 Cal. App. 90, 12 P.(2d) 134; Albaugh v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 124 Cal. App. 779, 12 P.(2d) 137. These last decisions were not rendered until the day after the jury brought in its verdict on the retrial of these cases, so that the trial court did not have the benefit thereof on the retrial.

[3, 4] One of the most perplexing problems presented on the present appeal is to determine just what the appellate court decided on the prior appeals, and to determine just what was there determined to be the law of the cases. From the quotation above, it appears that the appellate court clearly held that plaintiffs' lands were riparian to Fall river in the summer time. It was also held that defendant's use of the water of Fall river would not ripen into a right by adverse possession, evidently because defendant disclaimed any intent to appropriate the water and claimed to be diverting it in the exercise of its riparian right. The effect of the public use having attached to the water diverted was not discussed. The appellate court also pointed out that the action was not one for an apportionment of the waters between riparian owners, but an action by one riparian owner against the other for injury to the former's usufructuary title to the waters of Fall river. After pointing out that a riparian owner has the right to have the water flow past his land in its usual course, the court stated [117 Cal. App. 603, 4 P.(2d) 564, 570]: "It follows that a diversion of that river [Fall river] destroys the natural condition which makes the land bordering on Pitville pool riparian to that stream. If the contribution of Fall river water to Pitville pool is beneficial to the land of plaintiff, then he is afforded a remedy for its withdrawal, by means of a suit for damages or for injunctive relief. He has seen fit to rely upon a suit for damages. * * * Assuming the evidence does adequately show the water which is normally contributed to Pitville pool is beneficial to the land of the plaintiff which is located thereon, the plaintiff would be entitled under the pleadings in this case to whatever actual damages he has suffered from the diversion of the stream."

It is true that the appellate court also stated [117 Cal. App. at page 599, 4 P.(2d) 564, 569]: "The appellant, however, specifically disclaims title to this diverted water by adverse possession. It asserts the right to divert and use this water as a riparian owner thereof for the beneficial purpose of manufacturing hydroelectric power only to the extent that other riparian owners are not in need of the water. It has been specifically determined by the Supreme Court in the case of Fall River Valley Irrigation Dist. v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 202 Cal. 56, 56 A. L. R. 264, 269, 259 P. 444, that the appellant's use of the water of Fall river was for proper riparian and beneficial purposes."

Appellant strenuously contends that this language necessarily means that defendant's entire diversion of the waters of Fall river away from Pitville pool is a proper riparian use, and that plaintiffs' remedy, if any, is an action to apportion. In view of the direct and unequivocal holding of the appellate court that plaintiffs herein are entitled to damages caused by the diversion, we cannot interpret the last-quoted statement to mean that defendant's diversion of the entire stream constitutes a proper reasonable riparian use, and that therefore plaintiffs are precluded from recovering any damages caused by the diversion. Not only would such an interpretation be contrary to, and inconsistent with, the holding that plaintiffs are entitled to damages, but, if the appellate court had so intended, it would have directed judgment to be entered for defendant; there being no further issues to be determined. But this it did not do. A fair reading of the entire opinion clearly indicates that the appellate court reversed the trial court on the issue of damages alone, and intended a retrial on that issue. As we interpret the last-quoted statement, all that was intended thereby was that the use of water for power purposes under a proper state of facts is a proper riparian use. With that doctrine we have no quarrel. The courts of this state have long recognized that a riparian owner in the proper exercise of his riparian right may use the water as a motive power to propel machinery subject only to the domestic uses of lower riparians. However, this does not mean that the use of such waters for power purposes gives any riparian owner any greater right than any other riparian use would give him. The language above referred to does not mean that one riparian in the exercise of his riparian right can divert the water entirely around an opposite riparian owner when and if such diversion results in substantial damage to the opposite owner. We are clearly of the opinion that under the issues presented in this case, and under the law of this case as enunciated by the appellate court, plaintiffs are entitled to damages, if any substantial damage or diminution in the value of their lands has resulted from the diversion, to which a public use has attached.

[5] Defendant further contends that, assuming plaintiffs' lands are riparian to Fall river in the summertime (which we have already held they are), plaintiffs, so far as defendant is concerned, are in the position of opposite riparian owners, and therefore under the decision in Joerger v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 214 Cal. 630, 7 P.(2d) 706, plaintiffs cannot complain of the diversion of the entire stream by an opposite riparian owner when the evidence shows that plaintiffs have all the water they need. Defendant correctly points out that the evidence shows that Crum has had all the water he has desired to use since the diversion, and that Albaugh never has used Pitville pool water for irrigation. Albaugh secures his water for irrigation purposes by a ditch from the Pit river above Young's Falls. It is defendant's contention that, under the theory of the Joerger Case, one riparian can entirely divert the water around an opposite riparian, and return and use the water far below the lower boundary of the opposite riparian's lands, and that the opposite riparian's only remedy is an action to apportion the waters, or, at least, that the opposite riparian cannot complain where he has all the water he needs. This contention is incorrect, for two reasons: In the first place, it is predicated upon a basic misconception of the holding in the Joerger Case; and, secondly, as we shall later show, in the present cases, although the evidence shows that plaintiffs have all the water they need or can reasonably use as to quantity, the evidence likewise shows that the quality of the water has been materially impaired by the diversion and the construction of the dam, resulting in material and substantial damage to plaintiffs. In the Joerger Case, plaintiff owned 40 acres of land riparian to Hat creek, designated on the diagram accompanying the opinion as parcel D. The defendant Red River Lumber Company, a private corporation, owned the opposite 40 acres, designated as parcel A. The defendant also owned all of the riparian land above parcels A and D, on both sides of Hat creek, for a considerable distance. These lands are designated as parcel E. The defendant diverted Hat creek from a point on its riparian lands in parcel E located far above parcel D, and used and returned the diverted water to the stream at a point in parcel A opposite to parcel D. In other words, the water was returned to the stream at a point above the lower boundary of the opposite riparian owners' lands. This was the vital point in the case. In the first opinion in the Joerger Case (Cal. Sup.) 3 P.(2d) 936, this court held that the diversion was unlawful because the water was returned below the boundary of Joerger's opposite riparian lands. A rehearing was granted, largely because counsel for defendant in that case (one of whom is counsel for defendant in the present case) pointed out that the point of return and use was on opposite riparian lands and above Joerger's lower boundary. As was said by this court on rehearing [214 Cal. at page 636, 7 P.(2d) 706, 708]: "With the foregoing rules in mind [i. e., between opposite riparian owners, one can use all the water unless the other has some use for it, and the only remedy for excessive use by one is an action to apportion] we have a situation where the defendants are making a riparian use of the waters of the stream, to wit, the generation of electricity by water power. [Citing cases.] This use is made on the opposite riparian lands of the defendants. The water is returned to the stream above the lower boundary of the plaintiff's riparian tract. As between these opposite riparian tracts, the rights of the owners are correlative and reciprocal with the rights in each to use all of the water so long as the other has no use for it."

From that quotation, and a reading of the opinion on rehearing, it is quite obvious that the determining factor in the decision is that in that case defendant returned the water above Joerger's lower boundary. But in the instant cases, treating plaintiffs as opposite riparian owners, and treating Pitville pool as an indentation of the bank of the stream, the factual situation is fundamentally different. Here the water is diverted far above plaintiffs' lands, and used and returned to the stream some 12 miles below the lower boundary of plaintiffs' riparian lands. This distinction is vital. When the water is used and returned on opposite riparian lands, above the lower boundary of the complaining party's lands, then a situation is presented properly involving the rule of law enunciated in the Joerger Case. But, when the water is diverted above and returned below the opposite owner's lands, the rule of the Joerger Case has no application. In such a case, the use cannot be said to be in the proper exercise of the riparian right.

priator, simply because his usufructuary title to the water has been interfered with. It is incumbent upon him to show substantial actual or prospective damage therefrom.

We now turn to a discussion of the question as to whether the evidence here shows any substantial damage to or diminution in the value of plaintiffs' lands, caused by the diversion and the construction of the dam. Under the facts of this case, such damages could have arisen in one of two ways: First, the diversion might have diminished the quantity of water in Pitville pool to a level where plaintiffs' actual or prospective needs were interfered with; or, secondly, the diversion and construction of the dam might have affected the quality of the water in Pitville pool to such an extent that the value of plaintiffs' lands was adversely affected to a material degree.

We turn first to a discussion of the effect of the diversion on the quantity of water in the pool. The evidence shows that, when the waters of Fall river were first diverted on September 30, 1922, the level of Pitville pool was lowered from 4 to 5 feet. However, the level was restored by the construction of the dam at the rock reef below plaintiffs' lands. There is no dispute but that since the construction of the dam there has been exactly the same quantity of water in the pool as was there before the diversion. It must be remembered that under the facts and law of this case Pitville pool is in legal effect a lake or reservoir with two sources of supply—Pit river above the pool, and Fall river. The pool has one outlet—Pit river below the pool. One source of supply has been taken away by the diversion and by the public use attaching thereto. But, due to the construction of the dam, the level of the pool has been maintained exactly as it was before the diversion. The only difference is that now the pool is filled solely with Pit river water instead of a mixture of Pit and Fall river waters. This water, which is supplied in lieu of Fall river water, is not foreign water, but water from one of the natural sources of Pitville pool; namely, the Pit river.

[7, 8] During the course of the trial, defendant offered to stipulate as follows:

"Mt. Shasta Power Corporation, defendant herein, in view of the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the above entitled cause, hereby admits that said plaintiff, by virtue of his ownership of the lands described in his complaint and riparian to that part of Pit river known and designated as the Pitville pool, is entitled to the maintenance of the water in that pool, at all times, substantially at its natural level as such level would be if the waters of Fall river should continually flow into it at the natural confluence of said rivers.

"This defendant asserts that, by virtue of its ownership of the riparian rights and the riparian lands described in its answer, it has the right to continue to divert and use at all times the waters of Fall river as it is now doing for the operation of its Pit No. 1 Power Plant, provided only that its diversion and use of such water shall not actually result in substantially lowering the level of the water in said Pitville pool below its aforesaid natural level.

"This defendant declares that it does not now intend and never has intended or purposed to infringe or violate the right of said plaintiff to the maintenance of the aforesaid natural level of the water in said pool; and does hereby undertake and promise to maintain and operate the dam which it has heretofore constructed at the rock reef in the channel of said Pit river, a short distance below the natural confluence therewith of Fall river, and to maintain the level of the water in said Pitville pool substantially at its aforesaid natural level and not lower than the top of the aforesaid dam by means of its maintenance and operation of said dam and by discharging or causing to be discharged into said Pitville pool so much of the water naturally flowing in said Fall river and its tributary, Tule river, as may be required for that purpose from time to time, so long as this defendant shall continue to divert water from Fall river above its natural confluence with Pit river; and does hereby irrevocably consent that the judgment to be entered herein shall require this defendant to maintain and operate said dam and to maintain the natural level of the water in said Pitville pool as it has herein undertaken and promised to do.

"In witness whereof said Mt. Shasta Power Corporation has caused its corporate seal to be hereunto affixed and has caused its corporate name to be hereunto subscribed by its officers thereunto duly authorized on this 27th day of May, 1932."

During the course of the argument over this stipulation, counsel for defendant further agreed that, if the waters of Pitville pool ever became insufficient to maintain the level of the pool, defendant would agree that Fall river waters should be released sufficient to keep the level of the pool at the height existing before the diversion. The trial court refused to admit this stipulation into evidence, or to instruct the jury in reference thereto. The trial court's refusal was based on the theory that the stipulation was ineffectual for any purpose, unless the plaintiffs agreed thereto. This was clearly error of a most serious nature. Assuming that the plaintiffs were materially damaged by the lowering of the level of the pool, defendant was entitled to minimize those damages by guaranteeing a water supply. Under the theory enunciated in Collier v. Merced Irr. Dist., 213 Cal. 554, 2 P.(2d) 790, and in Colorado

Power Company v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (Cal. Sup.) 24 P.(2d) 495, recently decided, defendants who were clearly appropriating the water were held entitled to minimize damages by agreeing to furnish the lower riparians a guaranteed water supply. Certainly the theory of those cases is applicable to the factual situation here presented. We are of the opinion that this stipulation should have been admitted into evidence. We think that the jury should have been instructed that, in considering the damage, if any, caused by the diversion, they were not to consider that the diversion had diminished the quantity of water in the pool, but were to conclusively assume that, under the stipulation, which would become part of the judgments in these cases, defendant had agreed, whatever the future needs of the riparian owners on Pitville pool, to maintain the level of the pool as it was before the diversion. The jury should have been instructed that, as far as the law of the land was able to do so, plaintiffs under this stipulation were assured of the same quantity of water as they had access to before the diversion.

The far-reaching effect of the trial court's error in refusing to admit the stipulation into evidence is illustrated by the testimony of each of the witnesses called by plaintiffs to testify as to the value of plaintiffs' lands before and after the diversion. After each of these witnesses had testified as to the value of plaintiffs' lands before the diversion, they were asked a hypothetical question, substantially in the following form:

"Mr. Loosley, assuming that prior to the 30th day of September, 1922, that during the summer season approximately 1,200 cubic feet of water per second from Fall river flowed into Pit river in a state of nature above the point referred to in the testimony as the rock reef, and that the waters of Fall river, with other waters, maintained the level of the Pit river pool adjacent to the lands of the plaintiffs in these actions, and refreshed and replenished the water in said pool; and that the lands of plaintiffs were riparian to the Pit river pool and to the waters of Fall river flowing therein during the period from May to October of each year, and that on the 30th of September, 1922, the defendant Mt. Shasta Power Corporation diverted and since that time has continued to divert, and will in the future divert all of the flow of Fall river water from the Pit river pool, not exceeding 1,800 cubic feet per second; and that when the water was first diverted the level of the pool was reduced between four and five feet; and that defendant constructed a concrete dam and works at the point known as the rock reef, and that thereafter the Pit river pool was restored to its former level and that said level has since been maintained, and that the defendant, as a riparian owner, has used and is using the waters of Fall river so diverted for the generation of power for sale, rental and distribution to the public and that a public use to said water has attached to the water so diverted; and assuming that the defendant claims the right to divert for a public use all of the available flow of Fall river from the Pit river pool, not exceeding 1,800 cubic feet per second, except some five or six hundred inches used by Fred and Dee Knoch and the water served to the Fall River Mills Water Works, to-wit: for the generation and sale of power under a franchise from the California railroad commission; and that all of the water so diverted has been devoted to such public use and that all of the said water of Fall river that formerly flowed into the Pit river pool, not exceeding 1,800 cubic feet per second, will be required in the future for such public use; and that the defendant claims the right to make such diversion as a riparian owner and to use it for generating power, unless it shall be determined that the plaintiffs or others have a right to some of such water; and that prior to the diversion of Fall river, the Pit river pool was fresh and that there was no considerable growth of weeds therein and that after the diversion of Fall river and as a result thereof, the water in the Pit river pool became dark and stagnant; and that livestock refused to drink the same and that offensive and disagreeable odors arise from said pool; and that said pool is filled with a growth of weeds and covered with moss and slime; assuming that prior to the diversion of Fall river, the inflow into the pool from natural sources amounted to approximately 1,200 cubic feet per second and that since the diversion of Fall river, the natural inflow into the pool during the dry season of the year varies from five to thirty cubic feet per second, what in your opinion is the market value of the lands of plaintiff Crum in view of the conditions narrated above, taking into consideration the uses to which the land has been or may reasonably be adapted in the future, and I will ask you to give your opinion as to the two tracts separately?"

By this question it is true the witness was told the facts according to plaintiffs' theory as sustained by the trial court. But the question failed to include any reference to the stipulation of defendant, a factor we have already held indispensable in arriving at the damage suffered by plaintiffs. Nowhere in the question is the witness told that as to quantity of water the diversion would in no way injure plaintiffs, nor was the witness told that the defendant had offered to guarantee that the level of the pool would always be maintained. Moreover, all of the value witnesses assumed that plaintiffs' rights as to the quantity of water were in a state of uncertainty. This was clearly illustrated by the testimony of the various value witnesses on cross-examination as to their understanding of the question. They were all asked if the value they fixed upon plaintiffs' lands after the diversion, based on the hypothetical question, was arrived at by assuming that plaintiffs' water rights, as to quantity, had been taken away. Witness Joerger testified:

"I assumed they have been taken away and they are disputed, but it is a disputed right. * * * Well, they have been taken away. He hasn't the water as it was in 1922 * * * the water has been taken away.

"Q. Permanently or otherwise? A. That is disputed. * * * Well, I don't like to assume something that is in dispute and he has his riparian rights according to the decision of the court but he hasn't the water."

This last part of the answer was subsequently stricken as not responsive. He further testified that in fixing the value of plaintiff Crum's lands after the diversion he considered the lands "were by reason of the diversion dry lands or grain lands." Except for the water Albaugh secured by ditch from above Young's Falls, he made the same assumption as to his lands. All of the value witnesses testified substantially as did Joerger, and all of them emphasized that in fixing the depreciated value after the diversion they had given considerable weight to the uncertainty of plaintiffs' water rights as to the quantity of water in the pool. Although the hypothetical question told the witnesses that a dam had been constructed, and that the level of the pool had thus been maintained, it did not tell them that defendant had agreed that the judgments in the case should compel defendant to maintain the level of the pool as it was before the diversion. A reading of the testimony of each value witness clearly illustrates that in fixing the depreciated value they did on plaintiffs' lands, a material factor was the uncertainty of the maintenance of the pool at its present level. It is obvious, therefore, that the testimony of these witnesses was based on a misconception of the factual situation.

[9-11] However, although it is true that under the facts of this case plaintiffs have not or will not be damaged as to the quantity of water in the pool, it does not necessarily follow that they have not been damaged in other respects. Under the California authorities, and under the law of these cases as enunciated on the former appeals, a riparian owner, even as against another riparian, is entitled, not only to an undiminished flow of water, except as reduced by the reasonable use of other riparians and prior appropriators, but also to a substantially unpolluted stream. The riparian owner is entitled, not only to the same quantity of water, but also to the same quality of water, provided by nature in the stream. Crum v. Mt. Shasta Power Corp., 117 Cal. App. at page 606, 4 P. (2d) 564. We are of the opinion that the evidence in the present case offered on behalf of plaintiffs clearly shows that the quality of the water in Pitville pool has been materially impaired by the diversion and by the construction of the dam. The evidence shows, without conflict, that the waters of Fall river have always been clear and pure, while the waters of Pit river have always been dark and murky. The evidence likewise shows that before the diversion the waters of Fall river rushed down into Pitville pool with a minimum flow of 1,000 second feet. The Fall river waters, as we have already held, mingled with the dark murky waters of Pit river to form the pool. The jury could have reasonably inferred that the Fall river waters freshened the water in the pool. Since the diversion, the freshening effect of the Fall river waters has been lost. Moreover, by the construction of the dam, obviously the flow of water through the crevice in the rock reef has been stopped, resulting in the Pit river water backing up. There was ample evidence introduced on behalf of plaintiffs to show that since the diversion the waters of Pitville pool have become stagnant; that the pool in the summer months is now covered with weeds, slime, and moss; and that a very undesirable odor now emanates from the pool, which is obnoxious to the senses for a distance of one-half mile from the water. There is also some evidence that since the diversion cattle will not drink the polluted water. There is ample evidence from which the jury could have found that these conditions did not exist before the diversion, and from which the jury could have inferred that the changed conditions were caused by the diversion and by the construction of the dam. It hardly need be added that, if such changed conditions resulted in a material impairment of the value of plaintiffs' lands, plaintiffs may recover therefor.

[12] Appellant contends that the question of pollution cannot be considered, for the reason that the former appeals established as the law of the case that there was no pollution. We do not so interpret the appellate court opinion. All that the appellate court directly held was that there was no finding that the changed conditions were the result of the diversion. It is true that by way of dicta the court held that, even if a certain finding could be so construed, "there is no substantial evidence to support a judgment of damages based upon pollution of the water of Pitville pool caused by the diversion of Fall river." It is obvious that the above statement had reference to the facts as shown on the prior trial. On this trial the evidence was not the same as on the prior trials. On the present trial, additional witnesses on the question of pollution were called, and their testimony, and the testimony of the witnesses called on both trials, was substantially stronger than was produced on the former trials. It is obvious, therefore, that the rule of the law of the case has no application.

[13] No useful purpose would be served in retrying all the issues in this case. The judgments are affirmed except as to the issue of damages, and, as to that issue, the causes are remanded for a retrial. This is necessary because of the fact that under the evidence introduced herein there is no way to determine what portion of the award in favor of each plaintiff was for diminution of quantity of water in the pool and uncertainty as to amount, and what portion of the award was for impairment of the quality of the water. For the purposes of the retrial on the issue of damages, we hold that it is the law of these cases that during the summer months plaintiffs' lands are riparian to both Fall and Pit rivers; that defendant is entitled to introduce in evidence its stipulation above referred to; that the guaranties in said stipulation shall become part of the judgments ultimately entered in these cases; that, under the facts of these cases, considering the guaranties in the stipulation, the plaintiffs are not entitled to any damages for the diminution in quantity of the water in the pool caused by the diversion; that plaintiffs are not entitled to any damages for any alleged uncertainty in their rights to the water in the pool; that under the stipulation their rights are and will be as certain as the law of the land can make them. On the retrial, plaintiffs are to be limited to whatever damages they may have suffered by reason of the impairment of the quality of the water in the pool and by the changed conditions in the pool caused by the diversion and the construction of the dam.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgments appealed from are, and each is hereby, reversed, and the cases remanded for a new trial on the issue of damages alone, and in accordance with the views herein expressed. Both sides are to bear their own costs on this appeal.

Mr. Justice PRESTON and Mr. Justice LANGDON, deeming themselves disqualified, do not participate herein.

City council rather than county board of supervisors held proper body to levy assessment tax to pay bonds of improvement district where city council initiated proceedings (St. 1925, p. 849, as amended; p. 850, § 2).

2. Mandamus ⇨97.

Where assessment for one year to pay bonds of improvement district was not all paid, city council will not be compelled by mandamus to cumulate assessment taxes by including unpaid portion in next year's levy, though cumulated taxes are not unauthorized in discretion of the legislative body (St. 1925, p. 850, § 2; p. 855, § 5, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1359; p. 870, § 22; p. 876, § 28; p. 883, § 36; p. 887, § 39, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1372; p. 890, § 41, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1375).

3. Mandamus ⇨12.

Mandamus is not authorized unless there is a clear case to compel performance of act which law specially enjoins as duty resulting from office, trust, or station.

4. Mandamus ⇨10.

To invoke mandamus, there must be specific legal right, and parties sought to be coerced must be bound to act, and if existence of right is doubtful, writ will be denied.

5. Mandamus ⇨7.

Even when technical rules authorize mandamus, issuance of writ is largely discretionary with court.

In Bank.

Application by American Securities Company for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to John F. Forward, Jr., and others, as the City Council of the City of San Diego, or as members of the Board of Supervisors of the County of San Diego, to compel them to levy a special assessment tax to pay the principal and interest on certain bonds.

Writ granted.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

C. L. Byers, City Atty., and Gilmore Tillman, Asst. City Atty., both of San Diego, for respondents John F. Forward, Jr., et al., as constituting City Council of City of San Diego.

Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., and Frank T. Dunn, E. I. Kendall, and J. B. Abbey, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of San Diego, for respondents Edgar F. Hastings, T. Le Roy Richards, Ray Hurley, as and constituting Board of Supervisors of County of San Diego.

PER CURIAM.

Mandate to compel either the respondent city council of the city of San Diego or the respondent board of supervisors of the county of San Diego to levy, at the time of the next general tax levy for municipal or county purposes, upon all of the lands within municipal improvement district No. 1 in said city, a special assessment tax in an amount clearly sufficient to pay all of the principal and interest which has become due or will become payable on bonds of the district heretofore issued, before another tax levy for municipal or county purposes can be made available for the payment of principal and interest on said bonds.

Municipal improvement district No. 1 was organized under the Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925 (St. 1925, p. 849 as amended), and pursuant to a resolution of intention adopted by the city council of the city of San Diego on August 20, 1928. The purpose of the proceedings was to acquire rights of way and to construct two bridges and a causeway over Mission bay with street improvements at the approaches of said bridges. The estimated cost of the improvement was $725,000 and upwards. The proceedings were carried forward by the city council of said city, the contract was let, and the contractors entered upon the performance of the work. Certain property owners affected commenced an action to enjoin the performance of the contract. After trial on the merits the court found for the defendants and entered judgment accordingly. On appeal by the plaintiffs the judgment was affirmed on February 25, 1931. Southlands Co. v. City of San Diego, 211 Cal. 646, 297 P. 521. Bonds were issued by the city treasurer as provided in the act in the principal sum of $737,418.34, all dated January 21, 1931. The first principal amount of $46,000 will accrue on January 21, 1936, and the last on June 21, 1951. On July 2, 1932, the first semiannual interest coupons attached to said bonds matured and there became due and payable on account of said interest thereon the sum of $64,030.01. On September 1, 1931, the board of supervisors of said county, for the purpose of raising funds for the payment of said interest when it should become payable, levied against the property in the district a special assessment tax at a rate calculated to raise the sum of $71,835.95, or 11.2 per cent. more than required if collected in full.

On January 2, 1933, there became due and payable on account of interest coupons then maturing the sum of $22,122.55 and a like sum on July 2, 1933, or a total for this year of $44,245.10. On September 1, 1932, the board of supervisors for the purpose of paying interest coupons maturing in 1933 levied a special assessment on lands in the district sufficient to raise, if collected in full, the sum of $49,288.34, or approximately 11.2 per cent. more than the amount required to pay the 1933 interest coupons. Of said levies made in 1931 and 1932 there remain unpaid and delinquent at this time certain individual assessments totaling approximately $31,259.18, or about 25.8 per cent. of the total levies made for the two years. The petitioner is the owner of said bonds in the principal amount of $74,000, and it is alleged in the petition that the total now unpaid on account of the interest coupons on all of the bonds of the district, including its own, is $28,660.

The petitioner prays that the court determine which legislative body, the city council of the city or the board of supervisors of the county, is the legislative body required by law to levy assessment taxes to satisfy the principal and interest on said bonds, also that when the proper legislative body is determined upon, the court compel said legislative body to levy a tax for the year 1933-1934 sufficient to pay not only the interest coupons maturing on January 2 and July 2 in the year 1934, but also to pay the amount unpaid on the interest coupons for the years 1932 and 1933.

[1] The question as to which legislative body is the proper one to levy the assessment tax is not difficult of solution. The city council of the city initiated the proceedings and all of the steps taken thereafter in carrying the improvement to completion were taken by it or under its direction or by officers of the city, including the establishment of the extent of the assessment district and the several assessment zones therein, the hearing and passing upon protests on behalf of numerous property owners in the district, the letting of the contract and supervision of the work as it progressed, the acceptance of the work, the issuance of the bonds to represent the cost of acquiring property and of the improvement. The board of supervisors had nothing to do with the proceeding until, for some unaccountable reason, that board assumed the power to levy the assessment taxes in 1931 and again in 1932. Section 2 of the act of 1925 provides "that the legislative body initiating the proceeding and adopting the resolution of intention therefor, as hereinafter provided, shall thereafter have exclusive jurisdiction of the proceeding." That the levy and collection of the assessment taxes to satisfy the coupons for interest and principal on the bonds issued to represent the cost of the improvement are part and parcel of "the proceeding" as contemplated by the act can admit of no doubt. A reading of the statute demonstrates that the legislative body which initiates the proceeding is the only one having jurisdiction to complete it and the provisions of the act with reference to the issuance of bonds for the cost of the work and the levy of assessment taxes to satisfy the same are inseparably a part of the plan for the accomplishment of which the statute was created.

Of course "the legislative body initiating the proceeding" must be the legislative body duly constituted under the terms of the act in order that the proceeding be regular. Whether the city council of the city of San Diego was authorized under the act to initiate and carry forward this particular proceeding was one of the main issues determined in Southlands Co. v. City of San Diego, supra. It was contended by the city in that case that its legislative body was the proper one to initiate and conduct the proceeding. This contention was upheld. A holding to the contrary would have required a reversal of the judgment in that case. The city is in no position to relitigate that question. It has become definitely settled. Price v. Sixth District, 201 Cal. 502, 258 P. 387. It therefore appears beyond question that the respondent city council is the legislative body having exclusive jurisdiction to levy said assessment taxes.

[2] The question of whether the assessments may be cumulated or pyramided under the statute is more difficult of solution. In section 2 of the act the legislative body is granted authority "to levy and collect special assessment taxes upon districts as in this act hereafter provided." In section 5 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1359) it is provided that the resolution of intention shall contain a statement "that a special fund for the payment of said bonds will be constituted by the levy of special assessment taxes upon the lands within the assessment district, in accordance with the provisions of this act, according to the assessed value of said lands, exclusive of the improvements thereon." Section 22 prescribes the form for the notice of final hearing in the matter of whether the work and improvement have been completed and should be accepted. In that notice is the statement: "A special fund for the payment of said bonds will be constituted by the levy of special assessment taxes upon the lands within said district as provided in the resolution of intention and in the above mentioned act." Under section 28 an identical provision is required to be inserted in the notice of hearing upon issuance of bonds to obtain immediate possession. Likewise section 36 requires an identical provision to be incorporated in the notice of hearing upon issuance of bonds for an acquisition.

Section 39 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1372) provides the form of each bond, wherein it is recited that the bond is payable out of the district interest and sinking fund, and further declares that "in accordance with the provisions of said act a special assessment tax will be levied and collected upon the lands in said district in an amount clearly sufficient to pay the principal and interest of said bonds as the same shall become payable."

Section 41 provides that an appropriate interest and sinking fund shall be constituted by the legislative body as follows: "There shall each year, at the time of the general tax levy for state and county taxes, or at the time of levying taxes to be collected for general municipal purposes, as the case may be, be levied against and upon all the lands within said district * * * according to the assessed valuation of said lands, exclusive of any improvements thereon, a special assessment tax in an amount clearly sufficient, together with any moneys which are or may be in said fund, to pay all the principal which has become or will become due and all interest which has become or will become payable on the bonds issued under the proceeding before the proceeds of another tax levy * * * can be made available for the payment of said principal and interest. * * * Such special assessment taxes shall be in addition to all other taxes levied for state and county purposes, or for municipal purposes (as the case may be), and shall be levied, computed, entered, collected and enforced in the same manner and by the same persons and at the same time and with the same penalties and interest as are other taxes for state and county purposes, or for municipal purposes (as the case may be), and all laws applicable to the levy, collection and enforcement of taxes for state and county purposes or for municipal purposes (as the case may be), are hereby made applicable to said special assessment taxes."

The petitioner grounds its case on the language appearing in the foregoing quotations in two separate connections.

First, it is contended that the form of the bond which recites that a special assessment tax will be "levied and collected" imposes upon the city the legal duty not only to levy but also to collect a sufficient assessment tax to pay all bond charges; that the duty is not discharged by a levy only but that the collection is also mandatory. It is obvious that the levy is exclusively within the power of the legislative body to make and must be made at the time appointed by the statute. The collection, however, is made by other officials. The duty to "collect" as provided in the form of the bond must be considered in connection with the law vesting power to collect and providing the means of collection. That law as incorporated in the proceeding by reference is found generally in the Political Code, which provides for the enforcement of payment of the tax by sale of the property after the period of redemption has expired. No duty to "collect" is imposed on the legislative body. Enforced collection prior to delinquency is nowhere provided for. When the legislative body has set the law in motion by the levy of the assessment tax, it has done all that the law then requires.

Secondly, the petitioner contends that the duty is imposed upon the legislative body to include in the levy of the special assessment tax an amount sufficient to cover the deficiency in the special fund arising from delinquencies in tax payments, in accordance with the foregoing quoted language of section 41 to the effect that a special assessment tax shall be levied each year "clearly sufficient, together with any moneys which are or may be in said fund, to pay * * * all interest which has become or will become payable on the bonds." Taken alone, and dissociated from other provisions of the act, the quoted language lends support to the petitioner's contention, and in cases where a legislative body has included in the levy for one year an amount which, if collected prior to delinquency in tax payments, would pay principal or interest coupons maturing during prior tax years and unpaid because of insufficient money in the special fund, we are not prepared to say that such levy would be unauthorized. But we are here confronted with the problem of whether it is the legal duty of the legislative body to do so and, if such be the case, whether the discretionary writ of mandamus should issue under the facts and conditions presented.

As to the legal duty to cumulate the assessment taxes the language of the act, when taken as a whole, is not as clear and explicit as it should be to justify a definite declaration on the subject. The very language relied upon by the petitioner does not appear to contemplate the feeding by subsequent levies, of the fund depleted by reason of delinquencies in payment by property owners. On the contrary, it is susceptible of the construction that it contemplates a fund with moneys on hand therein or which, if insufficient, may be supplemented by contributions thereto as authorized by other provisions of the act hereinafter referred to. As noted, the form of the bond prescribed by section 39 declares that the special assessment tax will be levied but only sufficient to pay the principal and interest of said bonds "as the same shall become payable." No reference is made in the bond to a levy to make up deficiencies in the special fund arising from delinquent tax payments or otherwise. True, the bond form provides that the levy will be made in accordance with the provisions of the act in question, but when we examine the act with reference to the duty specially imposed upon the legislative body, we find also in section 41 thereof the following language: "In any event it shall be the duty of said legislative body to levy a special assessment tax upon all of the said lands within such district, sufficient to pay the principal and interest of said bonds as the same shall become payable." This is the only portion of the act which specially lays the duty upon the legislative body in the premises, and that duty is to make the levy sufficient to satisfy the bond requirements as the same shall become payable.

Furthermore, when the act deals with the specific question of nonpayment of principal and interest on said bonds by reason of insufficient money in the fund to pay the same, provision is made that in such case the legislative body may from time to time make a loan from the general funds of the county or municipality, as the case may be, to the special fund, the same to be repaid from money coming into the special fund thereafter; for example, by redemptions and from sales of the property for delinquent assessment taxes. While the power thus conferred to make such a loan is discretionary, it is the only provision of the act dealing with a depleted special fund, and since this is so, more doubt is thrown upon the question of the alleged mandatory meaning of the language relied upon by the petitioner.

When the purpose and effect of the act is contemplated from an historical standpoint, it is plain that the act was intended as an alternative for the plan provided by other and earlier street improvement laws imposing special assessments for benefits. The other statutes generally provided for special assessments to be imposed on each separate parcel of land in the assessment district with provision for the issuance of a bond to represent each assessment. The means provided for the payment of the bond, in the event of delinquency in payment of the principal or interest thereon, was and is to have the particular parcel sold to satisfy the obligation. The act of 1925 substituted the ad valorem assessment plan for the individual and separate assessment plan, but it still maintained the essential characteristic of charges imposed as special assessments for local benefits to lands in the district. It could justify its existence on no other theory. The plan under this statute as well as under the other street improvement laws is, and from the beginning has been, that each lot or parcel of land in the assessment district shall bear its proportion of the cost of the work or improvement in proportion to the benefits accruing therefrom. As applied in the act of 1925 this plan cannot be carried out if cumulated or pyramided assessments are indulged. If they be indulged the fundamental theory of the act would thereby be thwarted. It is represented in this case that there are now in San Diego county twenty-eight or more special assessment districts established under the Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925 wherein delinquencies in the payment of special assessment taxes are numerous and abnormal, running in some cases as high as 90 per cent. of the total sought to be collected. If the 90 per cent. deficiency in the special fund is to be added to subsequent levies, it is readily seen that the property owners who have paid their assessment taxes may be required to pay an amount entirely out of proportion to the benefits received. The constitutionality of a statute authorizing cumulative assessments need not be questioned. It was assumed in Municipal Improvement Co. v. Thompson, 201 Cal. 620, 258 P. 955, and was declared to be authorized in O. T. Johnson Corp. v. County of Los Angeles (Cal. App.) 17 P.(2d) 792, and is apparently settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in Roberts v. Richland Irr. Dist., 289 U. S. 71, 53 S. Ct. 519, 77 L. Ed. 1038, in so far as due process is concerned.

Again, it is pointed out by the respondents that inasmuch as the special assessment tax is payable at the same time and not separately from general county, municipal, and school taxes, the delinquencies on taxes for general purposes are increased by reason of the inclusion of the special assessment taxes, thus making it impossible for the county, city or school district to obtain funds to enable the government thereof to function. Such difficulties are apparent and perplexing, but they are inherent in the plan provided in the act, and cumulating the assessments for special benefits merely accentuate the problem confronting the taxing body required by law to provide money for governmental purposes.

It is also contended by the respondents that to permit such cumulative assessment tax levies would result in ultimately building up a fund far in excess of the amount necessary to satisfy the principal and interest on said bonds. The argument assumes, and not without reason, that all delinquent special assessment taxes will be paid finally either by redemptions or by sale of the property as provided by law. It is pointed out that if the delinquent taxes be paid thus in due course of time they must under the act be paid into the special fund, with the result that finally a fund will be built up which will far exceed the bond requirements if cumulated levies are made. It was said in Municipal Improvement Co. v. Thompson, 201 Cal., at page 637, 258 P. 955, 958, with reference to similar proceedings under the Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (St.

1907, p. 806 as amended): "If some of the special assessment payments become delinquent from year to year, it would not follow that the lands of the delinquent owners would be relieved from paying the charge. It would be merely postponed." Likewise, if cumulative assessments are not made it would not follow that bondholders would lose their investment. Payment would be merely delayed and would be made from the fund fed by redemptions and sales for delinquent assessment taxes, in which event the lands benefited, and they only, would bear the burden originally intended, and the injustice of building up a surplus fund by cumulative assessments and the reversion thereof to the general fund under the act, after the bonds have been retired, would be avoided.

The foregoing discussion has been indulged for the purpose of indicating that, although the fundamental theory of the act of 1925, taken as a whole, is contrary to the idea that cumulative assessments were thereby contemplated, nevertheless it cannot be said that they are unauthorized, in the discretion of the legislative body. Also, that the provisions of the act relied upon by the petitioner are not so definite and specific as to entitle the petitioner to the issuance of the peremptory writ for that purpose as a matter of right.

[3-5] The writ of mandamus is not always a writ of right. "When it is applied for, there must be a clear case to 'compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station.'" Perrin v. Honeycutt, 144 Cal. 87, 77 P. 776, 777; section 1085 Code Civ. Proc. In order to invoke it there must be a specific legal right. The party sought to be coerced must be bound to act. If the existence of the right is doubtful, the writ will be denied. 16 Cal. Jur. p. 768, and cases there cited. Furthermore, even when the technical rules of law authorize it, the issuance of the writ is, in large measure, discretionary with the court. Fawkes v. City of Burbank, 188 Cal. 399, 205 P. 675, 676. In the case just cited it is said (quoting with special approval from Wiedwald v. Dodson, 95 Cal. 453, 30 P. 580): "We think that the correct doctrine is expressed in High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 9, where, speaking of mandamus, it is said that, 'The exercise of the jurisdiction rests, to a considerable extent, in the sound discretion of the court'; and that 'cases may therefore arise where the applicant for relief has an undoubted legal right, for which mandamus is the appropriate remedy, but where the court may, in the exercise of a wise discretion, still refuse the relief.'" Numerous cases in this court are cited announcing the same principle. Since the Fawkes Case the same rule has been approved by this court. Cal-

Notwithstanding anything that has been said with reference to the uncertainty in the provisions of the act on the question of the mandatory duty of the legislative body to include in the levy an amount sufficient to pay past due and unpaid maturities on said bonds, it is recognized that the problem is a difficult one, and we do not deem it necessary to make a final pronouncement on that subject for the purposes of this proceeding. If it be left an open question, which we are willing to do for the purposes of subsequent proceedings, should they arise, nevertheless the court may now look to the consequences which would probably flow from an order requiring said assessments to be pyramided at this time, as influencing the exercise of our discretion in the premises. It is fair to assume that if the landowners in the district have been unable to meet their obligations under prior levies when cumulated assessments were not made, a pyramiding of said assessment taxes at this time would not result in producing greater revenue, but on the contrary would produce greater delinquencies. In the face of the fact that special assessment taxes are collected as a part of and not separately from general taxes for counties, cities, and schools, the requirement for a cumulative levy to represent past due delinquencies as well as currently accruing maturities on the bonds would in all probability result in benefit to no one, not even to the bondholders. On the other hand, such a requirement would serve to prevent the collection of current revenues for general governmental purposes and would tend to build up a fund as time goes on to the great detriment of those owners of land in the district who have been and are able to pay, and to the governmental agencies affected.

Cases in this state and in other jurisdictions cited by counsel have been examined. The conclusions herein expressed are not out of harmony with the law of this state, and cases in other jurisdictions as to the power to pyramid special assessments and to enforce the same under similar statutes are conflicting and do not require further comment at this time.

We conclude that the petitioner is entitled to the issuance forthwith of a peremptory writ of mandamus compelling the respondent city council of the city of San Diego to levy a special assessment tax on the lands in acquisition and improvement district No. 1 of the city of San Diego in an amount sufficient at least to pay the interest coupons on the bonds issued against said district and maturing before another tax levy for municipal purposes can be made available for payments on said bonds.

It is so ordered.

HART v. KANAYE NAGASAWA

Sac. 4647.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 22, 1933.

As Amended Sept. 28, 1933.

1. Deeds ⇨136.

Deed held to convey fee in joint tenancy rather than joint life estates with contingent remainder to survivor and heirs.

Granting clause of deed purported to convey the fee simple title to five grantees without limitation, and the habendum clause simply defined the estate granted as a joint tenancy with right of survivorship. The language of the granting and habendum clauses, "with full and absolute title to his or her, the last survivor of said parties of the second part, and to the longest liver of the said parties of the second part, and to his or her heirs, administrators or assigns forever," is merely descriptive of one of the chief incidents of joint tenancy, namely, the right of survivorship.

2. Deeds ⇨97.

Purpose of habendum clause in deed is to limit, enlarge, and define estate indicated in granting clause.

3. Joint tenancy ⇨10.

Evidence held to show that quitclaim deed given by one joint tenant to another was not secured by duress or undue influence.

The grantor in such deed claimed an interest in the property, contending that deed was invalid as unsupported by consideration and was secured by undue influence and duress, but evidence showed deed was given under mutual agreement entirely satisfactory to grantor under which grantee assumed all liabilities connected with property, and released all claim, to trust fund managed by grantor.

4. Contracts ⇨68.

Compromise of even doubtful claim maintained in good faith constitutes valid and legal consideration.

5. Aliens ⇨6(2).

State is only party who can challenge conveyance as in violation of Alien Property Act, and in no event would property involved in such a conveyance revert to grantor (St. 1913, p. 206).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Benjamin C. Jones, Judge.

Action to determine ownership of joint life estates in certain real property, brought by Robert Morris Hart against Kanaye Nagasawa. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

John L. Schaefer, of Los Angeles, and J. Harold McAlpine, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Wallace L. Ware and George W. Murphy, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought by plaintiff to have it determined that he is the owner of a joint life estate in certain real property in Sonoma county, and to quiet his title thereto. The answer of defendant denies the existence of any interest in plaintiff, alleges the entire fee is in defendant, and, in addition, sets up as an additional defense the statute of limitations, and alleges that plaintiff conveyed all his interest in the property to defendant in 1919.

The real property involved is a ranch called by the parties and hereinafter referred to as Fountain Grove. Both appellant and respondent claim through a deed from Thomas L. Harris and Jane L. Waring Harris. This deed was executed and delivered to the grantees therein named in the year 1900. The main controversy in this case is over the proper interpretation of that deed, and over the nature of the estate conveyed to the grantees thereby.

The granting and habendum clauses of the deed read as follows: "The said parties of the first part [Mr. and Mrs. Harris] for and in consideration of the sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00) * * * have granted, bargained, and sold, conveyed and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain and sell, convey and confirm unto the said parties of the second part [Kanaye Nagasawa, Miss Eusardia Nicholas, Miss Margaret Edith Parting, Robert Morris Hart, appellant, and Mary Elizabeth Hart, his wife] and to their heirs and assigns forever [here follows a legal description of the lands included within Fountain Grove] * * * To have and to hold, all and singular, the said lands and premises * * * unto the said parties of the second part, in joint tenancy, with full and absolute title to his or her, the last survivor of the said parties of the second part, and to the longest liver of the said parties of the second part, and to his or her heirs, administrators or assigns forever."

Although it is admitted that the $40,000 consideration named in the Harris deed never actually passed, it is likewise admitted that the deed was amply supported by other consideration, and was legally sufficient to convey to the grantees the estate therein mentioned.

In 1903, Miss Nicholas, one of the grantees, died. In 1911, Miss Parting, another of the grantees, executed and delivered to respondent a grant, bargain, and sale deed conveying to respondent all of her right, title, and interest in the premises affected by this action. Miss Parting has since died. In 1919, appellant and his wife executed and delivered a quitclaim deed to respondent of all of their right, title, and interest in and to Fountain Grove. Mrs. Hart has since died, so that appellant and respondent are the only living grantees named in the Harris deed.

Appellant contends that the 1919 quitclaim deed executed by him was not supported by consideration, and was secured from him by undue influence and duress exercised by respondent. The main contention of appellant is that the Harris deed did not convey the fee-simple title to Fountain Grove to the grantees in joint tenancy, but conveyed a joint life estate with contingent remainder to the survivor and his or her heirs. It is therefore contended that, if appellant is correct in his interpretation of the Harris deed, even if the quitclaim deed of 1919 was valid, all that was conveyed thereby was the life interest of the Harts. If these contentions were correct, appellant would still have an interest in the property in the nature of a contingent remainder. Respondent contends that the Harris deed conveyed the fee title in joint tenancy to the five grantees, and that, since all of the other grantees have either died or deeded their respective interests to him, he is now the sole owner in fee simple. The trial court interpreted the Harris deed as does respondent, and determined the issues of consideration, undue influence, and duress in his favor.

[1, 2] We have no hesitancy in holding that the Harris deed conveyed the fee in joint tenancy. The granting clause purports to convey the fee-simple title to the five grantees without limitation. The habendum clause simply defines the estate granted as a joint tenancy, with right of survivorship. The language, "with full and absolute title to his or her, the last survivor of said parties of the second part, and to the longest liver of the said parties of the second part, and to his or her heirs, administrators or assigns forever," is merely descriptive of one of the chief incidents of a joint tenancy, i. e., the right of survivorship. We can read nothing in that language, but a rather inapt and unhappy statement that the grantees are to hold as joint tenants, with fee to the survivor. Out of an abundance of caution the scrivener then described the survivor as the "longest liver of the said parties of the second part." Every thing that follows the words "in joint tenancy" in the habendum clause simply is an express provision for what would otherwise be implied from the use of the words "joint tenancy," that is, the right of survivorship.

It is true, of course, that the purpose of the habendum clause in a deed is to limit, enlarge, and define the estate indicated in the granting clause, and that, if the granting clause refers to a fee and the habendum to a lesser estate, only the latter will be conveyed. Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 P. 1049; Anderson v. Yoakum, 94 Cal. 227, 29 P. 500, 28 Am. St. Rep. 121. Applying that rule to the present case, the granting clause purports to grant the property to the five grantees in fee, and the habendum simply describes their estate as one in joint tenancy. Giving the words used their ordinary and usual meaning, they can be interpreted but one way—that is, they create a joint tenancy, with the right of survivorship expressly provided for. The estate contended for by appellant—a joint life estate with contingent remainder to the survivor—is of such an unusual nature that before a court would be justified in holding such an estate had been created, clear and unambiguous language to that effect would have to be used. Here there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the words used. Nowhere in the deed did the grantors purport to be retaining or reserving any estate in themselves; nowhere in the deed is there any reference directly or indirectly to an estate in remainder; nowhere in the deed is there any reference at all to a life estate. Although not perhaps conclusive, these factors are of some importance in construing the words used. Another factor should be mentioned. Section 1105 of the Civil Code provides: "A fee-simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended." Nowhere in the deed her involved is there any reference to any such lesser estate, and so we must presume a fee was intended to pass.

The trial court admitted considerable evidence as to the relationship between the grantors and grantees, and the circumstances under which the deed was executed. Nothing appears therefrom which directly or indirectly discloses any intent on the part of the grantors to create other than a fee simple in joint tenancy.

Authorities are not lacking to the effect that the language used in the present deed creates a joint tenancy in the fee. In Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 103 P. 931, 932, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194, the interpretation of two deeds was involved. The first of these read: "To Edward Walden and Louella Walden * * * as joint tenants with fee to the survivor." The second deed read to the same parties "during their joint lives, as joint tenants, and afterwards to the survivor in fee simple absolute. * * * The intention of this grant being to constitute a joint tenancy in said land. * * * It is to be noted that the language of both deeds is as capable of the interpretation that a joint life estate with remainder to the survivor was intended as is the deed in the instant case, and yet the court properly held a joint tenancy in the fee was created. In Hilborn v. Soale, 44 Cal. App. 115, 185 P. 982, the grantors conveyed to two grantees "as joint tenants with the right of survivorship * * * to have and to hold to the said grantees and to the survivor or (of) them forever." It was contended that this deed created a joint life estate with remainder to the survivor. The language used by the District Court of Appeal in discussing this point is quite appropriate to the case at bar. At page 116 of 44 Cal. App., 185 P. 982, it is stated:

"Appellants' contention is based upon the theory that the words in the deed, italicized herein for the purposes of this case, are effective to prevent the severance of the joint tenancy by execution sale, or voluntary act of either of the parties to the title, and preserve the right of survivorship by creating an independent title in the survivor upon this life estate. Without discussing the question as to whether or not such an estate can be created under the limitations of the California Civil Code, we are satisfied that the language of the instrument, as relied upon by appellants, is not calculated and was not intended to limit or modify the apt language for the creation of a joint tenancy. We see nothing in the words 'with the right of survivorship,' following the grant to 'Carl B. Soale and Wilson H. Soale, her husband, as joint tenants,' other than the expressed declaration of the implied incident of right of survivorship which characterizes a joint tenancy; and the italicized words in the habendum clause, 'To have and to hold to the said grantees and to the survivor of them forever,' is in nowise inconsistent with the granting clause. Of course, no question of tenancy by entireties, as between husband and wife, is involved in this case under our statutes; and it is apparent under the granting clause, independent of the language in controversy, that it was the intention of the grantor to create a joint estate. It is not disputed that the habendum clause, where such intent is made clear, can be resorted to to restrict, limit, or enlarge the estate indicated in the grant; but no such purpose is indicated here. In Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 P. 1049, and Jacobs v. All Persons, etc., 12 Cal. App. 163, 106 P. 896, cited by appellants, the habendum clause under consideration in each instance in expressed terms limited the estate vested in the grantee named to a life interest.

"Without reviewing appellants' citations from the courts of other states, we find them all distinguishable from the case at issue here, and for the most part concerned with the construction of deeds in which the habendum clause is in irreconcilable conflict with the granting clause. Such is not the condition here. In Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194, 103 P. 931, in which case the deeds in question more nearly correspond to the deed under consideration here than in any of the foreign cases cited, our Supreme Court held that a conveyance to grantees, husband and wife, 'as joint tenants, with fee to the survivor,' and another to grantees as husband and wife 'during their joint lives,' and afterwards to the survivor in fee simple absolute, vested the estate in these grantees in joint tenancy. We reach the same conclusion in this case."

We find nothing contrary to these views in Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290. There the deed expressly provided for a life estate and remainder to the heirs of the bodies of the grantees. The court properly held that giving the words used full effect "it is a conveyance to the grantees for their joint lives * * * with remainder to the issue and heirs of their two bodies." In the instant case, giving the words used their full effect a joint tenancy with right of survivorship was provided for.

Nothing more need be said on this phase of the case. We therefore hold that the Harris deed was intended to and did vest in the five grantees as joint tenants the fee-simple title to Fountain Grove. Upon the death of Miss Nicholas in 1903 the fee was then vested in the four survivors. In 1911, Miss Parting conveyed to respondent her interest in the property.

Then in 1919 appellant and his wife quit-claimed their interest in the property to respondent. Obviously, if this last-mentioned deed was valid, respondent then became the owner in fee of Fountain Grove. Appellant contends, however, that the 1919 deed was invalid, for the reason that it was unsupported by consideration and was secured by respondent by the use of undue influence and duress. In order to discuss this contention, the background of the relationship between the various parties must be briefly referred to.

[3] Respondent, Nagasawa, first met Mr. Harris in 1867 in London. He came to the United States in that year and renewed his friendship with Mr. Harris, who had preceded him to this country. In 1875 he accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Harris to California. Harris purchased the property which is the subject of this suit, and from that time on Nagasawa managed and supervised it. Harris was widely known for his religious and philosophical teaching and writings. He organized a group, of which the five grantees in the Harris deed were the nucleus, who were interested in living according to the precepts taught by Harris. Miss Nicholas and Miss Parting came to live at Fountain Grove in 1885 or 1886, and contributed various sums of money to Harris in order that he could carry on his teachings. Evidently the profits from the sale of the products of Fountain Grove were largely used for the same purpose. Mrs. Hart, then unmarried, came to live at Fountain Grove in 1886, and Mr. Hart came shortly thereafter. The Harts were married at the ranch in 1887. The Harts left Fountain Grove in 1892 and went to New York to work for Harris at a depot from which the products of the ranch were sold and distributed. Under the personality and leadership of Harris the five grantees were very friendly to each other, and all contributed either money or services to the enterprise. Harris went to New York in 1900 and left Nagasawa in charge of Fountain Grove. He then caused his attorney, A. B. Ware, to prepare and deliver the deed granting the land to his five faithful workers. After this deed had been delivered, Harris still remained closely in touch with Fountain Grove, and continued his religious and philosophical teaching and writing. Through 58 Vesey street, New York, the distributing depot for the products of Fountain Grove, he continued to receive large sums of money for living expenses and for carrying on his life work. The evidence shows that between 1892 and 1906, when he died, Harris received about $110,000 from Vesey street, over $30,000 of which was advanced after 1900. The money so received, together with contributions from other sources, was kept by Harris as a so-called trust fund. Upon the death of Mr. Harris the residue of this fund passed to his wife, who thereafter made her home with the Harts. The Harts and Mrs. Harris came to Fountain Grove in 1909. Apparently the Harts and Nagasawa could not agree as to the proper management of Fountain Grove, and so the Harts and Mrs. Harris moved to San Diego, where Mrs. Harris died in 1916. It should also be mentioned that, since 1909, Nagasawa has paid all taxes and expenses; and has assumed all obligations connected with Fountain Grove.

At the time the action was commenced, the defendant had resided upon the premises for a period of more than fifty-five years, and it was almost solely through his management and supervision that the vineyards were planted and the products of the vineyards were manufactured into wines, tonics, and grape juice beverages. His interest antedates the passage of the Alien Land Act (St. 1913, p. 206) by many years. He had been in the sole and absolute possession of said premises for many years before the passage of the Alien Land Act. In fact his right of possession has never been questioned by plaintiff or by any one else. A bonded winery upon the premises has been in operation for a number of years. Since 1919 defendant has procured from the United States government various permits authorizing him to sell wines and wine tonics under his name. He has made leases of portions of the said premises for gas station and airport purposes, sold a portion to the state for highway purposes, and in 1927 or 1928 executed to the Bank of Italy of Santa Rosa a mortgage as security for a considerable sum of money which he borrowed from said bank. His right of occupancy or dominion had never been questioned until the filing of this belated action.

Upon the death of Mrs. Harris in 1916, the Harts took over the management of the so-called trust fund. In 1919, Nagasawa had some discussion with the Harts about the trust fund. He finally wrote to the Harts pointing out that possibly he had some claim to the trust funds and suggested an accounting. He stated that, unless such an accounting was had, he would see an attorney and be advised. As already pointed out, a large portion of the money in the trust fund had originally come from the sale of the products of Fountain Grove. The Harts were evidently perturbed over the possibility of having to account for the so-called trust fund, and over the possibility that they or the fund might be called upon to meet some of the obligations of Fountain Grove. They agreed to negotiate. Nagasawa appointed one George F. King his attorney in fact, and gave him written power to negotiate for him. Eugene Daney, an attorney in San Diego, acted as attorney for both parties. He had been Hart's attorney since 1916. The evidence shows that appellant disclosed the whole situation to Daney and told him that he feared Fountain Grove was in a failing financial condition and might call on the trust fund for assistance. Every one was apparently quite friendly and satisfied with the deal that was ultimately worked out. The Harts wanted to be relieved of any past or future claims of Fountain Grove on the trust fund. They evidently felt that, with the advent of prohibition, Fountain Grove, with its large vineyards, which were its principal support, would go bankrupt. Under these circumstances Mr. and Mrs. Hart signed the quitclaim deed by which they conveyed to Nagasawa all of their right, title, and interest in and to Fountain Grove. Nagasawa, as part of the same transaction, and as consideration therefor, on his own behalf and on behalf of the Fountain Grove Vineyard Company, agreed "never to disturb, molest, interfere with, call for an accounting of, or make any claim upon that certain trust fund." The agreement embodied a mutual release of all claims of Nagasawa, past, present, and future, to the trust fund, and of all claims of the Harts, past, present, and future, to Fountain Grove. The Harts were released from any liability for past claims growing out of the operation of Fountain Grove. The evidence shows that Hart, after this agreement had been consummated, was very happy in having settled the matter in a way he considered to his advantage. Daney testified that the agreement was the result of the mutual understanding and desire of all concerned. The evidence shows that in 1921 Hart told Freeman, a partner of Nagasawa, in New York, that he (Hart) was "entirely satisfied with the deal I drove with Kanaye Nagasawa, and I am relieved to know that from now on I won't be called upon to contribute to the support and maintenance of Fountain Grove. * * * I realize if I had remained a partner, the money in my hands would have been subjected to withdrawal for Fountain Grove liabilities * * * with the incoming of prohibition I consider that Fountain Grove will fail and go bankrupt." Freeman testified positively to this conversation, and, although Hart refused to admit that he had so stated, he would not deny that the conversation had taken place. There is some evidence that Hart was so satisfied with the 1919 deal that shortly thereafter he paid King, attorney in fact for Nagasawa, some money for "past succor."

[4] From the above facts it sufficiently appears that the contention of appellant that the quitclaim deed was secured by respondent by duress or undue influence is utterly without merit. The record clearly shows that the 1919 agreement was the result of a mutual understanding, and entirely satisfactory to appellant when it was entered into. The evidence further shows that Hart entered into the agreement gladly and of his own free will. It might be added that, with the exception of some information contained in a purported copy of a telegram, which was properly excluded from evidence because no proper foundation was laid for its introduction, Hart admitted that in 1919 he knew every fact concerning the transaction which he knew in February, 1931, at the time of the trial. Appellant's good faith in making the contention at this late date that the agreement was secured by undue influence and duress is open to some doubt. The evidence likewise shows a legal and adequate consideration. The assumption by Nagasawa of all liabilities connected with Fountain Grove, of itself, would be sufficient consideration. The release of all claims to the trust fund was clearly the result of a valid compromise. It is, of course, well settled that the compromise of even a doubtful claim maintained in good faith constitutes a valid and legal consideration. Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 P. 451; Rohrbacher v. Aitken, 145 Cal. 485, 78 P. 1054.

[5] Appellant, without any allegation of ineligibility in the pleadings, rather vaguely points out that the evidence shows that Nagasawa was born in Japan, and inferentially is of Japanese blood, and that under the Alien Property Act it is unlawful for an ineligible alien to own agricultural property in this state. Assuming, but not deciding, that the conveyance by the Harts to Nagasawa in 1919 was in violation of the act, that fact would in no way invalidate the conveyance. The conveyance was fully executed. Title vested in the grantee, and the grantor cannot complain. If the conveyance was in violation of the act, the state of California is the only one who can challenge it. In no event would it revert to appellant. Shiba v. Chikuda, 214 Cal. 786, 7 P.(2d) 1011; Mott v. Cline, 200 Cal. 434, 253 P. 718; Suwa v. Johnson, 54 Cal. App. 119, 203 P. 414. Surely defendant will not be deprived of his property in violation of the due process of law.

The other points raised by appellant are so unsubstantial as not to require discussion.

We are of the view that the trial court's interpretation of the language of the deed should not be disturbed.

LE CLERG et al. v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO
et al.

S. F. 14961.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 21, 1933.

1. Mandamus ⇨163(4).

In mandamus to compel issuance of warrants in satisfaction of judgments, record held not to show final action by city constituting binding obligation to pay in three installments.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨968(2).

Where necessary steps to require city to levy tax under statute were not completed until July 19, statute required levy for "next fiscal year" and fiscal year ended June 30. Levy need not be made until following year (St. 1901, p. 794, as amended by St. 1925, p. 300).

3. Mandamus ⇨176.

In mandamus proceeding to compel issuance of city warrants in satisfaction of judgments, appropriate relief will be granted under prayer for general relief, although petitioners did not show right to specific relief prayed for.

Writ granted.

Sanders & Jacques, of San Diego, for petitioners.

C. L. Ryers, City Atty., and Gilmore Tillman and H. B. Daniel, Asst. City Attys., all of San Diego, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is a second petition for a writ of mandamus wherein the same petitioners seek to compel the same respondents to issue warrants in satisfaction of judgments held by the petitioners against the city of San Diego. In the first proceeding the petitioners sought the issuance of warrants for the payment of said judgments in full or the levy of a tax to satisfy the same in full. It was determined therein that the city had the right to elect to proceed in accordance with the act of 1901 (St. 1901, p. 794, as amended by St. 1925, p. 300), by levying a tax for at least one-tenth of the amounts of said judgments each year, and that it would not be presumed that the city would refuse to levy a tax for that purpose for the fiscal year 1933-34, as provided in said act. The peremptory writ in the prior proceeding was therefore denied without prejudice. Le Clerg v. City of San Diego (Cal. Sup.) 24 P.(2d) 156. After the opinion was filed in that proceeding, on July 13, 1933, the petitioners made a demand on the common council of the respondent city to levy a tax for the present fiscal year sufficient to pay said judgments in full, or to levy a tax this year sufficient to pay two-thirds of said amounts and to provide for a tax for the remaining one-third in the fiscal year 1934-35, or to levy a tax for one-third for the present fiscal year and one-third each for the two years following, or to levy a tax for two-tenths for the fiscal year 1933-34 and the remainder in eight equal annual installments. The demand was refused.

The present proceeding was commenced on July 22, 1933. A hearing on the return to the alternative writ was had on August 8th, and the matter was then submitted. On the latter date a petition for a rehearing and modification of the judgment in the former proceeding was pending and undetermined. With full appreciation of the fact that, if the judgment in the former proceeding should become final most of the questions involved in the present proceeding would become settled and the adjudication be binding upon the parties hereto, the petition for a rehearing and modification of said judgment was denied.

The finality of the judgment in the former proceeding has foreclosed the petitioners from insisting that they now have the right to compel a tax levy for the ensuing fiscal year sufficient to pay said judgment in full.

[1] The claim for payment of two-thirds this year and one-third next year or for payment in three equal annual installments is based upon an alleged agreement between the petitioners and the city for payment on those terms. It appears that in June, 1932, the common council appointed a special budget committee to confer with the petitioners with reference to the terms of payment of their claims. This committee, with the consent of the petitioners recommended to the council that such payment be made in three equal annual installments. The city attorney, by resolution of the council, was directed to draft an agreement between the petitioners and the city as recommended by the committee. Such an agreement, however, was not finally executed. A preliminary budget for the fiscal year 1932-33, including an item of $25,000 payable to the petitioners, was prepared by the special committee and submitted to the council. This budget was rejected and a new budget finally approved by the council eliminating such or any item for the benefit of the petitioners. The record therefore discloses that no final action was taken by the city which would constitute a binding obligation to pay in three installments.

[2] The petitioners further contend that the respondents should be compelled to levy a tax for the fiscal year 1933-34 sufficient to pay at least two-tenths of the judgment claims. The contention is based on the claim that it was the duty of the city to levy a tax for at least one-tenth for the fiscal year 1932-33, and, since it did not do so, at least two-tenths should be levied for the present fiscal year. The city resists this claim and asserts that under the terms of the act of 1901 no duty was imposed on the city to levy a tax for said purposes for the fiscal year 1932-33. It is pointed out that, when the necessary steps have been taken under said act to require the city to levy the tax, then and then only it becomes the duty of the city under section 3 of the act to levy the tax for the next fiscal year for at least one-tenth of the judgment claims. It is also pointed out that under the city charter the fiscal year commences on July 1 and ends on June 30 of the following year. It appears without question that the steps necessary to put the act of 1901 in motion were not completed until July 19, 1932, which was after the commencement of the new fiscal year. Under the strict wording of the statute the next fiscal year would be the fiscal year 1933-34.

[3] Although the petitioners have not shown their right to the specific relief prayed for, the facts disclose that they are entitled, under their prayer for general relief, to the levy of a tax for the present year of at least one-tenth of the amount of said judgment claims, and we think that the respondents are foreclosed by the former proceeding from contending that the petitioners are not entitled to such relief.

A peremptory writ should therefore issue forthwith, directing the respondents to levy a tax for the fiscal year 1933-34 sufficient to pay at least one-tenth of the amount of said judgment claims and to pay the amount of money so derived to the petitioners. It is so ordered.

Application by William C. Ring to review an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar recommending that petitioner be suspended from practice of law within the state for a period of two and a half years.

Petitioner ordered suspended for two and a half years.

William C. Ring, in pro. per.

Philbrick McCoy and William C. Mathes, both of Los Angeles, and A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding to review the recommendation of the board of governors of the State Bar that the petitioner be suspended from practice as an attorney at law for a period of two and one-half years.

The recommendation of the board was based on evidence adduced before the local administrative committee bearing upon five consolidated charges initiated by four complaints filed by, and verified by an officer of, the Los Angeles Bar Association, and by an order to show cause based on a fifth complaint filed and verified by former clients of the petitioner. These complaints involved charges of violations of rules 3 and 9 of the Rules of Professional Conduct and subdivisions 4 and 5 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The local committee recommended disbarment, which the board reduced to suspension for the period stated.

[1] The petitioner contends that the complaints were insufficiently verified, first because the verification was made by an officer of the complainant Los Angeles Bar Association, and, second, because the verifications were made on information and belief, although the allegations of the complaint are based on the complainant's knowledge. These contentions are answered contrary to the petitioner's contentions by the cases of In re Collins, 147 Cal. 8, 10, 81 P. 220, and Lantz v. State Bar, 212 Cal. 213, 221, 222, 298 P. 497. See, also, Herron v. State Bar, 212 Cal. 196, 298 P. 474.

The only other matter for consideration is the petitioner's contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the board of governors. The petitioner does not in every instance dispute that the events occurred or the acts were committed from which the board has drawn inferences and deductions unfavorable to the petitioner. What the petitioner does contend is that the board should have believed only the testimony of the petitioner on the conflicting evidence and adopted the petitioner's view of the correct deductions to be drawn from undisputed facts; also that the board should have accepted the extenuating circumstances

RING v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA. L. A. 14006.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 30, 1933.

1. Attorney and client ⇨52.

Complaint in disbarment proceeding held not insufficient because verification was made by officer of bar association, and on information and belief, though allegations of complaint were based on complainant's knowledge (Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subs. 4, 5).

2. Attorney and client ⇨53(1).

Disbarment proceedings are not criminal as respects right of attorney to presumption of innocence, and board of governors are qualified judges to pass upon truth of charges (Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subs. 4, 5).

3. Attorney and client ⇨53(1).

In disbarment proceeding, acceptance of oral testimony concerning fee-splitting held not to violate parol evidence rule, where documents were introduced (Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subs. 4, 5; §§ 1856, 1962 (2)).

4. Attorney and client ⇨53(2).

Evidence held to sustain finding that attorney violated rules of professional conduct in splitting fees and commingling clients' funds justifying suspension for 2½ years (Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subs. 4, 5; Rules of Professional Conduct, rules 3, 9).

5. Attorney and client ⇨53(1).

That Supreme Court weighs evidence in disbarment proceeding does not free petitioner from burden to show that decision of board of governors was erroneous.

6. Attorney and client ⇨46.

Attorney could not claim as extenuating circumstance that he paid back clients' money, where he delayed payment until clients took matter to district attorney and State Bar (Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subs. 4, 5; Rules of Professional Conduct, rules 3, 9).

offered by the petitioner in complete exoneration of his conduct.

[2] The petitioner makes the oft-reiterated claim that the proceedings before the board are criminal in nature, and that the attorney is entitled to the same rights as a defendant in a criminal action to have all intendments in favor of his innocence. The special nature of these proceedings has many times been mentioned (Fish v. State Bar, 214 Cal. 215, 4 P.(2d) 937, 78 A. L. R. 585, and cases cited), and with respect to the presumption of innocence "the answer is that the qualified judges who are by law charged with the duty of passing upon the truth of the charges against petitioner have resolved all questions against him" (Aydelotte v. State Bar of California, 209 Cal. 737, 740, 290 P. 41, 42).

[3] The petitioner apparently seriously contends that as a matter of law the board should have accepted at their face value certain documents introduced in evidence which the unlicensed persons, found to have been the associates of the petitioner, testified were a "blind" or "cover" for fee-splitting transactions had between them and the petitioner. The petitioner asserts that for the board to accept the testimony of the unlicensed persons is to violate the rule that parol evidence may not be introduced to vary the terms of a written instrument. We feel constrained to answer the argument because it is not the first time that it has been used by petitioners in similar review proceedings. A sufficient answer is that the proceeding herein is not one between the parties to the instrument, and the provisions of sections 1856 and 1962 (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure do not apply. No rights of recovery upon the instrument are sought. The purpose of the contradictory testimony is not to vary the terms, but is to impeach the representations on the written documents. The truth of the matter must be resolved by the fact-finding body. In the specific instance two receipts were signed by one of the unlicensed persons for sums received from the petitioner purporting to be in payment of services rendered for investigating and procuring statements of witnesses in two cases unconnected with any of the matters before the board. It was testified that the money was in fact received by the unlicensed persons as part of the fee received by the petitioner in the Conger matter which was under investigation in these proceedings. At the same time that the receipts were prepared and signed, at the request of the petitioner, both the unlicensed persons signed a letter addressed to the petitioner in which the following paragraphs appear:

"We have never at any time received directly or indirectly, nor do we expect to receive any compensation, reward or thing of value from you on account of any case or litigation of any kind which you may have handled and in which we at any time ever had any interest.

"That to the best of our knowledge you became the attorney for C. E. Conger in the action of Conger v. Knowles et al., before you knew that we had ever had any connection with said case and that we have never received nor do we expect to receive any remuneration from you on account of any connection which we have ever had with said matter."

[4] The obvious inferences to be drawn from this entire transaction on its face, together with the testimony of witnesses and the inability of the petitioner to sustain the representations incorporated in the receipts by any evidence, abundantly support the findings of the board in respect to the real nature and purpose thereof.

[5] The petitioner insists that this court can and does weigh the evidence in these proceedings. This fact does not free the petitioner from the burden devolving upon him to show that the decision of the board is erroneous or unlawful. Aydelotte v. State Bar of California, supra, 209 Cal. page 740, 290 P. 41.

The petitioner has likewise failed to show that the evidence does not support the findings of the board with respect to the petitioner's association with the unlicensed persons in two additional personal injury cases.

[6] The documentary evidence bearing on the remaining charges involving the commingling of funds and the petitioner's use of client's funds for his own purposes and to settle demands against him of other clients cannot be disputed on the record presented. As to the two charges involving this evidence, the petitioner offers the extenuating circumstance that the record also shows that the parties involved have received every cent to which they were entitled, although there was some considerable delay in the petitioner's ability to meet the demands in full, and compliance therewith was not attempted until the matters had been taken to the district attorney's office or the State Bar. Domestic or other private embarrassments of the attorney in such matters cannot be accepted as extenuating circumstances, at least to the extent of absolving the petitioner from discipline on the record here presented.

The petitioner received a full and fair trial on the part of the local administrative committee and by the board of governors. The record supports the findings and recommendation.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner be suspended from practice as an attorney at law of this state for the period of two and one-half years from and after the filing of this order.

Sac. 4753.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 22, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 21, 1933.

Automobiles ☞74.

Operator of motor vehicle for hire held liable for license fee for last quarter of 1926 under 1925 statute, as against contention constitutional amendment providing different rate went into effect during such quarter (St. 1925, p. 833; Const. art. 13, §§ 1, 15).

Under Const. art. 13, § 15, tax was not levied or assessed until first Monday in March, 1927, so that taxpayers would escape all state taxes for part of last quarter of 1926 unless payment was made under St. 1925, p. 833. Furthermore, at time of adoption of constitutional amendment, tax under previous law had been legally "levied," even though administrative and procedural details of assessment and collection were to come later, and constitutional amendment provided that nothing therein should affect any tax levied or assessed prior to adoption thereof.

H. J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. L. Chamberlain, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM.

The state of California brought this action against defendant to recover license fees assessed under Statutes 1925, c. 412, p. 833. After trial below, all questions were eliminated save the right of the state to collect the tax for the last quarter of 1926. The lower court held that the tax was proper.

Prior to November 2, 1926, the Statutes of 1925 imposed a license tax of 4 per cent. of the gross receipts (with deductions for local licenses and taxes) on those operating motor vehicles over the public highways for hire, fixed on a quarterly basis. On November 2, 1926, the people adopted an amendment to article 13, § 15, of the Constitution, changing the taxing rate to 4¼ per cent. on carriage of passengers and 5 per cent. on transportation of property, and relieving the carrier of municipal licenses and taxes. The new tax was annual, becoming a lien on the property on the first Monday in March of each year, the tax being computed for the previous year. The amendment contained the provision that "such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses" upon the property of such companies. Defendant contends that the amendment is self-executing, and that it is not bound to pay the tax under the 1925 statute for the last two months of the last quarter of 1926, because the amendment went into effect during the quarter. Plaintiff's position is that defendant must pay the tax for this quarter under the language of the amendment reading: "Nothing herein contained shall affect any tax levied or assessed prior to the adoption of this section."

In our opinion the trial court correctly determined that the tax was proper. Defendant did business, under a license given in accordance with the act of 1925, during the last quarter of 1926; and the tax was imposed upon it by said act. At the time of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, the tax under the previous law had been legally "levied", even though the administrative and procedural details of assessment and collection were to come later. Under the constitutional amendment, the tax was not levied or assessed until the first Monday in March, 1927. Consequently, if defendant is correct in its contention that the constitutional provision superseded the statute upon its adoption, the result will be an escape from all state taxes for about two months of the quarter in question. This would be contrary to the express terms of the constitutional amendment, quoted above, as well as the general declaration in article 13, § 1, that all property should be taxed in proportion to its value. We are satisfied that the amendment neither in spirit nor in terms purports to relieve defendant of the tax for the period in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

ASHLEY v. PINNEY et al.*

Civ. 7675.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 21, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 13, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 19,
1933.Appeal and error ⇨ 1050(1).

In action for injuries from automobile accident, admitting evidence of compromise and settlement offer by defendant's insurance carrier, introduced in connection with statement of facts, held prejudicial error, where circumstances of statement of facts could have been presented without showing attempted compromise.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Gwendolyn Ashley against A. J. Pinney and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, named defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles (Forrest A. Betts, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Charles Dell Rubin and Stuart McHaffie, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

In this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence of the defendants, the following facts appear: The plaintiff, as a guest of appellant, on June 11, 1929, was riding in an automobile driven by appellant. While they were driving in a westerly direction on Seventh street in the city of Los Angeles, and at the intersection of that street with Lake street, appellant made a left-hand turn, intending to travel southerly on Lake street. At the same time defendant Rivera was driving a city sprinkling truck easterly on Seventh street. Before the turn was completed appellant's automobile was hit by the truck. From that collision the plaintiff's injuries resulted. She brought her action against both Pinney and Rivera, as well as other defendants, but the action came to trial between plaintiff and only the defendants Pinney and Rivera. Pursuant to the verdict of a jury, judgment was entered in favor of defendant Rivera, and in favor of plaintiff against defendant Pinney in the sum of $5,000. From this judgment the said Pinney appeals.

There is no contention on the part of appellant that there is not sufficient evidence to justify the verdict against him. His discussion of the evidence is for the apparent purpose of showing that the evidence was so much in conflict that the errors of which he complains were prejudicial and should entitle him to a reversal of the judgment.

The stated grounds of appeal are: First, that the court erred in admitting testimony to prove an alleged offer of compromise and settlement on behalf of appellant; second, that the court erred in admitting evidence to show the poverty of the plaintiff; and, third, that counsel for plaintiff committed irreparable prejudicial injury in arguing plaintiff's poverty to the jury. The second point and the third are not shown to have sufficient support in the record, to justify a reversal on those grounds.

The first point is one of substantial importance and merit.

In the face of timely objections of appellant, respondent was permitted to inject into the evidence, before the jury, not only the fact that an attempt had been made to induce the plaintiff to accept a sum of money in settlement of her right or claim to compensation for her injuries, but also that this offer had been made by an insurance company which was interested as insurer of appellant. In substance, the attempted justification for these rulings is that appellant had introduced in evidence a written statement of facts of the accident, and had endeavored to prove that the contents of said statement had been given orally by the plaintiff to one Frazar, and that the last sentence thereof was in the plaintiff's handwriting. It was under color of an investigation into the circumstances about said statement of facts that the plaintiff succeeded in bringing before the jury the fact that an attempt to compromise the case had been made by appellant's insurance carrier. After reading those parts of the record which are pertinent to this issue, we are convinced that the actual matter then under investigation, with reference to said statement of facts, could have been fully presented, without developing the facts of the attempted compromise. That the defendant in such an action as this is entitled to protection against prejudicial testimony of this kind is well established by more decisions than should have been necessary to settle the question. Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 266 P. 954; Squires v. Riffe, 211 Cal. 370, 374, 295 P. 517.

The judgment is reversed.

Civ. 687.District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 31, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 28,
1933.1. Insurance ⇨455.

Where act is done in manner intended, ensuing injury does not result from "accidental means," notwithstanding result may have been unexpected and be such as to constitute accidental injury, since "accidental means" involves element of unexpectedness in act leading to injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Accidental Means," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Insurance ⇨668(13).

Whether death of insured resulted from "accidental means" within double indemnity provision of policy held for jury, where injury probably resulted from voluntary jump from work bench.

While injury to insured may result in greater or less degree from original voluntary act on his part, if there is some evidence which justifies inference that means which produced injury contained something of unexpected or unforeseen character involving other acts not intentionally done, resulting injury is caused through "accidental means."

3. Trial ⇨296(2).

Instruction held not erroneous when considered with other instructions as justifying recovery under policy for death by accidental means, if result of insured's voluntary act was unexpected, irrespective whether means which produced injury were unexpected.

Instruction stated that, if evidence showed insured did voluntary act, the natural, usual, and to-be-expected result of which was not to produce injury to himself, but that there flowed from such act an unforeseen and unexpected means through which injury was sustained or death produced, jury should find that death was caused by accidental means.

4. Trial ⇨296(2).

Instruction that doing of intentional act from which injury resulted would not bar recovery under policy for death by accidental means if circumstances pointed to "possibility" of involuntary consequence held not error, in view of other instructions as permitting jury to decide question on mere possibility and not preponderance of evidence.

West & McKinney, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

On a former appeal in this case (119 Cal. App. 556, 6 P.(2d) 1012), this court in reversing a judgment of nonsuit summarized the facts as follows:

"The plaintiff is the widow of George Philip Losleben, who held an insurance policy issued by the defendant. This policy provided for the payment of $2,500 in the event of death resulting from natural causes and for an additional $2,500 'in the event that the death of the insured is caused by bodily injuries effected exclusively and wholly by external, violent and accidental means, said death occurring within ninety days after the happening of such accident.' The insured was employed as a mechanic in a packing house, and on November 21, 1929, was directed by his employer to build a shelf over a workbench, which bench was about three feet high. The employer left the building about 3 o'clock on the afternoon of that day, leaving the insured engaged in this work. When the employer returned about two hours later, he found the insured in great pain and sent him home. Doctors were immediately called, an operation was performed, and on November 25, 1929, the insured died. The defendant paid the $2,500 contemplated by the policy for death from a natural cause, but refused to pay the additional $2,500. * * *

"The deceased had been working in this packing house for about ten years. His employer testified that when he left him on the afternoon in question he appeared to be in perfectly good health and was whistling at his work; that in doing his work it was necessary for him to climb upon this bench, and in getting down to jump from the same; that when he returned he found the deceased suffering extreme pain and 'doubled up'; that he sent him home and shortly thereafter went over to see him; that at that time the insured could not stand up straight; and that when he was put to bed he 'drew himself up.' The physician who was immediately called testified that he examined the insured and found his abdomen very much distended and very painful to the touch; that from his examination of the patient he could determine how the injury was caused within a certain range of possibilities; and that on the same day, November 21, he performed an operation. As to what he found, he testified as follows: 'I found a condition of peritonitis of the abdominal cavity; fluid in the abdomen, and fecal matter; I found a perforation of the small intestine in the center, or twist of the bowel, what we call a volvulus—that is the technical name for a twist of that character. The circulation had been cut off by this twist and that segment of the bowel was blue and black, colored in the process of decay.'

"This physician testified that in his opinion this condition was caused by an injury. Another physician testified that he saw the insured on November 21; that the insured told him that the pain in his abdomen came on acutely that afternoon, compelling him to quit work, and that he almost collapsed; that when he saw the patient he was in such pain he could not say very much; that he held his stomach and complained of the terrible pain; and that he was lying down and rolling in pain. This physician testified that in his opinion the death of the decedent was caused by acute peritonitis, which was brought on by 'the volvulus or twist of the bowel,' and that this condition of the patient could be caused by 'a sudden jolt, or a strain of the bowel wall, probably a sudden jerk or jump.' Asked as to what kind of a condition volvulus is, he replied: 'It is a twist in the bowel, usually occurring in the small bowel, and as soon as that takes place you have your circulation cut off in the bowel adjoining, and that bowel immediately becomes weakened, the blood supply is shut off, and, of course, immediately we have gas accumulate because the bowel is obstructed and the gas accumulates in all the bowel, and the weakened condition in the bowel which had been deprived of the circulation is liable to burst or perforate.'

"He then testified that this patient had a volvulus and a perforation of the bowel, and that this could be caused either by chronic constipation, by tuberculosis, or by a sudden jolt or strain. He then testified that he found no indications that this patient suffered from the ailments referred to, and that his bowel and all of his abdominal organs were in a healthy condition. Based upon the conditions he found, he testified that in his opinion this particular volvulus was caused by a strain."

A second trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, from which the defendant has taken this appeal. In addition to the facts above outlined, the record shows that the two doctors who operated upon the insured, and later assisted in an autopsy, after stating what they found, testified as to the several things which could have caused such a condition, each naming trauma, or injury, as one of such causes. Each then testified that he could find no indication of the presence of any of the causes named except trauma, and that in his opinion the volvulus in the decedent was caused by trauma.

[1, 2] The appellant's first contention is that the evidence is entirely insufficient to support the verdict, in that it fails to show death from accidental means as distinguished from an accidental death. The appellant concedes that the evidence for the respondent is essentially the same as that received at the first trial, with one exception. During the second trial, the respondent introduced in evidence the "proofs of death" which had been furnished upon blanks provided for that purpose by the insurance company. These contained, in answer to appropriate questions, a statement made by the respondent including the following: "The insured jumped off a work bench at packing-house where he was employed about 3 p. m. November 21" and another statement made by the attending physician as follows: "Volvulus of small intestine caused by jumping from work bench." While the appellant also relies upon certain expert evidence introduced in its behalf, this merely creates a conflict, and need not be here considered. It is argued that the evidence discloses that the deceased died as the result of a jump, that the act of jumping was voluntary upon his part, and that, since the entire operation of the deceased in getting down from the bench was carried out in precisely the manner he intended, this case comes within the rule of such cases as Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 172 Cal. 462, 156 P. 1029, 1031, L. R. A. 1916E, 1196; Ogilvie v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 189 Cal. 406, 209 P. 26, 26 A. L. R. 116; Kellner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 180 Cal. 326, 181 P. 61; Olinsky v. Railway Mail Ass'n, 182 Cal. 669, 189 P. 835, 14 A. L. R. 784.

It is well established that, where an act is done in precisely the manner intended, it cannot be said that an ensuing injury results from accidental means, although the result itself may have been unexpected and be such as to constitute accidental injury. While this distinction is somewhat technical, it has some reasonable basis in cases where the result is to be naturally expected or foreseen from the act done, or where, from existing disease or otherwise, the strain of an intended act is too great for a particular individual. Under our decisions, accidental means involves an element of unexpectedness in the act or occurrence which leads to the injury. In Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., supra, the court pointed out this distinction, and observed that in most cases where injury by accidental means was held to be established "there was some evidence which justified the inference that the means through which the injury was sustained contained something of an unexpected or unforeseen character." In Davilla v. Liberty Life Ins. Co., 114 Cal. App. 308, 299 P. 831, 833, the general rules are thus gathered together from a number of cases:

"The term 'accidental means' has been frequently defined in this state, but it seems not applied to similar facts. 'The policy, it will be observed, does not insure against accidental death or injuries, but against injuries effected by accidental means. A differentiation is made, therefore, between the result to the insured and the means which is the operative cause in producing this result. It is not enough that death or injury should be unexpected or unforeseen, but there must be some element of unexpectedness in the preceding act or occurrence which leads to the injury or death.' Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 172 Cal. 462, 465, L. R. A. 1916E, 1196, 156 P. 1029, 1030. 'Where the death is the result of some act, but was not designed and not anticipated by the deceased, though it be in consequence of some act voluntarily done by him, it is accidental death. Where death is caused by some act of the deceased not designed by him, or not intentionally done by him, it is death by accidental means. In other words, accidental death is an unintended and undesigned result, arising from acts done; death by accidental means is where the result arises from acts unintentionally done.' Pledger v. Business Men's Acc. Ass'n of Texas (Tex. Civ. App.) 197 S. W. 889, quoted with approval in Olinisky v. Railway Mail Ass'n, 182 Cal. 669, 672, 14 A. L. R. 784, 189 P. 835, followed in Ogilvie v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., supra. 'An effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or course of action cannot be said to be produced by accidental means.' Harloe v. California State Life Ins. Co., 206 Cal. 141, 142, 273 P. 560. 'Without doubt, there can be no recovery if the insured does a voluntary act the natural, usual, and to-be-expected result of which is to bring injury upon himself. An injury or death so occurring is not produced by "accidental means" in any sense of the word, legal or colloquial. Lickleider v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Ass'n, 184 Iowa, 423, 3 A. L. R. 1295, 166 N. W. 363, 168 N. W. 884. * * * In Western Com. Travelers' Ass'n v. Smith, 85 F. 401, 40 L. R. A. 653, 29 C. C. A. 223, a leading case, it is said that the term "accidental means" is descriptive of "means which produce effects which are not their natural and probable consequences." Horton v. Travelers Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 462, 466, 187 P. 1070, 1071. "The term "accidental means" depends for its application upon the facts of each particular case; since what would be an unusual or improbable consequence, an unexpected or unforeseen occurrence in one set of circumstances in which the assured might be placed, would be but the usual, the expected, and in all human probability the foreseen consequence affecting the assured in another set of circumstances.' Moore v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 203 Cal. 465, 473, 56 A. L. R. 860, 265 P. 207, 210."

In U. S. Mutual Accident Association v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 9 S. Ct. 755, 762, 33 L. Ed. 60, where the injury was preceded by a jump from a platform, the court said: "It is further urged that there was no evidence to support the verdict, because no accident was shown. We do not concur in this view. The two companions of the deceased jumped from the same platform, at the same time and place, and alighted safely. It must be presumed, not only that the deceased intended to alight safely, but thought that he would. The jury were, on all the evidence, at liberty to say that it was an accident that he did not."

The mere fact that an act of jumping was voluntarily done does not conclusively show that an ensuing injury was not the result of accidental means. Such an act may be, and frequently is, accompanied or followed by other acts not intentionally done, such as slipping, falling, alighting upon an object not seen, an involuntary movement caused by unexpected developments or any one of a number of things that could be named. While an injury to an insured person may result in greater or less degree from an original voluntary act upon his part, if there is some evidence which justifies the inference that the means which produced the injury contained something of an unexpected or unforeseen character involving other acts not intentionally done, the resulting injury may be said to be caused through accidental means. In the instant case, while the deceased may have intended to jump from the bench, he may have slipped, fallen, alighted upon something, involuntarily given his body a violent jerk or twist, or a number of other things may have occurred which were not naturally or necessarily to be expected in connection with the ordinary act of jumping from a height of three feet. The condition of the deceased immediately or shortly after his act of jumping, if he jumped, was not such as usually or ordinarily follows or is to be expected from a jump of that nature. There was evidence that the insured was in good health until suddenly stricken; that the condition in which he was found could have been caused by a sudden jolt or jerk; and that the only other things which could be expected to have caused such a condition were entirely absent. In ordinary human experience a jump of three feet, in itself, does not produce a jolt or jerk of such violence as to disrupt the internal organs of a healthy man, especially a mechanic who may be presumed to customarily engage in manual labor and more or less frequent climbing about. These facts, taken in connection with the place and circumstances, together with the natural inferences and presumptions that may be drawn from the evidence, justify the implied finding that this injury was not caused by any ordinary jump but by something quite out of the ordinary, and of an unexpected and unforeseen character. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the result flowed from any voluntary act done, and that the only means through which the injury occurred were those which the insured intended to employ. In our opinion, a question of fact was presented which was for the jury.

[3, 4] The only other point raised is that the court erred in giving certain instructions. In the main, this attack is directed to two instructions reading as follows:

"You are instructed that, if you find from the evidence that the insured did a voluntary act, the natural, usual and to-be-expected result of which was not to produce injury to himself, but that there flowed from said act an unforeseen and unexpected means through which the injury was sustained, or the death produced, then you will find that the death was caused by accidental means."

"I instruct you that the doing of an intentional act, such as jumping from a bench, by decedent, from which the injury resulted, if you find that he did such intentional act and did jump from such bench, does not bar a recovery if the circumstances surrounding the doing of such act point to the possibility of an involuntary consequence, such as slipping or falling whilst jumping from a bench."

As to the first of these, it is urged that it does not clearly state the law, and that the jury may have taken it as justifying a recovery if the result was unexpected whether or not the means which produced the injury were unforeseen and unexpected. The instruction does not justify such an interpretation, and it is not to be assumed that the jury took it as meaning the opposite of what it says. It is also urged that there was no evidence justifying the giving of such an instruction. This is covered by what we have already said in regard to the evidence. Taken in connection with the other instructions, we think this instruction was not erroneous. Horton v. Travelers Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 462, 187 P. 1070. With respect to the second instruction referred to, the objection is to the use of the word "possibility"; it being urged that this permitted the jury to decide the question at issue upon a mere possibility and not upon the preponderance of the evidence. Had the jury been told that a recovery might be had if the surrounding circumstances pointed to the possibility of an involuntary consequence, error would appear. However, the instruction is negative in form, and merely told the jury that the doing of an intentional act would not, in itself, bar a recovery under certain circumstances. In the first instruction quoted and in many other instructions given the jury were plainly and repeatedly told that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, that they must decide only upon a preponderance of the evidence, and they were told what it was necessary for them to find in order to permit a recovery.

Among the instructions given at the request of the appellant were the following: One defining the difference between accidental death and death through accidental means, although the same was in fact much too favorable to appellant; one telling the jury that, if it believed from a preponderance of the evidence that the death of the insured was the sole result of his act in jumping, their verdict must be for the defendant; one to the effect that, before the jury could find for the plaintiff, it must find that the injuries were caused through external, violent, and accidental means independent of all other causes; one that, unless the death of the insured was caused by bodily injuries effected exclusively and solely by violent and accidental means, their verdict must be for the defendant; one that, if the death of the insured was caused partly by accidental means and partly by a pre-existing diseased condition, there could be no recovery; one that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the death of the insured resulted from bodily injuries caused exclusively by external, violent, and accidental means, and that, unless this was shown by a preponderance of the evidence, the verdict must be for the defendant; and another to the effect that, if the injury was caused solely as the result of jumping, the plaintiff could not recover. In another instruction offered by the respondent, the jury was told that under the terms of the policy it was not enough that the death or injury should be unexpected or unforeseen, but that there must be something of an unexpected or unforeseen character in the means through which the injury was sustained. We think the instructions, as a whole, fully and fairly presented the issue to the jury.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Insurance ⇨646(7).

Courts favor presumption that death by external and violent means was effected through accidental means rather than suicide (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1).

2. Insurance ⇨668(12).

In action on accident policy, whether death of insured resulted from "accidental means" by fall from hospital window held for jury as against claim insured committed suicide.

Evidence disclosed that insured had undergone an operation, was due to return home the next day, that he sent nurse from his room, and on her return his body was found lying on the pavement 45 feet below the window of his room, that the screen on the window had been unhooked, that bottles on the windowsill had been placed on dresser, and that the body of insured was found lying on the pavement in his bathrobe, belt of which was fastened.

3. Insurance ⇨291(1).

Applicant for insurance held not required to disclose visit to physician to secure information as to general health, where nothing was found wrong with him.

4. New trial ⇨102(1).

Denying new trial for newly discovered evidence held not error, where there was no sufficient showing of diligence to secure testimony at trial.

The trial of the case was commenced July 8, and by consent of parties was continued to and concluded on July 11. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Lloyd E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Lillie W. Byers, also known as Lilly W. Byers, against the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Wright & McKee and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Hamilton, Lindley & Higgins and Glen H. Munkelt, all of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of respondent permitting her to recover upon three policies of accident insurance upon the life of her husband, James C. Byers, a former sheriff of San Diego county. The first policy was issued August 9, 1921; the second was in the form of a rider to a noncancelable income policy, which rider was dated May 3, 1927; the third was issued August 9, 1928.

The first policy contained a clause whereby it insured "against loss of life resulting directly and independently of all other causes, from bodily injury effected during the term of this policy solely through accidental means." "This insurance does not cover, * * * suicide, sane or insane, or any attempt thereat, sane or insane." The other two policies contained provisions similar in effect. The applications for the two latter policies each contained the following provision which was made a part of the policy: "The falsity of any statement in the application, materially affecting either the acceptance of the risk or the hazard assumed hereunder, or made with intent to deceive, shall bar all right to recovery under this policy." Respondent was named as beneficiary in all of the policies.

James C. Byers came to his death on the 29th day of April, 1929. Ten days prior to that date he had undergone an operation for appendicitis in a hospital in the city of San Diego. During practically all of his stay in the hospital Antonia Hahn acted as his night nurse. On April 28th she came on duty at about 7 o'clock in the evening. Mr. Byers told her he was going home on the following day. She testified that he appeared more cheerful than at any other time during her attendance upon him. During the night she administered to his needs, and at about 5 o'clock in the morning observed he was awake. She took his temperature and pulse, both of which were normal, and he remarked: "I didn't sleep much last night. You better give me a cup of hot malted milk, maybe I can sleep some more." Miss Hahn went to a utility room on the same floor of the hospital where she prepared the hot malted milk, returning in about five or six minutes. She found her patient's bed empty. A search revealed his body lying on the pavement forty-five feet below the window of his room.

Mr. Byers' room was on the fourth floor of the hospital, with its longest dimension running north and south. The door opened through the north wall. The patient's bed projected west from about the center of the east wall. A closet door opened in this wall north of the bed. A dresser which stood against the wall in the southwest corner of the room extended about six inches over a window in the south wall. This window was forty-six inches wide, with its sill thirty-one inches from the floor; the lower sash, when completely raised, made an opening twenty-eight inches high. The sill was three inches wide, with the frame sloping downward to the outside, leaving a space seven inches wide in which were fitted a sash and a wire screen. Outside of the frame there was a sloping stone projection six inches wide. There was a radiator inside of the window, with its outside edge nine and one-fourth inches from the wall. The screen was fitted on the outside of the window, hinged at the top, and held in place by two hooks at the bottom. When Miss Hahn left the room, there was a half-gallon bottle of Vichy water, two other bottles, and a glass of orange juice on the windowsill leaning outward against the screen. The lower sash was raised to within three or four inches of the top. Mr. Byers was lying quietly on his back in bed. The door to the closet was closed. When Miss Hahn returned to the room, the covers of the bed had been turned back to the south which would be the patient's left-hand side of the bed. The closet door was open, and a bathrobe removed therefrom. The bottles and glass of orange juice were standing in a row near the front edge of the dresser, with a napkin covering the orange juice. The lower sash of the window had been fully raised and the screen unhooked at the bottom. Mr. Byers' body was found lying on the pavement clothed in his bathrobe, the belt of which was fastened. He had not left his bed from the time of the operation until the morning of April 29th after Miss Hahn had left the room at his request. There was no eyewitness to the tragedy. It is admitted that his death was caused by the fall. There is no conflict in the evidence.

Appellant urges numerous grounds for reversal which may be summarized as follows: First, that the death of Mr. Byers was not caused by accidental means; second, that the evidence demonstrates that he committed suicide; third, that he had consulted two physicians within five years prior to the dates of the last two accident policies, but did not disclose this in his applications; and, fourth, errors in instructions to the jury. We will consider these contentions in the order stated.

[1, 2] This court has just had occasion to carefully consider and construe the facts of a case under the terms of a policy insuring against death by accidental means. Losleben v. California State Life Insurance Co. (Cal. App.) 24 P.(2d) 825. Under the authorities there cited we have reached the conclusion that the facts in the instant case were such as to enable the jury to draw the conclusion that Mr. Byers came to his death "solely through accidental means."

Appellant frankly admits that "it is true that there is a presumption against suicide based upon the natural love of life. Where, therefore, it is shown that insured came to his death by external and violent means and the surrounding circumstances are equally compatible with accident or suicide, the courts will favor the presumption that death was effected through accidental means." In Wilkinson v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 180 Cal. 252, 180 P. 697, it was held that, where an insured is found dead under such circumstances that death may have been caused either by suicide or accident, the presumption is against suicide and in favor of accident, which flows from the statutory presumption that "a person is innocent of crime or wrong." Section 1963, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc.

In the instant case the jury might well have concluded, as indicated by its verdict, that, as Mr. Byers knew he was going home on the day in question, he arose from his bed, donned his bathrobe, opened his window to its limit and unhooked the screen so that he could observe the character of the day and get a breath of really fresh air from outside the hospital, and that in leaning over the radiator and windowsill he lost his balance and accidentally fell to his death. The very fact that he removed the articles from the windowsill and placed them in an orderly position on the edge of the dresser, with the orange juice covered to protect it from contamination from the air, might well indicate that he expected to use the contents of these containers. A man contemplating suicide would not necessarily think of or prevent the breaking of three glass bottles and a glass of orange juice, nor would he necessarily clothe himself in his bathrobe and fasten the belt. We have concluded that the evidence points with equal, if not greater, force toward accident than toward suicide.

In Smellie v. Southern Pacific Company, 212 Cal. 540, 299 P. 529, it was held that, where a presumption arises in favor of a party which is not overcome by evidence produced and offered by that party, it remains as evidence before the jury until a verdict is reached. In the instant case the presumption against suicide and in favor of death caused solely by accidental means was not overcome by the evidence offered by appellant. It therefore remained with the jury as evidence, and, the jury having returned a verdict in accordance with that presumption, it supports such verdict and the judgment entered upon it. In Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 44, 26 A. L. R. 123, it was said: "This court has frequently held that, even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from those facts there still remains in the case a question of fact to be determined by the jury (or by the trial judge where the case is tried without a jury), and that the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial judge thereon cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. Anderson v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 170 Cal. 66, 148 P. 212. In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment. Woodward v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 519, 520, 153 P. 951; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 P. 800. 'In reviewing a question of this kind, all the inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to the plaintiff (the prevailing party) must be indulged by this court.' Bandle v. Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 547, 174 P. 44, 45." See, also, Witherow v. United American Ins. Co., 101 Cal. App. 334, 281 P. 668.

The three cases of Nichols v. Commercial Travelers, etc., Ass'n, 221 Mass. 540, 109 N. E. 449; Bohaker v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 215 Mass. 32, 102 N. E. 342, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 543; and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Blake (C. C. A.) 285 F. 449, all present facts somewhat similar to those of the instant case where the insured fell to his death through a window. In each of these cases involving the question of death by accidental means the court was of the opinion that a judgment in favor of the beneficiary and against the insurance carrier should be affirmed because of the presumption against suicide and in favor of death through accidental means where there was no evidence rebutting this presumption.

[3] Appellant called Dr. J. W. Sherrill as a witness in its behalf. He testified that Mr. Byers entered the Scripps Metabolic Clinic in La Jolla in November, 1926; that he remained one night; that he came in for "a general checking up," which he received; that "I told him I could not find a thing wrong with him at that time, and he went home promptly." This visit to the doctor and the hospital was not disclosed in either application for insurance. A similar question under another policy on the life of James C. Byers was considered by this court in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Byers, 123 Cal. App. 473, 11 P.(2d) 444, 447, where it was said: "In construing what 'consulting a physician' as used in the application meant, the court states [Poole v. Grand Circle, W. O. W., 18 Cal. App. 457, 460, 123 P. 349, 350]: 'A reasonable construction of the question implies that it should be interpreted as relating to a consultation as to some disease or illness with which the applicant was or had been afflicted, not to some feeling of trivial discomfort or temporary indisposition, not affecting the general health.'" Under the authority of this case we have concluded it was not necessary for Mr. Byers to disclose his visit to this physician and the night spent in the clinic, where his sole purpose was to secure information as to his general health and nothing was found wrong with him.

[4] It appears in Travelers' Insurance Co. v. Byers, supra, that James C. Byers visited a Dr. Worthington about sixteen times. The purpose of these visits does not there appear. In the instant case each policy contained a waiver of the privilege of a physician attending the insured. The trial of this case was commenced on Friday, July 8th, and by consent of the parties was continued to and concluded on Monday, July 11, 1932. Appellant caused a subpoena to be issued for Dr. Worthington on July 9th. It was served on July 11th. It appears that he was too ill either to attend court or to have his deposition taken. No request was made for a postponement or continuance of the trial so that his testimony might have been made available to appellant. One of the grounds for motion for new trial was newly discovered evidence based upon the failure of appellant to have secured the testimony of Dr. Worthington. In an affidavit in support of this ground of the motion, it is said: "That affiant believes and therefore alleges the fact to be that had said Worthington testified he would have shown the fact to be that said deceased, James C. Byers, consulted said physician during said months of November, 1926, January, February and May, 1927, and January, 1928; that during one of said months said Byers consulted said physician professionally at least sixteen times. Affiant further states that he bases said belief upon the fact that in a cause heretofore pending in this court between this plaintiff and the Travelers' Insurance Company, a corporation, said Worthington testified in substance as hereinbefore set forth."

We have concluded that the trial court did not err in denying the motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. There is no sufficient showing of due diligence to secure the testimony of Dr. Worthington at the trial. Dr. Worthington had his residence and his office in San Diego.

We have carefully reviewed the instructions given by the trial court, and are satisfied there is no prejudicial error in any of them.

Judgment affirmed.

Cr. 2415.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 17, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨460(2).

Appeal from order appointing guardian for minor, without stay bond, operates as supersedeas of order (Probate Code, § 1631).

2. Habeas corpus ⇨117(1).

In absence of change in condition since denial of first application for writ of habeas corpus to obtain custody of child, adjudication is res adjudicata and binding.

Application by Elaine Stratton, a minor, by Walter A. Stratton, her guardian, for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the custody of the minor child.

Writ discharged, and minor remanded to custody.

Karl W. Marks, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Esli L. Sutton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

[1] Walter A. Stratton, petitioner here for a writ of habeas corpus, father of the minor Elaine Stratton, whose custody is at issue, is a resident of Seattle, Wash. On August 17, 1932, he was appointed by the superior court of Los Angeles county guardian of the person of his daughter, now in her fourteenth year. This child has been in the personal care and custody of the respondents, Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Derrer, residents of San Pedro, from the time she was approximately four years of age. Shortly after his appointment as guardian, her father, in a habeas corpus proceeding filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county, sought to obtain custody of the child, intending to remove her to Seattle; his petition for guardianship having contained an averment of such purpose on his part. Respondents contested the application for the writ with the result that after several hearings the petition was denied. It appears from the petition before us that respondents have appealed to the Supreme Court from the order appointing this petitioner guardian of his child, but petitioner, in support of his application, argues that an appeal to the Supreme Court from an order granting letters of guardianship of a minor does not stay any of the rights, duties, or powers of the guardian pending such appeal, calling attention to section 1631 of the Probate Code which, allowing for certain exceptions, stays the power of a guardian of an insane or incompetent person and does not by its terms stay the power of a guardian appointed for a minor. From this counsel infers that no stay exists pending an appeal in the case of a minor's guardianship. We are of the opinion, however, that the rule stated in 2 California Jurisprudence, 435, that "an appeal without stay bond operates as a supersedeas of an order appointing a guardian," applies generally to all guardians, and that the guardian of an insane or incompetent person is mentioned in section 1631, Probate Code, merely because under exceptional conditions therein mentioned it is provided that certain powers exercised under the direction of the court during pendency of the appeal shall be held valid. This provision was incorporated originally in section 1765 of the Code of Civil Procedure by an amendment adopted in 1921, (St. 1921, p. 139) very likely to meet a situation such as Justice McFarland commented upon in Matter of Moss, 120 Cal. 695, 53 P. 357, a case involving an appeal by an alleged incompetent from an order appointing a guardian for him: "Some difficulties are suggested by a consideration of the proposition that the appeal stays the execution of the order, and that, if the appellant be really incompetent, his property might be dissipated by designing persons during the pendency of the appeal. There is some force in this suggestion, and apprehended embarrassments might be remedied perhaps by some amendment to the Code." In the case of a minor's guardianship there seems to be no reason for such an exception to a complete stay as has been made in the case of an alleged incompetent.

[2] While the lower court presumably might have postponed its decision on the prior petition for a writ of habeas corpus pending a decision on the appeal, as was done in the Matter of the Application of Mathews, 176 Cal. 156, 167 P. 873, no such action was taken; in fact, a writ of prohibition to prevent consideration of the petition by the lower court, sought by the respondents there, who are also respondents here, was denied. Derrer v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 18 P. (2d) 371. The learned judge of the superior court clearly indicated by his remarks at the time he announced his decision to discharge the writ, that his action was based upon what he considered on the evidence before him was for the best interests of the child. So far as we know there has been no change in conditions since this denial of the first application, and, under such circumstances, we feel that we are bound to observe the finality of that proceeding. As suggested in the Application of Gille, 65 Cal. App. 617, 224 P. 784, 785, "an adjudication in a habeas corpus proceeding involving the right to the custody of a minor is res adjudicata and binding upon the parties * * * so long as the facts are the same and the conditions affecting the child's welfare or the parents' rights exist as they were when the hearing was had and the former order was made." See, also, In re Holt, 34 Cal. App. 290, 167 P. 184; In re Frazier, 50 Cal. App. 45, 194 P. 510; In re Gury, 103 Cal. App. 738, 284 P. 944.

The writ is discharged, and the minor remanded to the custody of respondents.

COOKS, WAITERS, AND WAIT-
RESSES et al.
Civ. 8545.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.
Aug. 15, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1933.

1. Injunction ☞101(3).

Acts of pickets amounting to physical intimidation of employees and patrons of business should be enjoined.

2. Injunction ☞101(3).

Physical intimidation of employees or patrons of business by pickets, warranting injunction, may be accomplished by obstruction and annoyance or insult and menacing attitude.

3. Injunction ☞101(3).

Proprietors of restaurant held entitled to injunction to restrain intimidation of patrons and employees, where court found pickets in front of restaurant made grimaces and insulting gestures and waved newspapers containing headlines derogatory to restaurant.

The court found that pickets employed by the union danced around on sidewalk in front of the restaurant, pointing at the restaurant and the persons therein, made grimacing and insulting gestures to and at the restaurant employees, and advanced near the door and prominently displayed to patrons in the restaurant newspaper headlines derogatory to the restaurant. The papers were so held that headlines could be plainly read by persons passing along the sidewalk in front of the restaurant or entering or leaving restaurant. The court further found that, by reason of such acts of the pickets, many regular patrons and customers of the restaurant had ceased to patronize it.

4. Injunction ☞101(1).

Trade union can carry on boycott both primary and secondary in connection with strike.

5. Injunction ☞190.

Injunction against picketing of nonunion restaurant should be limited to restraint against intimidating, threatening, molesting, or coercing proprietors, employees, or patrons.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Suit by P. M. Lisse and others against Local Union No. 31, Cooks, Waiters, and Waitresses, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

Walter M. Gleason, of Oakland, for appellants.

J. W. O'Neill, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiffs own and operate a business in Oakland known as the Rainbow Café, wherein they manufacture and sell bakery products and serve meals to the public for profit; and as such owners they brought this action and obtained a judgment against the defendant labor union and some of its officers and members to restrain them from an alleged illegal interference with the operation of said business. From said judgment defendants appeal.

The findings upon which the judgment is based follow generally the allegations of the complaint, and the evidence is legally sufficient to support such findings. Among the facts found were the following: "That plaintiffs have conducted said business at said location continuously since 1924. That at all times up to the 8th day of October, 1929, plaintiff, in the conduct of said business, employed as cooks and waitresses, persons who were members of said defendant association. That on October 8, 1929, said defendant association called a strike against plaintiffs and at said time all of said cooks and waitresses, members of defendant association, as aforesaid, left their work at plaintiffs' said place of business and ever since said date defendants have been and are now maintaining a boycott against plaintiffs' said business. That on the 11th day of October, 1929, defendants commenced to maintain and up to the time of the issuance of the temporary restraining order herein on November 27, 1929, did maintain, and, unless restrained by the court from so doing, will continue to maintain, pickets in front of and adjacent to and near plaintiffs' said place of business for the purpose of intimidating and causing the public to cease to patronize the said business of plaintiffs. That since said 11th day of October, 1929, up to the time of the issuance of said restraining order, as aforesaid, said pickets so stationed in front of and adjacent to and near plaintiffs' said place of business, as aforesaid displayed and waved in front of the people passing by or approaching said place of business, papers on which are printed in large type the following statements: 'RAINBOW CAFE NOW NONUNION'; 'IS ON OFFICIAL "WE DON'T PATRONIZE" LIST OF UNION LABOR'; 'IS RAINBOW CAFE VIOLATING LAW?' 'RAINBOW CAFE OWNER CHARGED WITH STATE EIGHT HOUR LAW VIOLATION'; 'RAINBOW CAFE FIGHT PROGRESSES.' That at the time of the commencement of this action, said pickets were displaying to and waving in front of the people passing by or approaching said place of business, papers on which are printed in large type the following statement: 'RAINBOW CAFE FIGHT PROGRESSES.' * * * That at various times during said period from October 11, 1929, up to the time of the issuance of said temporary restraining order, as aforesaid, said pickets so employed by defendant association, as aforesaid, danced around on the sidewalk in front of plaintiffs' said restaurant, pointed at said restaurant and the persons therein, made grimaces and insulting gestures to and at the employees of plaintiffs, advanced near the door and prominently displayed to patrons in said restaurant said headlines derogatory to said restaurant, wildly waved said papers carrying said headlines against said restaurant, and displayed said papers by holding one spread across the chest of the picket so that said headlines against said restaurant could be plainly read by persons passing along the sidewalk in front of said restaurant or entering or leaving said restaurant and by prominently waving and displaying another copy of said paper in the hand of the picket. That solely by reason of the maintaining of said pickets, as aforesaid, and the acts of said pickets as hereinbefore set forth, many persons who were regular patrons and customers of plaintiffs have been intimidated and caused and induced to cease and have ceased to patronize plaintiffs' said business." The court further found as follows: " * * * That the newspapers displayed by said pickets, as aforesaid, with the headlines referred to said restaurant, as aforesaid, were copies of the East Bay Labor Journal and that said paper has been declared a newspaper of general circulation by decree of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Alameda. But in this connection, the court finds that said newspapers were not displayed or offered for sale by said pickets in good faith or in the usual and ordinary manner, or for producing revenue or increasing circulation; that said newspapers were displayed by said pickets, as aforesaid, solely for the purpose of injuring and damaging plaintiffs and their said business and that defendants, pursuant to their said plan and conspiracy to injure and damage plaintiffs, procured and caused said headlines against said restaurant to be printed in bold type in said newspaper so that the same could be displayed in front of and near said restaurant of plaintiffs and at the same time assert the claim that said pickets were merely vendors of newspapers; that said claim of defendants that said pickets were bona fide newspaper vendors is a sham and subterfuge resorted to merely in an endeavor to cover up and conceal their real purpose, namely, to injure and damage plaintiffs. * * * The foregoing findings are legally sufficient under the decisions of this state to justify the granting of injunctive relief. Southern Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, 186 Cal. 604, 200 P. 1, 4; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 P. 324; Goldberg, etc., Co. v. Stablemen's Union, 149 Cal. 429, 86 P. 806, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 460, 117 Am. St. Rep. 145, 9 Ann. Cas. 1219; Rosenberg v. Retail Clerks' Ass'n, 39 Cal. App. 67, 177 P. 864, 865; Moore v. Cooks', etc., Union, 39 Cal. App. 538, 179 P. 417.

[1, 2] Appellants contend that, even though the representatives stationed by them in front of respondents' café are deemed to be pickets, they were at most engaged in "peaceful picketing," which they claim, in the absence of any prohibitory state statutes or municipal ordinances upon the subject, may not be enjoined. It is evident, however, that the acts found to have been committed went beyond the bounds of peaceful picketing and amounted to physical intimidation of respondents' employees and patrons; and it is well settled by the decisions above cited that such acts will be enjoined. See, also, 15 Cal. Jur. 581, and cases there cited. In this regard it is held that, in order to prove physical intimidation and fear, it is not necessary to show that there was actual force or express threats of physical violence used; that such result may be accomplished as effectually by obstructing and annoying others and by insult and menacing attitude as by physical assault. Southern Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, supra; Jordahl v. Hayda, 1 Cal. App. 696, 82 P. 1079; Martin on Labor Unions, p. 229. In so holding the Supreme Court, in the case of Southern Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, supra, in quoting approvingly from another case, said that "intimidation * * * includes persuasion by or on behalf of a combination of persons, * * * resulting in coercion of the will from the mere force of numbers"; and the court then points out that the same rule is declared in Martin on Labor Unions, supra, as follows: "Even a simple 'request' to do or not to do a thing, made by one or more of a body of strikers under circumstances calculated to convey a threatening intimation, with a design to hinder or obstruct workmen, is unlawful intimidation, and not less obnoxious than the use of physical force for the same purpose." The rule is applied with equal force as to customers and patrons. Goldberg, etc., Co. v. Stablemen's Union, supra.

[3] With respect to the display of the labor journal in front of respondents' place of business by appellants' representatives, it is of course true that the constitutional guaranty against abridgment of the freedom of the press carries with it freedom of circulation and sale of the publication (In re Jackson, 96 U. S. 727, 24 L. Ed. 877), and obviously the fact that a newspaper may support and advocate the cause of a trades union in a controversy with an employer, and uses its columns and headlines to bring to the attention of the public the claim of the union that the particular business in question is being operated in a manner deemed unfair to labor, serves as no legal ground for interfering with the sale or circulation of such newspaper in the immediate vicinity of the place where such business is being carried on, or elsewhere. But it is held in the case of Goldberg, etc., Co. v. Stablemen's Union, supra, that it is an invasion of the constitutional right to acquire, possess, and enjoy property, to place pickets in front of a place of business bearing placards and signs for the purpose of intimidating the patrons or employees of such place of business, and that such acts will be enjoined; and in the present case the trial court found, as already shown, that the display of said journal in front of respondents' place of business was not in good faith for the purpose of circulating or selling the same, and that said journal was not offered for sale in the usual and ordinary manner by newspaper vendors, but was displayed by appellants' pickets as a sham and subterfuge for the purpose of intimidating the patrons and employees of said place of business. It is evident, therefore, that the acts of appellants' representatives in displaying said journal in front of respondents' place of business in the manner and for the purposes found were brought within the rule of the Goldberg Case, supra, prohibiting the illegal display of signs and placards.

[4, 5] The injunctive relief granted, however, was, in our opinion, too broad, for the reason that, not only do the terms thereof go so far as to infringe upon the constitutional right to freely circulate and offer said newspaper for sale upon the public streets, but under the law of this state, in the absence of contractual obligations, a trades union, besides having the right to call a strike, has the legal right also to carry on in connection therewith a boycott, both primary and secondary; and it is evident that the comprehensive terms of the injunction herein enjoin appellants from doing some of the acts which under the decisions of this state it may lawfully do in furtherance of a secondary boycott. As said in Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, supra (page 75 of 156 Cal., 103 P. 324, 327): "The right of united labor to strike, in furtherance of trade interests (no contractual obligation standing in the way) is fully recognized. The reason for the strike may be based upon the refusal to comply with the employees' demand for the betterment of wages, conditions, hours of labor, the discharge of one employee, the engagement of another—any one or more of the multifarious considerations which in good faith may be believed to tend toward the advancement of the employees. After striking, the employee may engage in a 'boycott,' as that word is here employed. As here employed, it means not only the right to the concerted withdrawal of social and business intercourse, but the right by all legitimate means—of fair publication, and fair oral or written persuasion—to induce others interested in, or sympathetic with, their cause, to withdraw their social intercourse and business patronage from the employer. They may go even further than this, and request of another that he withdraw his patronage from the employer, and may use the moral intimidation and coercion of threatening a like boycott against him if he refuse so to do. This last proposition necessarily involves the bringing into a labor dispute between A. and B., C., who has no difference with either. It contemplates that C., upon the request of B., and under the moral intimidation lest B. boycott him, may thus be constrained to withdraw his patronage from A., with whom he has no controversy. This is the 'secondary boycott,' the legality of which is vigorously denied by the English courts, the federal courts, and by the courts of many of the states of this nation. Without presenting the authorities, which are multitudinous, suffice it to state the other view in language of the president of the United States, but recently uttered. [The language referred to is here quoted.] And continuing, the court said: "Notwithstanding the great dignity which attaches to an utterance such as this, which, as has been said, is but the expression of numerous courts upon the subject-matter, this court, after great deliberation, took what it believed to be the truer and more advanced ground, above indicated and fully set forth in Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, etc. [154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165], supra. In this respect this court recognizes no substantial distinction between the so-called primary and secondary boycott. Each rests upon the right of the union to withdraw its patronage from its employer, and to induce by fair means any and all other persons to do the same, and, in exercise of those means, as the unions would have the unquestioned right to withhold their patronage from a third person who continued to deal with their employer, so they have the unquestioned right to notify such third person that they will withdraw their patronage if he continues so to deal. However opposed to the weight of federal authority the views of this court are, that they are not unique may be noted by reading National Protective Association v. Cumming, 170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648; Lindsay v. Montana Federation of Labor, 37 Mont. 264, 96 P. 127, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707 [127 Am. St. Rep. 722], where the highest courts of those states formulate and adopt like principles." Upon the same subject, and with particular reference to the right of striking employees to induce fellow employees to join in such strike, the Supreme Court, in the case of Southern Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, supra, said: "Furthermore, it is lawful for the employee who has quit to peaceably persuade a fellow employee to leave his position. Moreover, if there are a number of employees who had left a common employer, they are within their legal rights if and when they attempt as a group to persuade other employees, who continue to work, to quit, provided there be no force, violence, or intimidation, physical or moral, used—that is, the mere fact of numbers does not necessarily make such persuasion illegal."

In the present case the broad terms of the injunctive relief granted are doubtless based upon an abstract statement contained in the decisions in the cases of Rosenberg v. Retail Clerks' Ass'n, supra, and Moore v. Cooks, etc., Union, supra, to the effect that "there is no such thing as peaceful picketing." However, the decision in neither of those cases was reviewed by the Supreme Court on petition for hearing before that court, and an examination of the decisions themselves will disclose that the statement referred to was founded on certain language used in the decision in Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Gee (C. C.) 139 F. 582, which, as will be noted, was a federal case, and not only did it involve acts of actual violence, but, as pointed out by the Supreme Court in Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, supra, the legality of the secondary boycott, in furtherance of which acts of picketing are carried on, is "vigorously denied" in the federal jurisdiction. True, in the Pierce Case, the court goes on to say that picketing in its very nature is calculated to and naturally does incite crowds, riots, and disturbances of the peace; but the argument used was evidently intended to apply to such facts as were then before the court, which showed that the pickets actually used menacing terms and threatening language, such as: "* * * This is a scab stable. When we catch you outside, we will finish you. We will get you yet. It is a scab stable, full of scabs. We will fix you yet. It is a matter of time when we will get you all right. You will never get out of the stable alive. We will break you in half. We will beat you to death. When we catch you outside, we will finish you." As further indication that the court in that case did not intend to hold in the abstract that there could be no such thing as peaceful picketing, we quote the following from its opinion: "As we have undertaken to define boycott, it is an organized effort to persuade or coerce, which may be legal or illegal, according to the means employed. In other jurisdictions where a definition is given to a boycott which imports illegality, the injunction will of course lie against boycotting as such. In this state the injunction will issue depending upon the circumstance whether the means employed, or threatened to be employed, are legal or illegal" (italics ours), which is in accord with the general rule declared in Ruling Case Law (vol. 10, p. 454) wherein it is stated that the decision of the question whether picketing is lawful or unlawful depends upon the circumstances surrounding each case; that taking every circumstance into account, if it appears that the object of the picketing is to interfere with those passing in or out by other than persuasive means, it is illegal; but that, if the design of the picketing is to see who can be the subject of persuasive inducement, such picketing is legal, and that whether picketing is lawful or unlawful depends in each particular case upon the conduct of the parties themselves. And the concurring opinion of Justices Angellotti and Sloss, in the Pierce Case, supra, may be taken also as indication of a belief on the part of the court in that case that all forms of picketing are not inherently unlawful, for it is there said: "So far as 'picketing' is concerned, while we are not prepared to hold that there may not be acts coming within that term, as it is accepted and understood in labor disputes, that are entirely lawful, and should not be enjoined, we believe that, as to such 'picketing' as is described in both findings and judgment in this case, the views expressed in the opinion of the court are correct." It will be noted, too, from an inspection of the opinion in the Pierce Case, supra, that, in order to conform to the views therein expressed upon the subject of secondary boycott, the terms of the injunction were modified, the court in this regard saying: "It was, for example, too broad in restraining defendants from 'in any wise interfering with' plaintiff's business, since the interference which we have discussed, of publication, reasonable persuasion, and threat to withdraw patronage, is legal, and such as defendants could employ. So, also, was the injunction too broad in restrain-ing defendants from 'intimidating any customer by boycott or threat of boycott' since, as has been said, the secondary boycott is likewise a legal weapon." So, also, in the case of Southern Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, supra, the injunction was modified to exclude from its operation a certain form of picketing, the court there saying: "The judgment as entered, however, is too broad in its terms, in that it purports to prohibit acts which may or may not be unlawful, according to the purpose for which they are done, and it does not clearly couple the acts with the unlawful purpose. Thus, for example, the placing of pickets near respondent's place of business for a purpose not at all connected with said business, and not for the purpose of intimidating employees of respondent, so as to coerce them to quit that employment, nor for the purpose of intimidating persons intending to become employees of respondent, so as to prevent them from doing so, could not appropriately be enjoined, since such an act would not be wrongful as against the respondent, and would not be calculated to injure the respondent's business." But as already shown, in that case, as in the present one, physical intimidation and fear was used in carrying on the secondary boycott; in other words, there, as here, in order to accomplish a legitimate object, appellants resorted to illegitimate means; consequently, those illegal acts were enjoined.

Therefore, in order to conform as far as possible with the views expressed in the cases above cited, and to follow the form of the judgment as modified in Southern Cal. Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, supra, it is ordered that the judgment herein be modified and re-entered to read as follows: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that defendants herein and each of them and all persons acting for them or either of them or in aid or assistance of them or either of them be and they are hereby perpetually enjoined and commanded to desist and refrain directly or indirectly or by any means or method from doing or attempting to do any of the following described acts: (a) intimidating, threatening, molesting or coercing plaintiffs in the conduct of their business known as the 'Rainbow Cafe' situated at No. 1218 Broadway Street, in the city of Oakland, California, or for any such purposes obstructing or interfering with, or attempting to obstruct or interfere with the free use, occupation and enjoyment thereof by plaintiffs, their agents, servants and employees; (b) intimidating, threatening, molesting or coercing any employee or employees, customer or customers, patron or patrons, of plaintiffs; (c) stationing or placing any picket or pickets with the intention or for the purpose of intimidating, threatening, molesting or coercing, or attempting to intimidate, threaten, molest or coerce any customer, patron or employee of plaintiff now or hereafter patronizing or working for said plaintiffs. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs do have and recover from defendants their costs of suit, taxed herein at the sum of $44.50."

In reviewing cases of this kind and in framing the terms of injunctive relief it is, of course, as said in many of the decisions, impossible to define comprehensively or with exactness each and every act which may or may not be legally done in carrying on a labor controversy; and it is evident that any attempt so to do would lead into a field of unlimited speculation. All that the court can do is to deal with those specific acts which by the evidence are shown to have been committed in furtherance of the particular dispute then before it; and necessarily the question of whether future acts of a different character, if any there be, shall be deemed to fall within the inhibitive provisions of the judgment must be left, primarily at least, to the decision of the trial court in determining any subsequent proceedings based thereon.

As hereinabove modified, the judgment will stand affirmed, respondents to recover their costs.

CASHIN, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the conclusion that picketing, peaceable in fact, if not violative of a statute or ordinance, is not unlawful, and that the judgment should be modified. However, a judgment in cases of this character should so clearly express the mandate of the court that a defendant may readily know what he is restrained from doing. 32 Cor. Jur., Injunctions, § 620, p. 369; Temco Manufacturing Co. v. National Electric, etc., Co., 223 Mo. App. 420, 18 S.W.(2d) 142; Great Northern R. Co. v. Brosseau (D. C.) 286 F. 414. Accordingly, it is my understanding that the word "intimidate," as used in the modified judgment, refers only to fear caused by threats, abuse, or violence, and not to the natural effect of picketing or any other form of boycott, namely, fear on the part of a patron that his own business or calling might suffer, or that he might lose the good will generally of those friendly to organized labor, or a similar apprehension by the owner or the employees of the boycotted business. Further, that the words "interfere and obstruct" are intended to mean physical interference or obstruction, and are not used in the sense of peaceable intervention or opposition.

ROSE et al. v. SAN DIEGO ELECTRIC RY.

CO. et al.

Civ. 969.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 10, 1933.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1001(2).

Where verdict and judgment are supported by some evidence, appellate court is bound by implied findings of jury, even though appellate court may have reached contrary conclusion.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Appellate court cannot reverse judgment because of conflict in evidence.

3. Action ⇨53(2).

Only one action may be brought to recover damages resulting from wrongful death (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

4. Death ⇨41.

Action for damages for wrongful death should be brought either by deceased's personal representative, or by all of heirs who may recover total pecuniary loss in lump sum (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

5. Death ⇨101.

In action for damages for wrongful death, court should not attempt to apportion loss of each heir in judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

6. Parties ⇨35.

Heir who refuses to join as plaintiff in action for damages for wrongful death should be made defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

7. New trial ⇨9.

In action for damages for wrongful death, wherein answer denied that plaintiffs were sole heirs, granting of new trial on issue of heirship only, not including issue of damages, held error (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 377, 657).

Granting of new trial on issue of heirship only, not including issue of damages, constituted error under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, authorizing new trial on all or part of the issues, because question of heirship was so intimately related to amount of recovery as to constitute a single issue, and new trial should have been granted on both questions.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1170(11).

Error in granting new trial on issue of heirship in action for wrongful death, without including issue of damages, held harmless, where court, on retrial, found that plaintiffs were sole heirs (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 377, 657; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

9. Evidence ⇨291.

In action for wrongful death, husband's testimony detailing statements of deceased that husband and mother were sole heirs held admissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 377, and § 1870, subd. 4).

Testimony of husband detailing statements of deceased, to effect that her husband and her mother, who were the plaintiffs, were her sole heirs, was admissible, since under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 4, heirship may be proved by the declaration of a deceased person.

10. Death ⇨75.

In action by alleged heirs for wrongful death, proof of heirship is made by evidence that certain persons, and they only, are heirs (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. N. Turrentine, Judge.

Action by S. C. Rose and another against the San Diego Electric Railway Company and others. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants San Diego Electric Railway Company and James L. Owen appeal, and the defendant Q. D. McClard separately appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Wright & McKee and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, of San Francisco, and V. F. Bennett, of San Diego, for appellants San Diego Electric Ry. Co. and James L. Owen.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant Q. D. McClard.

Adam Thompson and Renwick Thompson, both of San Diego, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

S. C. Rose and Eleanor McIntosh were the husband and mother, respectively, of Margaret Rose. They brought this action for damages for the death of Margaret which resulted from injuries received in a collision between two motor vehicles on the 20th day of December, 1930, in the intersection of Sigbee and Newton streets, both public thoroughfares in the city of San Diego.

The cause of action finds its source in the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. One of the issuable facts is whether respondents are the only heirs at law of Margaret Rose, deceased.

The San Diego Electric Railway Company is a corporation operating a railway and motor bus transportation system in the city of San Diego as a common carrier of passengers. On the day of the accident Mrs. Rose was a passenger in one of its busses. James L. Owen, an employee of the railway company, was driving this bus northerly on Sigsbee street. At about the same time Q. D. McClard was driving a small automobile in an easterly direction on Newton street. Both vehicles were on their own right-hand sides of the streets. The automobile came into collision with the bus, striking it at about the center of its left-hand side just as the front end of the bus had reached a place north of the center line of Newton street. The force of the impact threw Mrs. Rose onto the floor of the bus. Another woman was thrown on top of her. A few moments after the accident Mrs. Rose fainted. She was taken to her home, where she received medical attention for about two days when she was removed to a hospital, where she became progressively worse and died on January 9, 1931. An autopsy was performed and the autopsy surgeon found such a diseased condition in her kidneys that he attributed her death to lobar pneumonia, caused by septic poisoning and Bright's disease.

The attending physician of Mrs. Rose gave the progress of her illness substantially as follows: On the first examination there was a discoloration of her chest and such pain that it indicated a broken rib, a discolored bruise on her back and another on her buttocks. Her symptoms and appearance on the day of her injuries did not indicate that death might follow. Her condition became rapidly worse, and a form of insanity developed which the physicians called traumatic psychosis. This required that she be restrained on her bed. She would not eat and her food was given her by "forced feeding." She developed hypostatic pneumonia which resulted in her death. In the opinion of one of her physicians this was caused by her being restrained and confined to one position on her bed. He testified as follows: "Q. Doctor, I want to ask a question or two. Tell me, Doctor, if I am correctly following your theory of the chain of circumstances and causation that resulted in the death of this woman: She had a trauma, that is, a blow; that blow was evidenced by certain bruises on her body. You also concluded that the blow caused an insanity, which you call a traumatic psychosis; that the insanity required or demanded that she be restrained in bed, and that you accordingly restrained her; and that the restraint, plus her lowered resistance, resulted in a pneumonia; and the pneumonia resulted in her death. A. That's exactly true." Another attending physician gave similar testimony.

The intersection in which the accident occurred was an obstructed one, and it is admitted the speed limit there was fifteen miles per hour. There is evidence in the record that McClard drove his automobile at a speed between twenty and forty miles per hour in entering the intersection. There is also evidence that Owen drove the bus at a speed of between sixteen and twenty miles an hour on entering and crossing the intersection. McClard testified that he entered the intersection first at a speed of not more than fifteen miles per hour. Owen testified that he entered at fifteen or less miles per hour, and that before he crossed the south line of the intersection he saw McClard at least fifty feet west of the west line of the intersection and that he did not again see the McClard automobile until the moment of impact. At that time the body of the bus completely blocked the south half of the intersection to east-bound traffic on Newton street.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of respondents in the sum of $3,500. Upon the hearing of a motion for new trial it developed that respondents had failed to introduce evidence that they were the only heirs of Mrs. Rose. The trial court granted the motion on this ground, and the case was again set for trial. Evidence on this question was introduced and the cause again submitted for decision. The trial court found that respondents were the only heirs of deceased, and entered judgments in their favor in the sum of $3,500, the amount awarded by the jury.

McClard took an appeal separately from that taken by the San Diego Electric Railway Company and James L. Owen. He concedes that the evidence was conflicting on the question of the negligence of the drivers of both vehicles, but adopts the other specifications of error of his coappellants.

The San Diego Electric Railway Company and Owen urge that the evidence shows that the negligence of McClard was the sole and proximate cause of the injury and shows no negligence on the part of Owen; that the death of Mrs. Rose was not the proximate result of her injuries in the collision, but from bodily disease which the autopsy established had existed for a considerable time prior to the accident; that the trial court erred in granting a new trial on the question of heirship only; and that the trial court erred in instructing the jury and in refusing instructions proposed by appellants.

The argument that the evidence conclusively shows that the accident was caused by the negligence of McClard and that there was no negligence proven on the part of Owen is met by the testimony of McClard that he entered the intersection first at a lawful rate of speed and the testimony of several witnesses that Owen drove the bus up to and into the intersection at an unlawful rate of speed. Section 113, Cal. Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

The jury and the trial court on motion for new trial adopted the theory that both drivers were negligent and that their concurrent negligence was the proximate or contributing cause of the injury.

[1] Under this state of the record, the verdict and judgment being supported by some evidence, we are bound by the implied findings in the trial court, even though we feel that were we sitting as trial judges we might have reached a contrary conclusion. Lutz v. Merchants' National Bank, 179 Cal. 401, 177 P. 158; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Rocha v. Garcia, 203 Cal. 167, 263 P. 238.

[2] The testimony of the two attending physicians of deceased, to which we have referred, showed a causal connection between her injury in the accident and her death. It is true that this is strongly disputed by other evidence. This created a conflict, but we cannot reverse a judgment because of a conflict in the evidence.

We have examined all of the instructions given and all of those refused, and can find no error committed by the trial judge.

The question of the trial court granting a new trial on the issue of heirship only and preserving the rest of the judgment presents a somewhat novel question upon which we have been cited to no California case deciding the precise point.

Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "a new trial is granted, on all or part of the issues." The question here presented is, then, whether in this case the sole heirship of respondents, this being denied in the answer, was so closely interwoven with the amount of damages awarded as to make a single issue in the case. If this be answered in the affirmative, it will follow that the trial court should have granted a new trial on the question of heirship and damages preserving only the judgment on the concurrent negligence of appellants which it had the undoubted power to do. Pretzer v. California Transit Co., 211 Cal. 202, 294 P. 382.

[3-6] This action was brought under the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under this section only one action can be brought for damages suffered by death and is a bar to other actions. It should be brought either by the personal representative of the deceased who acts in the capacity of a trustee for all the heirs in recovering a judgment, or by all of the heirs who may recover in one "lump sum" the total of the pecuniary loss suffered by each. In such a case the court should not attempt to apportion the loss of each heir in the judgment. This should be done in an appropriate proceeding. Munro v. Dredging, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 P. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248; Hartigan v. Southern Pacific Co., 86 Cal. 142, 24 P. 851; Robinson v. Western, etc., Gas Co., 184 Cal. 461, 194 P. 39; Estate of Ricconi, 185 Cal. 458, 197 P. 97, 14 A. L. R. 509; Gilmore v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 211 Cal. 192, 295 P. 41. If an heir refuses to join as plaintiff he should be made a defendant. Salmon v.

Rathjens, 152 Cal. 290, 92 P. 733. In Roach v. Drew, 72 Cal. App. 45, at page 47, 236 P. 568, 569, it was said: "'An action by a portion only of the heirs is not the action authorized by our statute. All the heirs should therefore join as plaintiffs in an action by heirs, and, if the consent of any one who should be so joined cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant.'" [Citing cases.] 'While there can be but one action brought or one recovery had either by the personal representative of the deceased or the heirs, * * * and while the recovery in such an action should be of a single "lump sum" for all, * * * the total recovery to be had is the aggregate of the pecuniary loss of each of the heirs who has suffered a pecuniary loss by reason of the death of the deceased. * * * It is obvious that the distribution among "heirs" of damages recovered by the statutory trustee must be upon the basis of the pecuniary loss of each.' (Estate of Ricconi et al., 185 Cal. 458, 461, 462, 197 P. 97, 98, 14 A. L. R. 509.)"

[7, 8] In cases of this kind it would seem clear that as the amount of the recovery is the total of the pecuniary loss suffered by each of the heirs, the fact that an heir suffering a pecuniary loss is not a party, directly affects the amount of the recovery. Where, as here, the question of heirship is made an issue by the pleadings, and there is no proof that the plaintiffs are the sole heirs of the deceased, the question of heirship is so intimately related to the amount of the recovery as to constitute a single issue, and the new trial should have been granted on both questions. However, on the retrial, evidence was offered to the effect that respondents were the sole heirs of deceased and the trial court so found. Under this state of the record the error was harmless and we cannot reverse the judgment. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

[9, 10] At the second trial S. C. Rose was permitted to detail statements of the deceased to the effect that her husband and mother, the respondents here, were her sole heirs. Appellants urge that this evidence was hearsay and not competent to support the findings of the trial court. Heirship may be proved by the declaration of a deceased person. Section 1870, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Morgan, 203 Cal. 569, 265 P. 241; Estate of McNamara, 181 Cal. 82, 183 P. 552, 7 A. L. R. 313. Proof of heirship is made by evidence that certain persons are the heirs of a deceased and that they are the only heirs.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte BORAH.
Cr. 2434.District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 22, 1933.

I. Automobiles $\S$ 359.

Punishment for felony under Vehicle Act is controlled thereby, not by Penal Code, limiting jail sentence for offense also punishable by imprisonment in state prison to six months (Pen. Code, §§ 17, 19; St. 1923, p. 517, § 153½, as added by St. 1929, p. 547, § 68; p. 564, § 146, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2133, § 60; p. 565, § 153(a, d), as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 18).

2. Automobiles $\S$ 359.

Provision of Vehicle Act, limiting jail sentence of violator, convicted of misdemeanor, to six months, is inapplicable to conviction of felony (St. 1923, p. 565, § 153(c, d), as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 18).

Application by William A. Borah for a writ of habeas corpus discharging him from custody pursuant to a conviction of violating the California Vehicle Act.

Writ denied, and petitioner remanded to custody.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

[1] In a criminal action, People v. Borah, petitioner pleaded guilty of the crime of violation of section 146 of the California Vehicle Act, a felony, and admitted prior conviction of a felony for which he had served a term of imprisonment. By the judgment pursuant to which petitioner is now held in custody, it was ordered that the defendant pay a fine of $1,500, or, in lieu of such payment, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles at the rate of one day for each $2 of said fine not paid.

In default of payment of the fine, petitioner has been confined in the county jail ever since September 16, 1932. He contends that under such sentence the limit of his lawful imprisonment was six months, and therefore that he is now entitled to discharge from custody. In support of this contention he relies upon the provisions of sections 146, 153, and 153½ of the California Vehicle Act (section 146, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2133, § 60; section 153, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 18; section 153½, as added by St.

1929, p. 547, § 68), and sections 17 and 19 of the Penal Code. Section 17 of the Penal Code provides that when a crime, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, is also punishable by fine or imprisonment in a county jail, in the discretion of the court, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison. And section 19 provides that, "except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both."

The foregoing sections of the Penal Code state a general rule, without specifying the particular crimes to which they apply. Section 146 of the California Vehicle Act, on the other hand, describes the particular offense of which petitioner herein was found guilty, and declares that one who commits such offense "shall be deemed guilty of a felony." Section 153 (a) of the same act declares that "it shall be unlawful and constitute a misdemeanor for any person to violate any of the provisions of this act unless such violation is by this act or other law of this state declared to be a felony." It is further provided therein, section 153 (d), that: "Unless another penalty is in this act or by the laws of this state provided, every person convicted of a felony for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars or by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Section 153½ of said act reads as follows: "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine for any violation of this act may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied. But the judgment must specify the extent of the imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, nor extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted."

By comparison of the judgment with the foregoing provisions of the California Vehicle Act, it will be seen that the imposition of a fine in the sum of $1,500, with the alternative of imprisonment at the rate of one day for every $2 of fine, is directly authorized by that law. We think that the case is not controlled by the provisions of sections 17 and 19 of the Penal Code; but, on the contrary, is controlled by the provisions of the California Vehicle Act, which specifically provide a stated punishment for violations of that act, and which were enacted at a later date than said sections of the Penal Code.

[2] Petitioner also relies upon the provisions of section 153 (c) of said California Vehicle Act, reading as follows: "Unless another penalty is in this act or by the laws of this state provided, every person convicted of a misdemeanor for the violation of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine not to exceed five hundred dollars or imprisonment in the county jail for not to exceed six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." But it will be seen by subdivision (d) of the same section, as above quoted, that another penalty is provided in said act, and for that reason said subdivision (c) is not applicable to the instant case.

Petitioner is remanded to custody.

SEARS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CALAVERAS COUNTY et al.

Civ. 4951.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 15, 1933.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Sept. 14, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1933.

1. Criminal law ☞260(2).

When justice's court has jurisdiction of subject-matter and person, neither Supreme Court nor District Court of Appeal may review its proceedings on certiorari; remedy being by appeal to superior court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

2. Constitutional law ☞83(3).

Master and servant ☞69.

Statute penalizing failure to pay discharged employee's wages held not to violate Constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debts (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 4743, § 6; Const. art. 1, § 15).

3. Master and servant ☞84.

Complaint in prosecution for violating statute penalizing failure to pay discharged employee's wages held sufficient, in absence of demurrer (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 4743).

The complaint charged violation of Gen. Laws 1931, Act 4743, with specific reference thereto, alleging that the defendants while acting as officers of employer discharged employee from service of employer and with intent to annoy, oppress, hinder, delay, and defraud the employee, willfully and unlawfully refuse to pay the employee the wages due to employee, who demanded payment.

4. Criminal law ☞90(2).

Justice's court had jurisdiction of misdemeanor prosecution for discharging and fraudulently refusing to pay wages of employee (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 4743, § 6).

5. Criminal law ☞260(11).

Where court has jurisdiction of cause, mere insufficiency of evidence to support judgment may not be considered on certiorari.

6. Judges ☞25(1).

Where written request to justice of adjoining township to try case did not limit authority to any date, visiting justice could try case on date specified in docket entry or any subsequent date to which it was regularly continued, notwithstanding docket entry regarding written request stated trial was to be on particular date (Code Civ. Proc. § 105).

Visiting justice's authority to try case was not limited to date stated in docket entry, since the written request was general in its terms, and the docket entry was merely prima facie evidence of authority to try the case and was not conclusive regarding the authorized date of trial.

7. Judges ☞25(2).

Visiting justice acquiring jurisdiction by written request to try cause in another township of his county may continue case and retain authority to try it at subsequent date (Code Civ. Proc. § 922).

Certiorari to Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Certiorari proceedings by Harry Sears and another against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Calaveras, Honorable J. T. B. Warne, presiding.

Writ of certiorari dismissed.

William M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Cyril Appel, all of San Francisco, J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, and Ivores R. Dains, Philip C. Boardman, and Henry A. Plattner, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Virgil M. Airola, Dist. Atty., of San Andreas, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The petitioners were convicted in the justice's court of Angels township, Calaveras county, of discharging an employee of their mine without first paying the wages which were due to him, in violation of the provisions of an act of the Legislature regulating the payment of wages by private employers. Stats. 1919, p. 294, and amendments thereto; 2 Deering's Gen. Laws of 1931, p. 2241, Act 4743. Each defendant was fined, with the alternative penalty of one day of imprisonment for each $2 thereof in the event the fine was not paid. Upon appeal to the superior court the judgment was affirmed. In this petition for a writ of certiorari the jurisdiction of the courts is challenged.

It is contended the justice of the peace who tried the cause was without jurisdiction for the reason that he was not requested by the duly elected justice of that township to try the case as required by section 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is asserted the complaint in the criminal proceeding fails to state a cause of action; that the ability of the defendants to pay the wages demanded was neither alleged nor proved; that the judgment is not supported by the evidence; and that the statute regulating the payment of wages is unconstitutional, in that it violates article 1, § 15, of the Constitution, which prohibits the imprisonment of a person for debt.

[1] The writ of certiorari does not lie in the present case. It has been definitely determined by the California authorities that when a justice's court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the person involved in the litigation, neither the Supreme Court nor the District Court of Appeal may review its proceedings upon certiorari for the reason that the remedy for error of law or facts on the part of the inferior court is afforded by an appeal to the superior court. Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.; 4 Cal. Jur. 1054, §§ 25, 26; Roberts v. Police Court, 185 Cal. 65, 195 P. 1053, 1054; Hood v. Melrose, 24 Cal. App. 355, 360, 141 P. 396; People v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. App. 201, 205, 257 P. 922. This is true regardless of whether the petitioner avails himself of his right to appeal to the superior court or not. Where the right of appeal exists the writ of certiorari will not lie. In both the Roberts and the Hood Cases, supra, the writs of certiorari were denied, notwithstanding the fact that judgments of the inferior court had been affirmed on appeal to the superior court from which last-mentioned court there was no appeal. In the case of Roberts v. Police Court, supra, the court says: "It is thoroughly settled that the judgment of a police court or justice's court will not be reviewed on certiorari, after appeal taken therefrom and determination of such appeal in the superior court."

It may be true that when a complaint which is filed in a justice's court fails to allege facts constituting an offense of which it has jurisdiction, or when facts are alleged which constitute an offense of which it clearly has no jurisdiction, such as a charge of felony, the judgment of conviction may be annulled on certiorari. Denninger v. Records' Court, 145 Cal. 629, 638, 79 P. 360. The reason for this is that, under such circumstances, the inferior court absolutely has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter sought to be charged.

[2] In the present case it is contended the justice's court is without jurisdiction for the reason that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and because the statute attempting to regulate the payment of workmen's wages is unconstitutional and void.

Section 6 of the act regulating the payment of workers' wages provides: "Any person, firm, association, or corporation, or agent, manager, superintendent, or officer thereof, who having the ability to pay, shall wilfully refuse to pay the wages due and payable when demanded, as herein provided, or falsely deny the amount or validity thereof, or that the same is due, with intent to secure for himself, his employer or other person, any discount upon such indebtedness, or with intent to annoy, harass, or oppress, or hinder, or delay, or defraud, the person to whom such indebtedness is due, shall, in addition to any other penalty imposed upon him by this act, be guilty of a misdemeanor."

It has been held this statute is not unconstitutional or in violation of the provisions of article 1, § 15, of the Constitution. In re Oswald, 76 Cal. App. 347, 244 P. 940; In re Samaha (Cal. App.) 19 P.(2d) 839.

While article 1, § 15, of the Constitution does prohibit the imprisonment of one for debt in any civil action, it specifically excepts from that inhibition debts which are tainted with fraud. That section provides: "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action, on mesne or final process, unless in cases of fraud, nor in civil actions for torts, except in cases of wilful injury to person or property; and no person shall be imprisoned for a militia fine in time of peace."

[3] Assuming that the statute which regulates the payment of workmen's wages is constitutional, the complaint under which the defendants were convicted, in the absence of a demurrer thereto, appears to sufficiently state a public offense. Conceding that the first count fails to state a public offense, the second count of the complaint charges a violation of the statute with specific reference thereto, alleging that the defendants, on September 1, 1932, while acting as officers of the Calaveras Central Gold Mining Company, of which O. H. Lague was an employee, "did then and there discharge said employee from the service of said corporation and did then and there with intent to annoy, harass, oppress, hinder, delay and defraud the said employee, wilfully and unlawfully refuse to pay the said employee the wages then and there due to said employee, who then and there demanded payment of the said wages, the defendants then and there having the ability to pay the same, all in violation of the provisions of sections 1 to 6 of the said law."

[4] The justice's court certainly had jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants and of the misdemeanors in violation of section 6 of the act above quoted, consisting of willfully refusing to pay the wages of an employee by the officers of a corporation having the ability so to do, and the discharge and refusal to pay the wages of an employee with the willful intent to harass and defraud him. These acts are declared by the statute to constitute a misdemeanor. The justice's court has jurisdiction to try such misdemeanors. Even though the complaint may be defective, its allegations are sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the justice's court.

[5] Where a court has jurisdiction of the cause, the mere insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment may not be considered on a writ of certiorari. In 4 California Jurisprudence, 1036, § 14, it is said: "Where a court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of the action, such jurisdiction carries with it necessarily the authority * * * to decide the questions submitted to it, incorrectly as well as correctly. Accordingly, error in exercise of its jurisdiction, however gross, cannot be annulled on certiorari; and the writ cannot be used as a mere writ of error for the correction of mistakes, either of law or fact, committed by the inferior tribunal within the limits of its jurisdiction."

Since the justice's court had jurisdiction of the misdemeanors defined by the provisions of the statute regulating the payment of workmen's wages, and an appeal from the judgment of that court was prosecuted to the superior court as provided by law, the writ of certiorari does not lie.

[6] The justice who tried the criminal case was duly requested in writing by the incumbent of that court to try the cause as required by section 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the visiting justice had jurisdiction thereof. R. E. Walsh was the duly elected justice of Angels township. In a letter to Justice Shepherd of an adjoining township, dated September 28, 1932, Justice Walsh said: "In the case of People v. Sears and Warwick, * * * I hereby respectfully request that you attend my court at Angels and sit on the trial of this case for me in my place and stead. * * *" This letter was read into the record at the outset of the trial. Under date of September 29th, the duly certified docket shows the following entry: "A request [was made] by Justice of Peace R. E. Walsh, that J. M. Shepherd, Justice of Peace of Murphys Township, on account of illness, act for him and in his stead in the trial of this action at Angels Camp, California, on this date Sept. 29, 1932." By consent of counsel for the defendants the case was continued to October 21st, at which time it was tried by Justice Shepherd, sitting without a jury. It is contended the docket entry shows that Shepherd was requested to try the cause on September 29th only, and that he was without jurisdiction to try it on any other date. This construction of the record is without merit. The written request is adequate to confer jurisdiction on Shepherd to try the case at Angels township on September 29th, or at any subsequent date to which it was regularly continued. The docket entry is merely prima facie evidence of the authority to try the case. It is not conclusive regarding the authorized date of trial. The written request which was read into the record was general in its terms and limited the authority to try the case to no particular date. Section 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes a justice of the peace to sit and try cases for another justice of the peace in the same county, at his written request. It provides: "A justice of the peace of any township, or city, or city and county may hold the court of any other justice of the peace of any township, city and county, or city within the same county, at his written request, and while so acting shall be vested with all the powers of the justice for whom he so holds court. In which case the proper entry of the proceedings before the attending justice subscribed by him shall be made in the docket of the justice for whom he so holds the court; and the same shall be prima facie evidence of such proceedings, and form and become a part of the record of any, or any part of any and all actions, causes, or proceedings had before such attending justice while so holding the court."

[7] A visiting justice, having thus acquired jurisdiction by written request to try a cause in another township of his county, may continue the case and retain authority to try it at any subsequent date. Section 922 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in that regard: "In case of sickness or other disability or absence of a justice, another justice of the same county * * * who possesses the legal qualifications prescribed for the court of the absent justice, may, at his request, attend in his behalf, and thereupon is vested with the power and may perform all the duties and issue all the papers or process of the absent justice. In case of a trial the proper entry of the proceedings before the attending justice, subscribed by him, must be made in the docket of the justice before whom the summons was returnable. If the case is adjourned, the justice before whom the summons was returnable may resume jurisdiction."

The writ of certiorari which was heretofore issued in this case is dismissed.

LAMSON CO., Inc., v. JONES et al.

Civ. 7910.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Sept. 5, 1933.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨348.

Absence of allegation that building contractor's bond to city was in sum not less than half of amount payable under contract, as provided by statute, was immaterial, where complaint showed that bond was given under such statute (St. 1919, p. 487, as amended by St. 1927, p. 282).

2. Pleading ⇨34(4).

Presumption is that pleader stated case in manner most favorable to himself.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨348.

Action on building contractor's bond to city was barred, where work was completed on May 20, 1929, and complaint was not filed until January 9, 1931 (St. 1919, p. 488, § 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 540; p. 487, as amended by St. 1927, p. 282; Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

4. Municipal corporations ⇨347(2).

Where separate bond for benefit of laborers and materialmen was given to city by building contractor, materialmen could not recover on faithful performance bond given to city.

Action by The Lamson Company, Inc., against H. F. Jones and another. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Action by plaintiff against a contractor and his surety to recover balance of agreed price of materials furnished and installed by plaintiff in a public service building erected by defendant Jones, as general contractor, under a contract with the city of Glendale. The work was fully completed May 20, 1929, and complaint was filed January 9, 1931. A demurrer filed by defendant Central Surety & Insurance Corporation, on the ground that the action was barred by section 2 of the act of May 10, 1919, amended May 22, 1925 (St. 1919, p. 487, St. 1925, pp. 539, 540), was sustained by the court with leave to amend. A similar demurrer was also interposed by said defendant to the amended complaint filed by plaintiff, which demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and judgment thereafter entered dismissing the action as to the demurring defendant.

[1, 2] Plaintiff has appealed, and contends that its complaint states a cause of action on the faithful performance bond given to the city of Glendale under the contract, even if the labor and material bond is a statutory bond and the action on it barred by said section.

The amended complaint alleges the execution of two bonds. The first bonds said contractor and defendant surety company to the city of Glendale "and to all persons, companies and corporations entitled to file claims under the act approved May 10, 1919, and amendments thereof." The condition of the bond follows the language of the undertaking required to be filed under section 1 of such act (St. 1919, p. 487, as amended by St. 1927, p. 282), even to the provision of "a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court," in case suit is brought thereon, and is made by its terms to "inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies and corporations" entitled to file claims under the act. No question remains, after reading the act and the bond, as to the instrument being a bond given in compliance with the requirements of the act. It is true the complaint does not allege that the penalty of the bond is "in a sum not less than one-half of the total amount payable by the terms of the contract," but we may certainly assume that the pleader would so have alleged if anything appearing on the face of the undertaking was not in conformity with the act, and "it must be presumed that the pleader stated his case in the most favorable manner to himself." Smelser v. Deutsche etc., Kirche, 88 Cal. App. 469, 473, 263 P. 838, 839.

[3] Section 2 of the act referred to (as amended by St. 1925, p. 540) provides, in substance, that suit on the bond may be brought "at any time after the claimant has ceased to perform labor or furnish material or both and until the expiration of six months after the period in which verified claims may be filed as provided herein." The amended complaint shows on its face that the work was fully completed May 20, 1929. Section 2 also provides that claims may be filed under the act at any time prior to the expiration of the period within which claims of lien must be filed for record under section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or at the utmost ninety days from date of completion. Here the complaint was not filed until nearly eleven months after the six months' period had expired. The right of action on the labor and material bond was clearly barred.

[4] Appellant urges that it has a right of action on the faithful performance bond exacted of the contractor under the contract and which was also furnished by respondent. Such bond runs to the city of Glendale only, and there is no provision therein which runs to the benefit of labor and materialmen. It is well settled that, where a separate bond has been filed complying with the statute and inuring to the benefit of laborers and materialmen, no recovery can be had by a laborer or materialman upon the faithful performance bond executed in connection with the same contract which does not by its terms inure to his benefit. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Shafer, 57 Cal. App. 580, 208 P. 192; Summerbell v. Weller, 110 Cal. App. 406, 294 P. 414.

Judgment affirmed.

CRONE v. CITY OF EL CAJON et al.

Clv. 946.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 8, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 6,
1933.

1. Judgment $\Rightarrow$ 199(3).

Judgment notwithstanding verdict should be entered only when instructed verdict would have been proper and not where there is substantial, competent, and material evidence supporting cause of party for whom verdict is returned.

2. Judgment $\Rightarrow$ 199(3).

Judgment for defendant city, notwithstanding verdict for plaintiff in action for death of boy drowned in municipal swimming pool, held proper, in view of evidence showing decedent's contributory negligence (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

The evidence showed that decedent, who was 14 years old and could not swim, slipped to his death after working along edge of pool to deep water after being twice sent back to shallow end by his older brother.

3. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 734.

City exercised governmental function and acted in governmental capacity in operating swimming pool in its public park, though it charged admission fees, and hence was not liable for death of boy drowned therein, in absence of notice of dangerous condition (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

4. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 857.

Evidence in action against city for death of boy, drowned in municipal swimming pool, held not to show such long-continued neglect of dangerous condition, arising from discoloration of water, as to constitute notice thereof (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

5. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 854.

To recover from city for death of boy, drowned in municipal swimming pool, because of failure to maintain more than one life guard, such failure must have been proximate cause of death (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

6. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 847.

City is not insurer of safety of bathers in municipal swimming pool, but is only required to furnish pool not in dangerous or defective condition (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

7. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 854.

City's failure to have more than one life guard at municipal swimming pool held not proximate cause of drowning of boy, whose sinking was not seen by any of number of expert swimmers or many bathers in pool at time (St. 1923, p. 675, § 2).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Clarence Harden, Judge.

Action by J. V. Crone against the City of El Cajon and others. From a judgment for defendant city notwithstanding a verdict for plaintiff after abatement of the action as against the other defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. J. Barrett, of San Francisco, and Fred A. Steiner, of San Diego, for appellant.

Philip Storer Thacher, of El Cajon, and J. A. Isaacson and Lester J. Penry, both of San Diego, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, entered after the jury had returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for damages caused by the drowning of his fourteen year old son in a municipally owned swimming pool. Motions for nonsuit and an instructed verdict were regularly made by defendants.

The allegations of the pleadings before us show that the action as originally brought included the members of the city council of the city of El Cajon as defendants, and sought to recover judgment against them under the provisions of section 1 of an act of the Legislature approved June 13, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 675), which for want of a better name we will refer to as the Municipal Liability Act. No evidence was offered under this phase of the case, and the action against the members of the city council was abated. Recovery against the municipality was sought under the provisions of section 2 of this act.

The evidence disclosed that for several years prior to 1930 respondent had operated a swimming pool during the summer months for the pleasure of its citizens. Small fees for its use were charged, but their total did not pay the cost of its operation. During the summer of 1930 the pool had been in operation for a little more than four weeks prior to July 3d, the date of the drowning which gave rise to this action.

A permit was issued by the California state board of health, which provided that the pool might be operated "subject to the regulations of said Board and subject to the following provisions: (1) The water to be emptied when the bottom at the deep end is no longer clearly visible. * * *" The regulations of the board contained the following: "All water in the pool shall at times of use be bright and clear, so that the bottom of the pool may be plainly visible."

The water for the pool was supplied from the same pipes that furnished domestic water for the citizens of El Cajon. This water carried silt which collected on the bottom of the pool when it was not in use. Bathers would disturb this deposit, discoloring the water. It was the custom of the municipality to have the pool drained and cleaned each Monday. The discoloration of the water increased as the week progressed. According to one witness the water was so discolored on ten or twelve occasions in 1930, between the opening of the pool early in June and July 3d, that the bottom was not visible in the deeper portions. On July 3d, which fell on Thursday, the bottom was not visible beyond a depth of between 4 and 5 feet.

The city employed one lifeguard, who was also a caretaker and ticket seller. During the hours the pool was in use, when not engaged in selling tickets, he acted as lifeguard. He occasionally had volunteers helping him. During the later hours of each day less of his time was spent in selling tickets than during the earlier hours. The shallower parts of the pool were separated from the deeper by a rope for the protection of children and bathers who could not swim. Each foot of variation in the depth of the pool was marked with figures between 6 and 8 inches in height along its side. The pool was built of cement, and was 40 feet wide and 60 feet long. Its shallowest depth was 2 feet with the bottom descending for 51 feet 4 inches to an extreme depth of 9 feet.

At about 2:30 o'clock on the afternoon of July 3, 1930, two sons of appellant, Emmitt, aged 14 years and 33 days, and Truman, aged 18, went to the pool, each paying ten cents for admission. After donning their bathing suits they entered the water. Truman, who was a good swimmer, went to the deep end of the pool, spending his time diving from the springboard and swimming. Emmitt, who could not swim, entered the shallow water and spent some time playing with the smaller children. There were a number of persons in the pool, estimated as high as 40, some of whom were excellent swimmers and who spent their time diving and swimming in the deep water. Twice during the afternoon Truman saw Emmitt hanging on the side of the pool over the deep water and sent him back to the shallow end. Emmitt had worked along the edge holding on to the splash rail with his body hanging in the water. At about 4 o'clock a diver touched a body on the bottom of the deep part of the pool. It was brought to the surface and found to be Emmitt. No one knew the length of time it had been there or how it had gotten there. The evidence indicates that for some time before 4 o'clock the lifeguard had been on duty as such around the pool.

The pool was under the supervision of a committee consisting of a member of the city council and the marshal. There is no evidence that either of these officers, or any other officer of the city, had been to the pool since its opening early in June, or on July 3d, or had any notice, knowledge, or information of the muddy condition of the water on the ten or twelve occasions mentioned in the record, or at any other time, or of any other condition at the pool which might render its condition defective or dangerous, except that the members of the city council all knew that but one lifeguard was employed there.

[1] The rule is well established that a judgment notwithstanding the verdict should be entered only when an instructed verdict would have been proper, and not in a case where there is any substantial, competent and material evidence supporting the cause of the party in whose favor the verdict is returned. For this reason we have summarized the evidence most favorable to appellant, although but few conflicts appear.

Sixteen special issues were submitted to the jury and answers to thirteen were returned, in addition to a general verdict. The answers to the thirteen issues were such that it was unnecessary to answer the other three. These special findings were responsive to issues raised by either the pleadings or evidence and may be thus summarized: That the construction of the pool with a sloping bottom did not make it unsafe or dangerous to bathers and was not the cause of its being slippery; that the mud or silt on the bottom of the pool made it slippery and dangerous for bathers, but that Emmitt Crone did not slip on the floor because of this condition; that the water in the pool was not bright and clear, and this condition contributed to the death of Emmitt; that at the time Emmitt became submerged there was not a sufficient number of lifeguards to keep the pool safe for bathers and that this contributed to Emmitt's death; that the pool lacked certain life-saving equipment, but that this did not contribute to Emmitt's death; that Emmitt was not guilty of contributory negligence; and that the only dangerous or defective condition of the swimming pool of which respondent had any notice or knowledge was that there were insufficient attendants at the "pool adequate for lifeguard purposes to keep the pool and premises safe for bathers."

[2] We have studied the record carefully and under the evidence the only special finding upon which the jury could have reached a contrary finding was the one which found Emmitt free from contributory negligence. The evidence would support the inference, had it been made by the jury, that for a third time Emmitt worked along the edge of the pool to the deep water and slipped to his death. "It would not conform to the dictates of common reason to say that a child of the age of eight years, or even much younger, does not know and fully realize that a fall into a pond of water or a deep reservoir would result in injury to him, if not in his death." Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 37 Cal. App. 624, 174 P. 414, 418. See, also, Beeson v. City of Los Angeles, 115 Cal. App. 122, 300 P. 993.

[3] Appellant urges that because the city of El Cajon charged an admission fee to the swimming pool it ceased to act in a governmental capacity and operated it as a private function in a proprietary capacity and that it was liable for ordinary negligence without regard to the provisions of the Municipal Liability Act. The facts of the instant case square with those of Kellar v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 695, 178 P. 505, where a similar contention was decided adversely to the plaintiff. Under this authority we must hold that the city of El Cajon was exercising a governmental function and acting in a governmental capacity in operating the swimming pool in its public park.

[4] The elements which must exist in order to support a recovery under the provisions of section 2 of this act are stated in Pittam v. City of Riverside (Cal. App.) 16 P.(2d) 768, 769, as follows: "(1) The injuries to respondent [plaintiff] * * * must have resulted from a dangerous or defective condition of the dumping ground; (2) the city council of the city of Riverside, or some officer or person having authority to remedy such condition, must have had notice or knowledge thereof; (3) it, or he, must have failed or neglected to remedy such dangerous or defective condition within a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice; or (4) must have failed to take such action as might be reasonably necessary to protect the public against such dangerous or defective condition within a reasonable time after such knowledge or notice."

We have concluded, under the facts here presented, i. e., the muddled condition of the water on certain days when the pool was in operation, the cleaning and refilling each Monday with water fairly clear, but which grew darker as the week progressed, that there is no showing of a long-continued neglect of an existing condition that would constitute notice under the rule laid down in Boyce v. San Diego High School District, 215 Cal. 293, 10 P.(2d) 62, and other similar authorities.

[5] It is clear from the evidence that the failure to maintain more than one lifeguard at the swimming pool was the only possible lack of due care that might be relied upon by appellant, if this could be regarded a lack of due care, that was brought to the notice of the members of the council or some officer or agent of the city of El Cajon having the authority to remedy such a condition. This limits appellant's right of recovery to this one possible ground. We do not need to decide whether the failure to employ more than one lifeguard might have amounted to ordinary negligence in the operation of the swimming pool, which would create no liability; or whether a dangerous or defective condition of public property would be created by operating it in accordance with a general scheme put into effect by the municipal authorities and in such a manner that a dangerous and defective condition would be created and allowed to exist, under which circumstances there might be a liability. Pittam v. City of Riverside, supra.

The evidence must show some causal connection between the death of Emmitt and the fact that but one lifeguard was stationed at the pool. In order to permit a recovery the failure to have more than one lifeguard must have been the proximate cause of the death. In this we disregard any question of contributory negligence.

[6, 7] The lifeguard was probably around the pool at the time Emmitt disappeared beneath the water. Emmitt's own brother was swimming there. A number of youths, all expert swimmers, were in the pool and over the spot where the body was found. None of them, nor any of the many bathers in the pool, saw Emmitt sink or had any idea he was missing until about the time his body was found. The city of El Cajon was not required to insure the safety of the bathers in its pool, nor can a lifeguard guarantee that no bather will drown in the water he is patrolling. The city was only required to furnish a pool that was not in a dangerous or defective condition. Would two lifeguards have prevented the tragedy? If ten life-guards had been employed would any one of them have been more likely to have seen the boy sink into the water than the considerable number of bathers who were swimming and diving near the spot where he must have disappeared? Under the facts before us we cannot conclude that the failure to have more than one lifeguard was the proximate cause of Emmitt's drowning.

The case of Bertalot v. Kinnare, 72 Ill. App. 52, presents facts almost identical with those of the instant case except that there the swimming pool was privately owned. It was there said: "It is doubtless the law that the proprietor of such an institution would be liable for injury to a patron, if such injury resulted from lack of ordinary care in providing for his safety, and without fault of the patron; but it is as surely not the law that such proprietor is in any sense an insurer of the safety of his patrons, nor would the death of a patron within his premises cast upon the proprietor the burden of excusing himself from any presumption of negligence. Brotherton v. Manhattan B. I. Co., 48 Neb. 567 [67 N. W. 479, 33 L. R. A. 598, 58 Am. St. Rep. 709].

"It was incumbent upon defendant in error, as plaintiff in the trial court, to sustain his declaration with evidence, and to establish the averments of some one of its counts. The question here presented is simply whether the record shows evidence which would warrant the jury in finding that there was such lack of ordinary care as is alleged, and that it was the proximate cause of the death of the intestate.

"Defendant in error presented no evidence to show just how the lad came to his death, except that some ten or fifteen minutes after he was seen alive and in a place of safety, he was found unconscious, and, it may be, already dead, at the bottom of the swimming tank. * * * A verdict for plaintiff in error [the pool owner] would have been warranted had the jury given credit to the testimony of his witnesses. The verdict for defendant in error was bad, because unsupported by any evidence whatever as to how the intestate happened to meet the disaster which resulted in his death, and what negligence, if any there was, contributed thereto, or was the proximate cause thereof. The verdicts, general and special, could have been based upon nothing but guess-work. Whether the jury guessed that the accident was caused by a slippery floor (not averred but proved), lack of railing (not averred as to the south end), a crowded room, or by simply getting beyond depth in efforts to learn to swim, and negligent omission by attendants to effect a rescue, is immaterial. Certain it is that from the evidence it can not be found that any one of these things had aught to do with the accident, and it is certain, too, that the evidence warrants no conclusion of any negligence after the boy was found in the water; and if negligence was assumed after the discovery of the body, it could not be determined that such negligence had any bearing upon the lad's death in the absence of any evidence as to how long he had been beneath the water before discovery. Neither does it profit to inquire as to any negligence claimed to have been shown on the part of plaintiff in error or his attendants before the discovery of the body, for it can not be determined from this record whether such negligence, if any there was, caused the result of the boy's death.

"In Brotherton v. Manhattan B. I. Co., supra, the court say: 'How Brotherton got back into the deep water and what occurred there is not revealed by any evidence. It is not sufficient to establish a case for the plaintiff that negligence should be proved on the part of the defendant, but it must also appear that the negligence proved was the proximate cause of the injury.' This is a statement of a familiar proposition of law, but it bears particularly upon the case under consideration by reason of similarity of facts.

"Because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the declaration, the verdict should have been set aside and a new trial granted."

Judgment affirmed.

UNDERHILL v. ALAMEDA ELEMENTARY SCHOOL DIST. OF ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.
Civ. 8873.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 16, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1933.

1. Schools and school districts ⇨89.

Statute imposing liability upon school district for injuries to pupils held to cover injuries received by pupil while playing in school yard, provided injuries result from negligence of district, its officers, or employees (School Code, §§ 2.801, 3.41).

2. Schools and school districts ⇨89.

Ordinarily there is no liability for injuries sustained by pupils playing games in school yard (School Code, §§ 2.801, 3.41).

3. Schools and school districts ⇨89.

School districts are not insurers of safety of pupils at play or elsewhere (School Code, §§ 2.801, 3.41).

4. Schools and school districts ⇨120.

Complaint in action against school district for injuries to pupil must allege facts clearly showing violation of duty of care imposed upon school authorities (School Code, §§ 2.801, 3.41).

5. Pleading ⇨8(17).

Complaint for injuries to pupil received in baseball game played in school yard, alleging that plaintiff and other children were taking part in games "and/or" were playing in immediate vicinity, and that yard was small and that larger pupils were playing in game, held insufficient, since averring opinion only (School Code, §§ 2.801, 3.41).

6. Schools and school districts ⇨120.

Complaint held insufficient to state cause of action against school district for injuries to pupil received in baseball game played in school yard (School Code, §§ 2.801, 3.41).

Complaint alleged that district negligently failed to provide a safe playground for plaintiff, in that pupils were required to play in one small single inclosed yard without segregation or separation, and that district negligently sponsored the playing of baseball in said yard and negligently supervised the playing of such baseball game, and that plaintiff and other children of tender and delicate years were taking part in such game and/or were playing in the immediate vicinity of such game, and that larger pupils were participating in the game. Complaint failed to show that the school yard was inadequate in size for the purpose for which it was used, nor that there was anything about nature of the game played which would require that only children of uniform age and size be permitted to engage therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by James Raymond Underhill, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Julian P. Underhill, against the Alameda Elementary School District of Alameda County and others. From an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and from judgment entered in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

John H. Harvey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., of Oakland (Charles V. Barfield and Eldon B. Spofford, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

This action was brought by plaintiff, a pupil in an elementary school, seeking to recover damages from the defendant school district for injuries received in a baseball game played in the school yard. Defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and, from the judgment entered in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

[1] Plaintiff attempted to state a cause of action under section 2.801 of the School Code imposing liability "on account of injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees." This section was formerly section 1623 of the Political Code and its provisions have been frequently considered. Ahern v. Livermore Union High School District, 203 Cal. 770, 284 P. 1105; Damgaard v. Oakland High School District, 212 Cal. 316, 298 P. 983; Maede v. Oakland High School District, 212 Cal. 419, 298 P. 987; Henry v. Garden Grove Union High School District, 119 Cal. App. 638, 7 P.(2d) 192; Ellis v. Burns Valley School District (Cal. App.) 18 P.(2d) 79. There is but one of the authorities mentioned in which the injuries were incurred by the pupil while at play, and in that case a judgment in favor of the district was affirmed on appeal. Ellis v. Burns Valley School District, supra. There is no doubt, however, that the section is broad enough in its terms to cover injuries received by a pupil while playing in the school yard provided such injuries arise "because of the negligence of the district or its officers or employees."

The allegations of the complaint herein show that the injuries to plaintiff were directly caused by the swinging of a baseball bat by one of plaintiff's fellow pupils while participating in a baseball game in the school yard. Before discussing the allegations of the complaint by which plaintiff attempted to state a cause of action against the defendant district, we deem it appropriate to make certain observations.

[2-4] It has long been recognized that the physical development of the child must go hand in hand with his mental development. The importance of physical exercise is therefore stressed in our School Code, which expressly requires that "attention must be given to such physical exercises for the pupils as may be conducive to health and to vigor of body." School Code, § 3.41. It is a matter of common knowledge that the school authorities have quite generally provided play areas adjacent to the school buildings and have encouraged and sponsored the playing of such games as baseball, basketball, volleyball, handball, and the like, and have provided equipment therefor. Baseball, as commonly played in school yards, differs from baseball as played upon the baseball field, in that an appropriate type of softer ball is ordinarily used which renders negligible the chance of injury in the event that any one is struck thereby. All of the above-mentioned games contribute to the physical development of the pupils participating, and there is nothing inherently dangerous about any of them. They seldom result in injury to either the participants or spectators and are ordinarily played by school children of all ages without adult supervision. Nevertheless, it is also a matter of common knowledge that children participating in such games and in fact in any form of play may injure themselves and each other, and that no amount of precaution or supervision on the part of parents or others will avoid such injuries. The injuries which may result from the playing of said games are ordinarily of an inconsequential nature and are incurred without fault on the part of any one. In such cases there is no liability and, of course, the fundamental rules governing liability remain the same, even though the particular injury may prove to be of a more serious nature. The law does not make school districts insurers of the safety of the pupils at play or elsewhere, and no liability is imposed upon a district under the above-mentioned section, in the absence of negligence on the part of the district, its officers or employees. With the foregoing observations in mind, we believe that, whenever an attempt is made to recover damages from a school district for such injuries, the complaint in the action must set forth facts clearly showing a violation of a duty of care imposed upon the school authorities.

[5, 6] Plaintiff's complaint herein was in two counts. Defendants' demurrer was both general and special. We need not consider the special demurrer challenging the certainty of the complaint in numerous particulars, for we believe that under the circumstances the defects in the complaint made it subject to the general demurrer. Plaintiff's claims of negligence appear to have been based on the allegations that the district negligently failed to provide a safe playground for plaintiff, in that the pupils were required to play in "one small single enclosed yard" without "segregation or separation"; that the district negligently sponsored the playing of baseball in said yard and negligently supervised the playing of such baseball game. It alleged "that plaintiff and other children of tender and delicate years were taking part in such game and/or were playing in the immediate vicinity of such game," and that "larger pupils" were participating in the game. We believe these allegations are wholly insufficient. We pause to point out that it is impossible to tell whether plaintiff was a participant in the game or was playing in the immediate vicinity. This may not be of vital importance on the consideration of the general demurrer, but we deem it appropriate to call attention to the confusion brought about by the misuse of the term "and/or." See Putnam v. Industrial Commission (Utah) 14 P.(2d) 973. Plaintiff places great stress in the briefs upon the size of the school yard. It is merely alleged in the complaint that it was "small," and we presume that said allegation was intended to convey the impression that the yard was inadequate in size for the playing of the game in question. The word "small" is a relative term which is meaningless from a legal standpoint when applied to a school yard. It is of no greater value to the pleader here than were the allegations in Hauser v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (Cal. App.) 23 P.(2d) 1068, 1070, that certain wires were "in dangerous proximity" to and at "an insufficient height" above ground. It was there said: "Such words are meaningless as allegations of fact, and are averments of opinion of the pleader only." Plaintiff also stresses the fact that "larger" pupils were playing in the game, but the word "larger" is but of little significance when it does not appear how much larger or older than plaintiff these pupils were. Few games are ever played where all the participants are of absolutely uniform size and age, and an allegation that certain participants were "larger" pupils can have no tendency to show negligence on the part of those sponsoring the game. Plaintiff's complaint fails to show that the school yard was inadequate in size for the purpose for which it was used, and fails to show that there was anything about the nature of the game played which would require that only children of uniform age and size be permitted to engage therein or remain in the vicinity thereof. Plaintiff proceeds upon the theory that the district was under a duty to segregate the pupils in some manner, to refrain from sponsoring the game, and, if the game was permitted, to supervise the play. We know of no express provision of law placing any such duties upon the district, and plaintiff has failed to set forth facts which would give rise to such duties. In the absence of appropriate allegations for that purpose, a cause of action is not stated by merely alleging generally that the district negligently failed to segregate the pupils, negligently sponsored a baseball game, and negligently supervised the same.

From all that appears in the record, we are inclined to believe that plaintiff's unfortunate injury was one of those occasional accidental injuries of a serious nature which befall certain children while at play without fault on the part of any one. At any rate we are of the opinion that the allegations of plaintiff's complaint were insufficient, and that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Each of the defendants was convicted by a jury on two counts of "contributing to delinquency," and appeal from the judgment of conviction and from the order of the trial court denying their motions for a new trial. It is urged in appellants' brief that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdicts, also that appellants' rights were prejudiced by certain rulings, claimed to be erroneous, made by the trial court on questions involving the admission of testimony. No authority is cited in support of this claim of error as to a single ruling; counsel being content merely to quote from the transcript of testimony many short passages showing the question, objection, and ruling. In this situation the remarks of the court in Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, at page 386, 108 P. 278, 280, are apropos: "Certain errors in admitting or excluding evidence are specified. The objections, rulings, and exceptions are merely stated in appellant's brief, without any citation of authority or any argument beyond the bald declaration that 'in deciding these objections against the defendant the court erred.' We do not feel called upon to consider points so presented"—citing cases.

[1] The case last mentioned is a civil action, but the courts passing upon criminal appeals have taken the same view as to the practice of submitting quotations from the transcript without argument or authority pertaining thereto. People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 374, 201 P. 955; People v. Schlosser, 99 Cal. App. 593, 278 P. 898. See, also, 8 Cal. Jur. 546. We may say, however, that in reading the testimony of this case to determine what weight should be given to the claim of appellants that the verdicts were not supported by the evidence we were impressed with the prompt, fair, and correct rulings made by the learned trial judge who heard the case and can appreciate the difficulty counsel must have experienced in any effort that may have been made to find authority to sustain appellants' claim in regard to these rulings. We find no instance relating to any material testimony where in our opinion the trial court ruled erroneously.

[2] Passing adversely upon the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, we have this to say: The defendants were occupying a two-story dwelling in a beach town frequented by sailors; two girls, respectively fourteen and fifteen years of age, testified that, while dressed in skirt and "middy," clothing such as is commonly worn by schoolgirls, and accompanied by two sailors, they were admitted to defendants' house about 5:30 p. m. of January 25, 1933, and served with drinks by the two defendants in an upstairs bedroom occupied by one of the sailors and one of the girls, another room on the same floor being assigned to the other sailor and girl; that they stayed all night with the sailors, and next day bought some new shoes with money which the sailors gave them, returning to one of the bedrooms and placing their old shoes and the hat of one of the girls in a dresser drawer, where they were found by a police officer a day or two later, at about the time the girls were picked up by juvenile authorities. One pair of shoes and the hat were identified as hers by one of the girls and introduced in evidence; the other girl testified that she had tossed into a wastebasket her old shoes when she saw them at the police station, where, according to the officer he had brought them.

The two sailors whom the girls identified as their companions on the night in question testified that they had no acquaintance with them, that they had never taken them to the house occupied by the defendants, and that they did not know the defendants. The defendants testified that they did not know the sailors, and that the girls had never stayed overnight at their house, their story being that on the afternoon of January 26th, the day immediately following the date of the alleged offense, the two girls called at defendants' house looking for work, and, on failing to secure it, prevailed upon defendant Koenig to take charge of a package temporarily; he saying, as he did so, that he would put it in the lower drawer of a dresser upstairs. This package the girls never returned for; but it was in a lower dresser drawer that the police officer found, unwrapped, the two pairs of old shoes and the hat, some wrapping paper and twine, and a sales slip.

It was the duty of the jury to determine in this case who was telling the truth; their verdicts show that they believed the girls. We see no reason why, on this record, and considering the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225, as amended), we should disturb these verdicts.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

Action by C. J. Towey against Henry Esser and others, in which plaintiff caused attachment of money in the hands of W. H. Goodno, doing business under the name of Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company, and the Santa Margarita Land & Cattle Company filed a complaint in intervention against plaintiff, defendant Esser, and another. From a judgment awarding the money to plaintiff, intervener appeals.

Reversed, with direction.

Hugh Ward Lutz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. Brandon Bernstein, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Respondent, C. J. Towey, as assignee of Southwest Commission Company, brought this action against Henry Esser and two fictitious parties, to recover the sum of $6,573 claimed to be due for money had and received, money loaned to and expended on behalf of defendants, and on an account stated; and pursuant thereto caused to be attached in the hands of W. H. Goodno, doing business under the name of Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company, the sum of $4,061.66; whereupon appellant Santa Margarita Land & Cattle Company, claiming title to the money so attached, and by leave of court first had and obtained, filed a complaint in intervention to recover said money. Esser defaulted in the original action, and the cause went to trial on the issues raised by the allegations of the complaint in intervention and the answer thereto filed by Towey. It was heard and determined by the court, a trial by jury having been expressly waived, and judgment was entered awarding the money to Towey, from which the land and cattle company has appealed.

The controversy grows out of the following undisputed facts: The Santa Margarita Land & Cattle Company owns a large ranch near Santa Margarita, in San Luis Obispo county, and is engaged in the business of raising and selling cattle. On or about June 17, 1931, Esser, a cattle buyer, called at the ranch to purchase upwards of a hundred head. Having bought cattle from said company three times before within the preceding two years, he was known to the ranch superintendent, named Miller, who transacted the business with Esser on this particular occasion. Miller was authorized by his employer to sell only for cash, and he so informed Esser, the understanding with the latter being that the cattle should be weighed on the ranch scales and the cash paid or a check therefor delivered to the seller when the cattle were weighed out. Accordingly the cattle were rounded up and weighed, and Miller delivered to Esser a "brand certificate" which it was necessary, under the law, for Esser to present to the railroad company before it would accept the cattle for shipment. The cattle were then driven by the seller's men to the loading corrals of the Southern Pacific Company at Santa Margarita, and on Saturday, June 20, 1931, were loaded into three cars and billed by Esser to Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company, Union Stock Yards, Los Angeles, "for the account of John Schwab." Immediately after the cattle were loaded the amount of the purchase price was computed by Miller, and Esser delivered to Miller a draft for $4,475.91, drawn on the consignee, Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company, Union Stock Yards, Los Angeles, and signed "John Schwab by H. Esser." Esser then wrote out a bill of sale, in simple form, which Miller signed and handed back to Esser. Shortly after receiving the draft Miller forwarded the same, together with a report of the sale, to the San Francisco office of his employer, and on June 22, 1931, the draft was deposited in a San Francisco bank for collection. It arrived at the correspondent bank in Los Angeles on June 23, 1931, and at 2:10 p. m. of the same day was presented for payment to the Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company. However, in the meantime the cattle arrived, and about noon of that same day were resold by the Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company and the proceeds of the sale attached by the respondent Towey, who as assignee of the Southwest Commission Company had filed his action at 10:37 that same morning. Consequently payment of the draft by the Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company was refused.

Immediately following the levy of the attachment, Esser left the state, going to Colorado; and he never returned. Schwab was a cattle buyer residing in San Jose, but, according to the intervener's evidence, he denied having any knowledge whatever of the transaction involving the purchase of said cattle by Esser or the giving of said draft in payment thereof. Summons in the original action brought by Towey against Esser was served on the latter personally in Denver, Colo., and, as stated, he defaulted. Upon being served with the complaint in intervention, the Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company deposited in court the net proceeds of the sale of the cattle, amounting to $4,061.66.

[1-3] The trial court's judgment awarding said proceeds to Towey is based on findings, which in effect are legal conclusions drawn from the foregoing facts, that title to the cattle passed unconditionally and absolutely to Esser upon the simultaneous delivery of the cattle and the draft in Santa Margarita on June 20, 1931, despite the admitted fact that it was a sale for cash, and that the draft given in lieu of cash proved to be utterly worthless. In so holding, the decision of the trial court, in our opinion, is, as appellant contends, in direct conflict with and contrary to the law declared in the case of South San Francisco Packing & Provision Co. v. Jacobsen, 183 Cal. 131, 190 P. 628, which involved facts almost identical with those of the present case. There a stock buyer named Jacobsen purchased several carloads of hogs from stockraisers named Taylor and Rosecrans, at their ranch in Idaho, the agreement being that the sale was to be for cash, that the hogs were to be delivered at a certain place in Idaho where Jacobsen or his agent were to receive them, and make payment therefor by check. The hogs were delivered and received accordingly, and the check delivered about midnight on Thursday, June 10, 1915. The check was deposited for collection the following day, and on Monday, June 14th, in due course, it reached the bank in Idaho Falls on which it was drawn, and payment was refused for lack of funds. It appears that on the day the check was drawn Jacobsen had money deposited in the bank, but not sufficient to cover the check, and that on the following day he increased his balance to a sum more than enough to pay the check, but by Monday he had reduced the balance far below the amount called for by the check, and consequently payment was refused. Shortly after purchasing the hogs Jacobsen disappeared, but in the meantime he had shipped the hogs to the South San Francisco Packing & Provision Company and it had resold them; and as soon as Taylor and Rosecrans discovered that the check was worthless they demanded from the South San Francisco Packing & Provision Company, under a claim of ownership, the proceeds of the sale of the hogs. However, as here, shortly before such demand was made, a creditor, the Western Meat Company, filed an action against the buyer, Jacobsen, and attached the fund in the hands of the packing company; thereupon the packing company instituted a suit in interpleader and paid the fund into court. There, as here, also, the trial court held that, despite the fact that the check was worthless, title to the hogs passed at the time of the delivery of the check therefor, and that consequently the attaching creditor, the Western Meat Company, was entitled to the proceeds from the sale of the hogs. On appeal it was held to the contrary, and the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the sellers, Taylor and Rosecrans, were entitled to the proceeds. The decision was based upon the legal proposition, as it is stated in substance in the syllabus, that, "where personal property is sold to be paid for upon delivery by check, the sale is to be treated as one for cash, and if the check is dishonored, the title to the property, as between the parties to the sale, remains in the seller, who may retake the property, or if the property has been resold, claim the proceeds in the hands of the second purchaser as against an attaching creditor of the original buyer." Among the numerous authorities cited by the court in support of its decision are Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) 755; 23 R. C. L. 1448; 35 Cyc., pp. 308, 322 and 327. True, as pointed out by the court therein, where the seller expressly agrees to accept a check or bill or note, as absolute payment, title to the goods will pass upon the delivery of the goods and the acceptance of such check or bill or note, regardless of whether the paper is honored on due presentation thereof; but, as the court goes on to say, where goods are sold for cash on delivery, and payment is made by check, such check is, in fact, payment only when the cash is received on it; and there is no presumption that the seller takes the check as absolute payment merely from the fact that he accepts it from the buyer, the presumption being, says the court, just to the contrary, citing National Bank of Commerce v. Chicago, etc., Co., 44 Minn. 224, 46 N. W. 342, 560, 9 L. R. A. 263, 20 Am. St. Rep. 566; Hodgson v. Barrett, 33 Ohio St. 63, 31 Am. Rep. 527; Johnson-Brinkham Co. v. Central Bank, 116 Mo. 558, 22 S. W. 813, 38 Am. St. Rep. 615. In applying the foregoing rules to that particular case, the court said: "In effect, this sale was for cash as distinguished from a sale on credit, payment to be made, as is customary in similar commercial transactions, by check, and as it was not agreed that the check was to be received as absolute payment, and the delivery of the goods also was conditional, and the check, upon due presentation, was dishonored, title to the hogs remained in the seller." And in conclusion the court said: "The title to the hogs, therefore, as between the parties to the sale having remained in the original sellers, it follows, we have no doubt, that the fund in the hands of the plaintiff, the purchaser from Jacobsen, constituting part of the purchase price, belongs to the original sellers, Taylor & Rosecrans; and we also entertain no doubt that so far as the attaching creditor is concerned it has no better right to the fund than Jacobsen himself. (Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 491, 508, 24 P. 930.)" Two later cases citing the Jacobsen Case with approval are Clark v. Hamilton Diamond Co., 209 Cal. 1, 284 P. 915, and Galeppi v. C. Swanston & Son, 107 Cal. App. 30, 290 P. 116.

[4] And so, in the present case, the undisputed evidence shows that the sale of the cattle to Esser was to be a sale for cash as distinguished from a sale on credit, and that there was no understanding or agreement whatever that the draft given by Esser was to be accepted as absolute payment. On the contrary, the evidence shows it was taken merely in accordance with the custom followed in similar commercial transactions. Therefore, under the authorities above cited, as between the parties to the sale, title to the cattle remained in the seller dependent upon the payment of the draft; and since the draft was dishonored the seller was entitled, as in the Jacobsen Case, to the proceeds from the sale of the cattle as against the attaching creditor, who had no better right thereto than Esser himself would have had.

Moreover, in the Jacobsen Case, supra, it was strongly indicated that, if the check were given for the purpose and with the intention of perpetrating a fraud, the sale would have been void both as to Jacobsen and his attaching creditor. The court went on to point out, however, that, after the issuance of the check and before its presentation for payment three days later, Jacobsen on two occasions had more than sufficient money on deposit to meet its payment, which, the court stated, coupled with the presumption of innocence and fair dealing, furnished some foundation for the finding of the trial court against fraud. But in the present case the evidence shows without conflict that Esser clearly intended to and did in fact perpetrate an absolute fraud. He falsely represented that Schwab was the real purchaser of the cattle, he gave a spurious draft in payment thereof, purporting to be the draft of Schwab, and he shipped the cattle under Schwab's name to the Los Angeles commission house for the account of John Schwab; whereas, as stated, Schwab knew nothing whatever about the transaction. It is evident, therefore, that the seller here established a much stronger case in its favor than did the sellers in the Jacobsen Case.

Respondent seeks to avoid the controlling effect of the decision in the Jacobsen Case on two grounds: First, he asserts that it is based on facts different from those of the present case; but he has wholly failed to point out any material difference, and after a careful examination we have been unable to find any. Secondly, he intimates that the rule of that case was changed by the adoption in this state in 1931 of the so-called Uniform Sales Act (St. 1931, p. 2235 [Civ. Code, §§ 1721-1800]). The answer to this is that the transaction here involved was closed before the end of June, 1931; whereas the Uniform Sales Act did not become operative until August 14, 1931, and it is expressly declared therein (Civ. Code, § 1797) that none of its provisions shall apply to any sale or to any contract to sell, made prior to the taking effect of said act.

For the reasons hereinabove assigned, the judgment is reversed; and exercising the authority granted by section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure this court finds from the undisputed evidence and contrary to the findings of the trial court that title to said cattle at all times remained in the Santa Margarita Land & Cattle Company, the seller thereof. The findings being thus modified, the trial court is directed to enter judgment accordingly in favor of the intervener, the Santa Margarita Land & Cattle Company, for the amount of the net proceeds derived from the sale of said cattle by the Pacific Live Stock & Commission Company.

Application by Louis R. Gomez for writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court for Los Angeles County, Hon. Hartley Shaw, Presiding Judge thereof.

Application denied.

Proctor K. Perkins and Marion P. Betty, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Fred M. Cross, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, Justice.

It appears that petitioner, who represents himself as "an indigent person," is the plaintiff in an action pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, and that heretofore his application to said court to the effect that he be permitted "to further prosecute" his said action in forma pauperis was denied for the sole reason (which is conceded to be the fact) that the attorney who represents the plaintiff in said action "has a contingent interest therein." Petitioner now seeks from this court a mandate by which the said superior court and a designated judge thereof shall be required "to make an order permitting the petitioner to prosecute his action without the prepayment of the jury and reporter's fees."

[1] In effect, repeatedly it has been declared by the courts of this state that in its simplicity, not only the policy of the courts, but as well the unwritten law, is that "without money and without price" indigent persons shall be afforded the use of the trial courts in the maintenance and for the protection of their civil rights. The obstacle in the way of the full and unabridged recognition by such courts, as well as the permissive mutual execution of such privilege by the respective interested parties, arises when the situation presents conditions which in some manner indicate the constructive absence in the litigant of the essential quality of destitution, or at least of such property as, from a practical standpoint, precludes the expenditure by him of the funds represented by the legal fees and costs in the premises. It is apparent that, where the right sought to be enforced, or to be protected, is one in which some person who is presumably financially responsible is either equally or partially interested with the litigant, as by a joint, a common, or a community interest in the subject-matter of the existing or proposed litigation, the rule should not be given application. Ordinarily, the difficulty lies primarily in an endeavor to determine the existence of the legal ownership by some outside party of some pecuniary interest either in the cause of action itself or in the anticipated results or fruits thereof. It is manifest that, as a result of a valid agreement entered into between an indigent person who was the possessor of a cause of action and some financially responsible person prior to the institution of legal proceedings, whereby a contingent interest in the cause of action was transferred from the former to the latter, and on the termination of the action an equal, or any substantial, division between such interested persons of any moneys realized from the judgment occurred, a situation would be presented which should disclose such an interest in the subject-matter of the litigation by the outside party as should have forbidden the exercise of the privilege ordinarily extended to destitute persons by which they may be or are excused from the payment of fees incident to the litigation.

Concretely, and by way of illustration, if perchance, in consideration of the advancement by some individual to an indigent person of moneys to cover living expenses of the latter pending a determination of his action against some third person, it should be agreed between the interested persons that an equal division of the proceeds of the action should take place between them, it should be clear that the destitute person should not be accorded the privilege of maintaining his action at the expense of the public. It should also be apparent, when established as a fact that the contribution by the "outsider" was either in aid of, or was incident to, the contemplated or existing legal proceedings instituted or defended by the indigent person, neither the particular means or method employed, nor the manner by which the indigent person was financially assisted, should be considered either as determinative of, or even as material to, the question of whether the "outsider" was interested in the anticipated recovery in the litigation. In other words, whether the contribution was made by a payment of cash to the destitute person, or whether such contribution consisted of goods, wares, merchandise, or services performed, or to be performed, would be wholly immaterial. Concededly, a contract might be entered into between a poverty-stricken person, who was possessed of a good cause of action against some other individual, or a corporation, and some avaricious and unconscionable person, by which, and in consideration of the passing from the first mentioned to the last of something of comparatively trifling value by which the pressing necessities of the first-mentioned person might be immediately alleviated, the last-mentioned individual would become entitled to the whole and every part of any money, however great in amount, which might be recovered in an action proposed to be instituted on said cause of action; or, even in the absence of immediate consideration therefor, a sense of delayed justice, as it affected his asserted cause of action, might be the controlling inducement to an indigent person to agree with an attorney in effect that, if he would prosecute the action, for his services in that regard the attorney might be entitled to whatever he might recover therein. In such circumstances it would seem unlikely that any one would seriously contend that, because the action was to be maintained or carried on in the name of the indigent person, the prepayment or payment of fees, court costs, etc., should be waived by the state. No difference in principle is apparent between such a situation and one in which a large, or even a small, percentage of the anticipated recovery is owned by some "outsider," or by an attorney, acquired by him in payment of services either performed, or to be performed, by him in the conduct of the case.

[2, 3] Reverting to the instant facts in that regard, it appears that the attorney who at all times here in question has represented the petitioner "was employed in said action under a contingent contract for his fees"; that is to say, as was expressed in the written understanding of the parties thereto, the "compensation will be one-third of such amount as you (the indigent person) receive either by suit, compromise or settlement."

* * *

Ordinarily, the determination of the question of the interest of the "outsider," or his right to participate in any recovery which may result from proposed or pending litigation, necessarily depends upon the legality and the binding force of the contract between the parties. In some jurisdictions it has been held, and still may be the law therein, that such a contract, being a variety of maintenance or champerty, is illegal and at least voidable; but in this state, as early as 1863, in the case of Mathewson v. Fitch, 22 Cal. 86, 95, it was held that "the offense of maintenance is unknown to the laws of this State." In that case, in effect, it was also held that a contract between an attorney and his client for a contingent fee was valid and enforceable; and in the later cases of Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 18 P. 866, 27 P. 1082, and Bergen v. Frisbie, 125 Cal. 168, 57 P. 784, the latter principle was affirmed. In addition thereto, in the first two of the last-cited cases, it is held that such a contract transfers to the attorney an equitable interest in any judgment which may be recovered. See, also, Howell v. Budd, 91 Cal. 342, 27 P. 747; Tracy v. Ringole, 87 Cal. App. 549, 262 P. 73; Kelly v. Smith, 204 Cal. 496, 268 P. 1057; Cassetta v. Del Frate, 116 Cal. App. 255, 2 P. (2d) 533.

As far as the industry of respective counsel has disclosed, no ruling has ever been announced by any appellate tribunal of this state where the sole question submitted to it has been identical with that here at issue. However, in each of two cases the element of "contingent fees" as it affected the privilege of an indigent person to prosecute a cause of action without the prepayment of the statutory filing fees, etc., included with other alleged obstacles thereto, has been the subject of consideration; and in each of such cases, although no direct intimation was given by the court respecting the single element of "contingent fees," the indications were that, where it appeared that a contingent fee had been agreed upon between the indigent person and his attorney, the ordinary rule by which the prepayment of filing fees, etc., would be waived had no proper application.

In the course of the opinion in the case of Martin v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 289, 297, 168 P. 135, 138, L. R. A. 1913B, 313, it is said: "Our next consideration is the narrow one of objections urged by respondents to the sufficiency of the petitioner's moving papers addressed to the superior court. Certain of these appear in the verified return of the judge of that court. The plaintiff's verified petition before the superior court declared that no person other than himself had any interest in the successful prosecution of the action. The judge's return declares that he had information and belief to the effect that the attorneys for the plaintiff had a contingent interest, being a contingent fee, in the successful outcome of the litigation, and that for this added reason the plaintiff's application was refused. But if it be conceded that issue was here joined upon the direct averment of plaintiff's petition, something more is required as to the nature, source, origin, and soundness of the court's belief, before its order can be upheld on this ground. This showing is not made. Yet in view of the fact that the attorneys for the plaintiff were before the superior court, it could most easily have been made."

In the case of Jenkins v. Superior Court, 98 Cal. App. 729, 277 P. 757, the petitioner applied for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent judge to grant leave to the petitioner to proceed in forma pauperis in a certain action then pending in the court in which the said judge presided. From the petition it appeared that the petitioner was an administrator of an estate, and that the only asset of said estate was a cause of action for the death of the person whose estate was being administered. After the complaint was filed for such alleged wrongful death, the petitioner made application to the lower court for leave thereafter to proceed in such action in forma pauperis, setting forth in the petition that the deceased left no estate, and that petitioner had no funds except such as she received from her employment, from which she derived the sum of $100 per month. It further appeared from the petition that the next of kin of the deceased was the petitioner and her brother. No showing was made that the brother was not in a position to advance costs. "It also appeared that the petitioner had employed attorneys to represent her in the action upon a contingent basis." The application for the writ of mandate was denied.

In other jurisdictions where the question has arisen, the decision thereon generally has depended upon a determination of the foundational issue of whether a contract for a contingent fee was champertous; and where in that respect a conclusion has been reached in the affirmative, the necessary result has been that such a contract, being void and unenforceable, could not affect the primary right of the indigent person to prosecute his action in forma pauperis. Stevens v. Sheriff, 76 Kan. 124, 90 P. 799, 11 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 1153; United States ex rel. Payne v. Call (C. C. A.) 287 F. 520. But, as hereinbefore has been indicated, the rule in this state is that a contract by an attorney with his client to the effect that the fee to be paid for the services of the attorney shall be contingent is not champertous; hence, as far as a decision by the courts of this state is concerned, the authorities which rely upon the illegality of such a contract as a basis for the conclusion that the right of the indigent person is unaffected by such a contract are inapplicable.

By the weight of authority, both federal and the state of New York, as well as some of English origin, the practice of permitting an indigent person to sue without the prepayment of filing fees, etc., is held improper, where it appears that, in the action in which the indigent person seeks to invoke such rule, either an attorney or some other assumedly financially responsible person has a contingent interest in the result of the action. Boyle v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (C. C.) 63 F. 539; Feil v. Wabash R. R. Co. (C. C.) 119 F. 490; Phillips v. Louisville & N. R. R. Co. (C. C.) 153 F. 795; United States v. Ross (C. C. A.) 298 F. 64, 33 A. L. R. 728; Chetkovich v. United States (C. C. A.) 47 F.(2d) 894; Cahill v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 38 App. Div. 314, 57 N. Y. S. 10; Harris v. Mutual Life I. Co., 20 N. Y. Civ. Proc. R. 192; Downs v. Farley, 12 N. Y. Civ. Proc. R. 119; In re Roberts, 33 Chanc. Div. 265; Lindsay v. Tyrrell, 44 Eng. Repts., Full Reprint, 889.

It follows that the application to this court for a writ of mandate in the premises should be, and it is, denied.

Where no appearance was made for appellant at time set for oral argument other than request for additional time to file brief, and no brief was filed though time granted for that purpose had expired, conviction was affirmed (Pen. Code, § 1253).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Lile T. Jacks, Judge.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Seibert L. Sefton, of San Francisco, for the People.

PER CURIAM.

The defendants and appellants were convicted in the superior court in the city and county of San Francisco of a felony, to wit, robbery, and the jury fixed the crime in each instance as of the first degree.

Judgment on each verdict was duly entered March 14, 1933, and the appellants filed a joint transcript on appeal in this court on March 27, 1933. The cause was regularly placed upon the calendar for oral argument on June 12, 1933. No appearance was made for appellants at the time the cause was called for hearing other than a request for additional time to file a brief. No brief has been filed in their behalf, and the time granted for that purpose has long since expired.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code, the judgments and the orders denying new trials in each cause are affirmed.

4. Criminal law §730(11).

District attorney's statements in closing argument, implying that defense might know why complaining witness was absent, held not prejudicial to defendants, where court immediately instructed jury not to regard arguments as evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James G. Conlan, Judge.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The two defendants were tried jointly before a jury on an information charging robbery. The verdict was guilty of robbery in the second degree. From the judgment following the verdict and from the order denying their motion for a new trial both defendants have appealed upon a single typewritten record.

[1, 2] The appellants raise two points—the discretion of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to read to the jury testimony of the complaining witness given upon the preliminary hearing, and misconduct of the district attorney in his argument to the jury.

The testimony was read under permission of section 686 of the Penal Code after the prosecution had satisfied the trial court that the complaining witness could not be found within the state. Evidence was received showing that a subpoena had been issued and that a police officer had made diligent search for him at his place of business and at his place of residence; that the officer had made inquiries and learned that the witness had sold his business and given up his residence; that further search and inquiry failed to produce any information as to where he could be found. Upon this evidence the trial court found that due diligence had been exercised. The appellants merely state that the subpoena should have been issued some days earlier. The whole question of diligence is one for the trial court and its finding thereon cannot be disturbed when, as here, there is substantial evidence to support it. People v. Fay, 82 Cal. App. 62, 70, 255 P. 239; People v. Udell, 113 Cal. App. 356, 357, 298 P. 56.

[3] The alleged misconduct is based on the statement of the district attorney in his closing argument in which he denied responsibility.

1. Criminal law §543(2).

Evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding that due diligence was exercised to find complaining witness before district attorney read his testimony on preliminary hearing (Pen. Code, § 686).

2. Criminal law §543(2), 1158(4).

Question of diligence to find absent witness before reading his testimony on preliminary hearing is for trial court, whose finding, supported by substantial evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal (Pen. Code, § 686).

3. Criminal law §1119(4).

Suggestion of error, not showing what provoked district attorney's alleged improper statement in closing argument that defense might know why complaining witness was absent, cannot be considered (Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 2, § 7).

ity for the disappearance of the complaining witness and implied that the defense might know why he was not present. This statement was manifestly made in response to some remark of the defense, but the record does not show what provoked the statement complained of. The suggestion of error does not comply with section 7 of rule II of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal and for that reason cannot be considered. People v. Bragdon, 103 Cal. App. 26, 27, 283 P. 881.

[4] Furthermore, the trial court immediately instructed the jury not to regard these arguments as evidence and we cannot find that appellants were prejudiced by the occurrence.

ron, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

[1, 2] The defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and has appealed from the judgment upon the sole ground that section 473 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional. It is argued that a corporation is a person within the meaning of section 470 of the Penal Code; that no punishment is provided for a corporation by section 473; that this constitutes an arbitrary discrimination between individuals and corporations; and that section 473 is therefore void, and the judgment must be reversed.

It is well settled that a reasonable classification is permitted if the same be based upon a natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction. As was pointed out in People v. Schomig, 74 Cal. App. 109, 239 P. 413, 414: "The Constitution does not deprive the Legislature of power to pass all special acts; but forbids special laws in all cases where a general and uniform law can be made applicable (Argyle Dredging Co. v. Chambers, 40 Cal. App. 332, 181 P. 84), and in order to declare a law unconstitutional, as being discriminatory, it must appear that it is not founded upon a natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, but that it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right, upon a class arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law."

In Martin v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 93, 227 P. 762, 765, the court said: "It is conceded, as indeed it must be, that, where a classification of persons or things is distinctive and such distinction is based upon some 'constitutional, or natural, or intrinsic distinction,' laws may be made applicable to such class alone, providing the act is uniform as to all persons or things within such class."

Without discussing the question as to whether a corporation could commit this particular crime, it is apparent that a general and uniform law, in the sense contended for by the appellant, cannot be made applicable in fixing the punishment for crimes of such a nature that any penalty short of imprisonment is entirely inadequate. If no distinction could be made between a corporation and an individual, it would logically follow that there could be no punishment by confinement, since a corporation cannot be imprisoned. For this reason, if for no other, a corporation cannot stand in precisely the same relation as an individual to the subject of the law here in question, and this fact alone constitutes a natural, intrinsic, and constitutional basis for the distinction here complained of.

In People v. Schomig, supra, it was held that a statute fixing a penalty for the violation of another act by a corporation, other than that provided for an individual committing the same offense, was not violative of the Constitution as discriminatory. The principle is the same whether applied to a difference in the punishment provided or to the entire omission of any punishment for a corporation.

No arbitrary discrimination appears in the provisions of the Code section complained of, and the theory advanced by the appellant is without merit.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff sued defendant for injuries due to the latter's alleged negligence in operating his automobile. Defendant denied that he was negligent and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant, upon which judgment was entered, and plaintiff has appealed.

The sole error urged by appellant relates to an alleged prejudicial instruction given by the court.

The accident happened on December 4, 1928, between 5:30 and 6 o'clock p. m., at the intersection of Jefferson street and Gramercy place, in Los Angeles. Jefferson street runs east and west, and defendant was proceeding west on said thoroughfare. Plaintiff was crossing Jefferson street from north to south in the pedestrian zone marked by white lines, as required by city ordinance. It was stipulated that a traffic ordinance of the city was in effect at the time making it unlawful for the operator of any vehicle to drive into any crosswalk outside of the central traffic district while a pedestrian was engaged in crossing the half of the roadway therein over which such vehicle is traveling. The location in question was outside the central traffic district.

Among other instructions, not shown by the record, the court gave the following, of which appellant complains: "I instruct you that it is a duty resting upon any person attempting to cross a street that is likely to be dangerous, before placing himself or herself in a position of danger, to look in the direction from which such danger is to be anticipated. This is a continuing duty, and is not met by looking once and then looking away. In the exercise of ordinary care it is the duty of the pedestrian to look to the right and to the left whenever he or she has voluntarily put himself or herself into a position which may be one of peril coming from either direction. If you believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, in attempting to cross the street, did so without exercising that degree of care which would have been exercised by a person of ordinary prudence, under the instructions that I have just given you, and if you find that such failure upon her part proximately contributed to her injury, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be in favor of the defendant; and this is true even though you may believe that the driver of the automobile was also negligent."

The evidence showed that defendant's headlights were on, that daylight had ended, and that it was fairly dark. Plaintiff testified that she "first looked all around from east to west, and saw—from a distance far away—the car coming, but that was far away. So I crossed the street—started to walk—walk fast, * * * and I was struck and I fell down. * * * I did not see the automobile that struck me, it came so suddenly from the back." That after stepping off the curb into the street plaintiff "walked straight ahead" and did not look again in the direction of the car which she had seen coming, and only looked "to see where the white line was"—"I walked on there"—is undisputed. Plaintiff fell in the pedestrian crossing. It is apparent from the evidence that she walked into the side of defendant's automobile as defendant swerved his car away from her in an attempt to avoid her. The testimony of defendant and his wife, who was with him, shows that plaintiff stepped into the right rear fender of his car. A witness for plaintiff who was driving a car east on the south side of Jefferson street, defendant's car at the time being between his vehicle and plaintiff, testified that "Mrs. Salomon came in contact with the other side of the [defendant's] car, the right front fender, I should say." Joe Berard, a witness for plaintiff, was sitting at the front window of his home, in front of which the pedestrian zone was located, and testified that he saw the right front fender of defendant's car strike plaintiff. This witness said she "fell right close to the center of the white zone; her body was half past the cross zone * * * half past the 12-inch zone. Q. Do you mean one of the pedestrian zone lines? A. Yes sir." Other questions indicated he meant the west line marking the zone.

Regardless of which fender plaintiff contacted, the only conclusion that could be drawn from the evidence is that she ran into it. If she had been hit by the front of the fender, her body would not have remained in the pedestrian zone, much less on the west side of it.

[1-4] In our opinion the instruction complained of is subject to criticism, but we fail to see that, under the evidence presented, it amounts to a direction to the jury to return a verdict for defendant or an instruction that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, as contended by appellant. To tell the jury "that it is a duty resting upon any person attempting to cross a street that is likely to be dangerous, before placing himself or herself in a position of danger, to look in the direction from which such danger is to be anticipated" neither instructs the jurors that the place where the plaintiff attempted to cross was dangerous, nor that she placed herself in a position of danger, but leaves them to determine those facts for themselves. That it is the duty of such a person about to cross a street that is likely to be dangerous, or who is about to place himself or herself in a position of danger, to look before so doing, would seem to be a correct statement of the law as well as a commonplace, well known to every person of ordinary intelligence and concerning which the jurors would not need instruction. To say that such duty continues as one proceeds into a street that is likely to be dangerous, and before placing oneself in a position of danger, would seem to be equally so. It still leaves open to the jury the question of fact as to whether or not plaintiff was in a street that was likely to be dangerous, or placed herself in a dangerous position. If she was in a street likely to be dangerous, or did place herself in a position of danger, certainly the duty to look devolved upon her. She could not shut her eyes and walk hurriedly into danger and then say she was not negligent or was acting as would a person of ordinary prudence. It is equally true that "in the exercise of ordinary care it is the duty of the pedestrian to look to the right and to the left whenever he or she has voluntarily put himself or herself into a position which may be one of peril." Nor, in our opinion, does the statement of such commonplaces tell the jury that plaintiff had no right to assume that in the pedestrian zone, protected by the ordinance, she was in a place of safety, or that defendant would obey the ordinance and stop to let her pass. That is all involved in the question left to the jury to determine, i. e., whether the street was "likely to be dangerous" and whether or not plaintiff placed herself in a position of danger at any time in her progress across the roadway. And with such commonplaces in mind, if the jury believed that the plaintiff "in attempting to cross the street did so without exercising that degree of care, which would have been exercised by a person of ordinary prudence," and "that such failure upon her part proximately contributed to her injury," she certainly could not recover, regardless of how negligent defendant might have been; and that, in our opinion, is in effect what the second instruction complained of tells the jury.

While we cannot commend the instruction complained of to the profession, we fail to see any error in giving it under the evidence in this case. Even if erroneous, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we do not see how the jury could have reached a different conclusion.

[5] Appellant has also appealed from the order denying her motion for a new trial, from which, since 1915, no appeal lies.

On the 27th day of July, 1931, plaintiff was working on United States highway No. 80 at a point between Bostonia and Johnstown in the county of San Diego. He was an employee of the state department of public works, division of highways.

United States highway No. 80, which at this point runs in an easterly and westerly direction, has a paved portion in its center 16 feet in width, with an 8-foot shoulder on its south side and an 11-foot shoulder on its north side, both of which were fit for use by pedestrian and vehicular traffic on the day in question.

At the point of the accident involved here, a grader was being driven easterly along the southerly portion of the highway by J. D. Williamson, another employee of the state department of public works, division of highways. The plaintiff was riding on the rear of the grader. One of his duties required that he keep the paved portion of the highway clear of loose stones. Seeing several stones lying on the northerly edge of the pavement, he jumped from the grader and proceeded across the highway to remove them. He saw an automobile approaching from the east at a distance of about 600 feet. While removing the stones he saw the approaching car a second and a third time, the last when it was about 75 yards distant from him. He was standing on the extreme northern edge of the pavement facing in a northwesterly direction when he was struck by the defendant's car and seriously injured. The grader was using the southerly 18 inches of the pavement and the southerly dirt shoulder. The day was clear, the pavement was dry, and there was no other traffic on the highway.

The plaintiff filed this action to recover damages for his injuries, and the intervener filed its complaint in intervention to recover the moneys expended by it under the Employers' Liability Act of the state of California (St. 1911, p. 796). The jury returned a verdict against the defendant and the judgment followed, which he seeks to have reversed on this appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Lloyd E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Leslie A. Woods against G. W. Wisdom in which the People of the State of California on the relation of the State Department of Public Works, Division of High-evidence shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; second, errors of the trial court in its rulings on the admission of evidence; third, errors of the trial court in instructions given and in instructions refused.

In presenting his first ground for a reversal, defendant urges that as the plaintiff knew an automobile was approaching from the east it was contributory negligence for him to continue his work of removing the stones while standing on the paved portion of the highway. In this connection it should be observed that there was at least 13 feet of the paved portion of the highway clear and unobstructed between the grader and the plaintiff over which the defendant could have driven his car in safety without endangering either himself, the driver of the grader, or the plaintiff. It seems clear, under the circumstances, that if the defendant had been observing the road ahead and had used even the slightest degree of care he would not have driven his automobile into plaintiff and caused his injury.

[2, 3] It has been repeatedly held that a laborer, whose duties require him to be in a public street, is not required to be constantly on the lookout for approaching vehicles, since he should devote his time to the performance of his duties. Under such circumstances it is the duty of the driver of a motor vehicle to keep an alert watch for laborers on the street and avoid running them down. The laborer is entitled to keep his mind on his work, and it is not negligence as a matter of law for him to fail to continually look and listen for approaching vehicles. State, etc., Ins. Fund v. Scamell, 73 Cal. App. 285, 238 P. 780; Regan v. Los Angeles Ice, etc., Co., 46 Cal. App. 513, 189 P. 474. Under such circumstances the contributory negligence of the laborer is a matter of fact to be determined by the jury. King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 P. 777. The jury having found the plaintiff free from contributory negligence and the defendant guilty of negligence which proximately caused the injury, we cannot disturb the judgment on appeal.

[4] The defendant complains because the trial court overruled his objections to questions eliciting answers to the effect that the defendant failed to sound his horn in approaching the place of the accident. He urges that as the plaintiff knew of the approaching automobile it was not necessary for the motorist to give any alarm. The evidence discloses that defendant ran down a workman, who was in plain view, working on the street, without sounding any warning of his approach and while there were unoccupied portions of the street over which he might have driven if he had changed the direction of his car slightly and thereby have avoided the accident. We have concluded that under these circumstances the motorist who fails to change the direction of his car should give timely warning of his approach by sounding his horn and thus give the workman the lone chance of a jump for safety. It would seem that some warning should be given before a blow is struck by a dangerous agency such as a fast moving automobile. Common courtesy should require the warning, and the law should demand no less. Under similar circumstances evidence of the failure to give such warning has been held proper. Devecchio v. Ricketts, 66 Cal. App. 334, 226 P. 11; King v. Green, supra.

The first instruction given of which defendant complains consisted of a correct summary of subdivision a of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30). It was proper to give this instruction. The other instruction about which complaint is made contains a quotation from section 95 of the same act (as amended by St. 1929, p. 531, § 37). Under the authority of King v. Green, supra, and Devecchio v. Ricketts, supra, this instruction was also proper.

[5] The refused instruction to which defendant calls our attention laid particular emphasis on the testimony of defendant. It was amply covered by other instructions given, and there was no error in refusing it.

[6] Defendant has failed to present in his brief, or a supplement thereto, other instructions given bearing upon the same subjects as those given and refused of which he complains. Although not required to do so under these circumstances (Coats v. Hathorn, 121 Cal. App. 257, 8 P.(2d) 1038), we have examined all the instructions given by the trial court and find they correctly cover the law applicable to this case.

Judgment affirmed.

SPENCE, Justice.

This is an appeal by Maurice Derruau, one of the heirs of Elie Derruau, deceased, from the decree of final distribution herein.

[1] In 1929, Elie Derruau made his will and thereafter in 1930 married Marie Couralet, who survived him upon his death in 1932. Prior to 1931, and at the time of the testator's marriage, section 1299 of the Civil Code provided: "If, after making a will, the testator marries, and the wife survives the testator, the will is revoked, unless. * * *" In 1931 said section was repealed. At that time a new section designated as section 70 of the Probate Code was adopted and was in force at the time of the testator's death. The new section provided: "If a person marries after making a will, and the spouse survives the maker, the will is revoked *as to the spouse, unless. * * " (Italics ours.) It will be seen at a glance that the original section provided for a total revocation, while the new section provided for a partial revocation, viz., revocation only as to the surviving spouse.

The testator's will herein was admitted to probate, and by the decree of final distribution the estate was distributed thereunder, except that said will was treated as revoked as to the surviving wife.

Relying on the provisions of the original section (section 1299, Civ. Code) in force at the time of the testator's marriage, appellant contends that the revocation was total; but in our opinion this contention cannot be sustained. Appellant cites and relies upon In re Estate of Berger, 198 Cal. 103, 243 P. 862, 864, but that decision is not in point. There the court was dealing with an antenuptial will of a woman. After making her will the testatrix married twice, and her second husband predeceased her. Section 1300 of the Civil Code, in force at the time of her marriages, provided: "A will, executed by a woman, is revoked by her subsequent marriage, and is not revived by the death of her husband." That section as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1239, § 1) and in force at the time of the testatrix's death in 1924 read: "If, after making a will, the testatrix marries, and the husband survives the testatrix, the will is revoked, unless. * * *" It was there held that the will was not entitled to probate as the marriage of the testatrix had produced "absolute and complete revocation" under the statute in force at the time, and that the will was not "revived by a subsequently enacted statute changing the manner of revocation."

[2] The situation here is quite different. The section in force at the time of the testator's marriage (section 1299, Civ. Code) did not provide that revocation of the testator's will was produced by marriage alone, but such revocation was also dependent upon the survival of his wife. In other words, there could be no revocation under the terms of said section until the testator's death. As there was no revocation of the testator's will solely by reason of his marriage while said section was in force, and as that section had been repealed prior to his death, it cannot be relied upon as effecting total revocation of the testator's will as claimed by appellant. The distinction between the facts in Re Estate of Berger, supra, and those in the present case is suggested on page 111 of 198 Cal., 243 P. 862. Appellant criticizes the language there used by the court as it indicates that the new section (section 70, Probate Code) should be given what appellant terms a retroactive or retrospective effect. We cannot agree with appellant's views, but we are not called upon here to discuss the question of whether the trial court properly applied the section in force at the time of the testator's death, which section was enacted after the testator's marriage. We have already expressed the view that the will was not revoked by the repealed section. The only question remaining would be whether the trial court should have distributed the entire estate under the terms of the will or whether it properly treated the will as partially revoked by virtue of the terms of the new section. In neither case would appellant share in the estate, as he was neither a devisee or legatee under the will. There being no total revocation which would entitle appellant to participate, he could not complain, even assuming the trial court erred in treating the will as partially revoked under the terms of the new section. A determination of that question could affect only the rights of parties who have not appealed from the decree of final distribution.

Respondent makes the contention that appellant should have raised his point on an appeal from the order admitting the will to probate, and cannot raise it upon an appeal from the decree of final distribution, but in view of the conclusion we have reached it is unnecessary to discuss this question.

The decree is affirmed.

Pease, Dolley & Elson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MARKS, Acting Presiding Justice.

This is an action to quiet title. Both parties trace their titles to a common source, Jose Gonzales, who, on July 31, 1928, together with his wife, executed and delivered to appellants an instrument in writing whereby they did "grant, bargain, sell, convey, transfer, assign and set over unto said Frank Martin and Stella Meyer Martin, husband and wife as joint tenants, three per cent (3%) landowner's royalty being three per cent (3%) of all oil, gas and other hydrocarbon substances and/or minerals produced, extracted and saved on the following described real property located in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, to-wit:

"Lot Five (5) of Block eighty-four (84) in the Townsite of Santa Fe Springs as per Map recorded in Book 26, pages 37 to 40 Miscellaneous Records of said County.

"To have and to hold unto the said buyers or the survivor of them, their heirs and assigns forever."

Respondent instituted this action to quiet title against whatever interest appellants acquired under this instrument. The trial court found that at the time of its execution Gonzales was the owner in fee of the real estate; that the instrument was recorded on August 1, 1928; and that respondent acquired his title after that date.

The sole question presented here is whether or not appellants acquired an interest in the real property under the writing from which we have quoted. The precise question has been decided in the case of Beam v. Dugan (Cal. App.) 23 P.(2d) 58, where it is held that a similar instrument conveyed a vested interest in the real property. It follows that respondent's title should not have been quieted against this interest.

Petition for writ of review denied.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Arthur I. Townsend, of San Francisco, for respondent commission.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

The proceeding before the commission was upon a claim for compensation to the dependents of one Mark A. Winkler, whose death resulted from injuries arising out of and occurring in the course of his work as an employee. It is admitted that the liability exists as against at least one of the two alleged employers. The award was made not only against the insurance carrier of the employer Mono Construction Company, but also against the petitioner herein. The question presented for decision by this court is stated by petitioner as follows: "Does the Workmen's Compensation Act make a municipal corporation, building a large dam, liable as a special employer for the accidental death of an employee of an independent contractor doing excavation work on the project, where the only control by the municipal corporation was as to the route the excavation work was to take and where the usual characteristics of the employer and employee relationship existed between the employee and the independent contractor?"

The facts assumed in the statement above quoted are justified by the record as shown in the petition, except only as to the clause reading, "where the only control by the municipal corporation was as to the route the excavation work was to take."

[1, 2] The petition fails to conform to the requirements of rule XXVI, section 4, of the rules of this court, in this, that the rule requires that "such application, if based upon a want of evidence sufficient to warrant the conclusion of the commission, must fairly state all the material evidence relative to the point as to which such want of evidence is claimed to exist." A petition for writ of certiorari or review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission must be made in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, "so far as applicable and not in conflict with this act." Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, § 67, subd. (d), St. 1917, p. 875. Therefore the petition must be verified, like any other petition for a writ of review. Code Civ. Proc. § 1069. In the present instance petitioner has placed his statement of the case, together with a few excerpts from evidence, in the brief of its attorney, and not in the verified petition.

[3, 4] But if we disregard the foregoing criticism of the petition, and consider the evidence referred to in the brief, together with the evidence presented in the answer to the petition, we find that there was evidence tending to prove and sufficient to authorize the commission to make its finding that the said Mark A. Winkler, at the time when the injury was sustained by him, was employed by Mono Construction Company as a general employer, and by the petitioner herein as special employer; and that the petitioner through its general construction foreman had the right to and did give instructions and exercise control over the method of doing the work to such an extent and in such detail that upon such evidence the commission had the authority or jurisdiction to make its award against the petitioner as special employer of the deceased. It is not the function of this court to weigh the evidence beyond the point where it is ascertained that there is a jurisdictional foundation for the award.

The petition for writ of review is denied.

1. Appeal and error ⇐461.

Stay of execution could not be had where appeal bond was part cash and part surety, and judgment exceeded the part cash (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942, 948).

This is so since a stay of execution upon a judgment on appeal therefrom is a matter of statutory regulation, and an appeal bond which is part surety and part cash, the cash not being equal to the amount of the judgment, is not a substantial compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 942, which expressly provides for a bond binding sureties personally and makes no provision for a bond of a dual nature, nor a substantial compliance with section 948 which provides that a deposit in court of the amount of the judgment shall be equivalent to filing the bond.

Application by G. C. DeGarmo for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, Walton J. Lampton, as the County Clerk of the County of Los Angeles.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, Fred M. Cross, Deputy County Counsel, and Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

This is an application for a writ of mandate or such other writ as may be appropriate to secure cancellation of an order made by a judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county approving an undertaking upon an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $37,480; and also to secure issuance by the county clerk of a writ of execution upon the judgment which plaintiff, here the petitioner, has obtained.

While the trial court was conducting the hearings to determine the sufficiency of the undertaking entered into by various sureties, the defendants offered to post the sum of $5,000 with the county clerk to be held as additional security under the bond, the court having indicated that it desired an additional $20,000 in the way of sureties above those appearing on the undertaking, and the $5,000 cash being offered in lieu thereof. Counsel for defendant agreed that a cashier's check indorsed to L. E. Lampton, county clerk, should stand as part of the bond or undertaking, "the sum to be held by the County Clerk, to abide the decision of the reviewing court in case judgment appealed from is affirmed shall be applied in satisfaction of the judgment." This arrangement followed a declaration by the trial judge that he hesitated about allowing every item presented as a part of the aggregate undertaking of $74,960. There can be no question, therefore, that the $5,000 was intended for and was accepted by the court as part of the undertaking, especially in view of the language employed in the indorsement entered by the court upon the document as follows: "May 22, 1933. The appellants having deposited with the clerk the sum of $5,000.00 as part of the undertaking and to be used to satisfy any final judgment against appellants, the written undertaking is approved. Walton J. Wood, Judge." This conclusion is confirmed by consideration of the formal order approving the undertaking signed May 24, 1933, nunc pro tunc as of May 22, 1933.

It is apparent from the foregoing that the undertaking upon appeal, furnished by appellant and by the court approved, does not meet the requirement of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because that section makes no provision for a bond of a dual nature, part cash and part surety, but expressly provides for a written undertaking binding sureties personally to pay whatever is due from appellant upon affirmation of the judgment, if appellant fails to pay. Section 948 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "In all cases where an undertaking is required on appeal by the provisions of this title a deposit in the court below of the amount of the judgment appealed from, shall be equivalent to filing the undertaking." Inasmuch as the judgment in this case was $37,480, it is manifest that the deposit of $5,000 does not meet the requirement of section 948.

[1] We have then a situation in which appellant has failed to furnish a sufficient undertaking or a sufficient cash deposit within the terms of the Code provisions. As stated in Mohn v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. App. 425, 428, 200 P. 360, 361: "A stay of execution upon a judgment on appeal therefrom is a matter of statutory regulation, and can only be had upon a substantial compliance with the provisions of the Code." Since there is here no substantial compliance with the Code requirements, it follows that petitioner is entitled to his writ.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue to the county clerk of Los Angeles county, respondent herein, returnable in ten days from the service thereof, commanding him to issue an execution upon the judgment as prayed for; this order being made, however, without prejudice to the right of appellants to apply for a writ of supersedeas within ten days from and after the date upon which this order becomes final in this court; that is, within forty days after entry of this amended order.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

In the petition for rehearing there are several points suggested, but only one which we think requires any comment in addition to that contained in the opinion filed in deciding the case.

It is suggested by respondent Lampton in his petition for rehearing that the writ of mandate may not properly issue against him, because the superior court was not made a party before this court. In the argument under that heading it is further suggested that, where the interests of parties will be affected by the issuance of a writ, they must be made parties to such proceedings.

The superior court, together with respondent Lampton as county clerk, was named as a respondent in this proceeding. The court issued its alternative writ to the clerk alone. If we admit for the purposes of the argument that we should have issued the writ to the superior court as well as to the clerk, and if we further agree that it would have been better practice to direct that the parties in interest in the action in the court below be brought in to defend their interests in the matter, nevertheless the actual presentation to this court was, in fact, not thereby altered. Respondent Lampton was represented here by the same counsel who had appeared for the defendants in the action in the court below; and we do not doubt that the argument made by them in the proceeding here upon the merits was exactly the same argument which they would have made if the writ had been issued to the superior court and to the parties in interest in the action. Therefore it would be an idle act to grant a rehearing merely for the purpose of bringing in additional parties.

[2] The order herein made for issuance of the peremptory writ has been by this court rested solely upon the opinion that the order of the superior court relied upon by respondent to justify his refusal to issue the execution was a void order. From this we concluded that the case here presented "a situation in which appellant has failed to furnish a sufficient undertaking or a sufficient cash deposit within the terms of the code provisions." We adhere again to the resulting conclusion that the writ should issue against respondent clerk, the purpose being "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting" from his office. Writ denied.

Francis Gill and Pillsbury, Madison & Suro, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

Application for writ of mandate. It appears from the contents of the petition filed therefor that petitioner proceeded to take an appeal from an adverse judgment in the respondent court pursuant to the alternative method provided by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure; that he complied with all necessary legal requirements to obtain a record on appeal, but that thereafter the phonographic reporter who had officiated at the trial died, and consequently it was impossible for petitioner within the time allowed by law or at all to have a record on appeal prepared in accordance with the provisions of said Code section. Meanwhile, his time for taking the appeal by way of bill of exceptions had lapsed; also his motion for new trial was denied by operation of law. Upon the grounds and for the reasons mentioned he presented a motion to the respondent court, under the authority of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, seeking to be relieved from the apparent default on his part in preparing and presenting within the statutory time a bill of exceptions to which he was then compelled to resort in order to present his case on appeal, or, in the alternative, to set aside the order denying his motion for a new trial and to grant a new trial. The motion was denied, and he now seeks by way of mandamus to compel the respondent court to "entertain anew" said motion and thereupon to relieve him from said apparent default, or, in the alternative, to vacate the judgment and grant him a new trial.

[1] It has been definitely settled in this state, however, that an order refusing to relieve a party from default in presenting a bill of exceptions in due season on account of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, is an appealable order. It was expressly so held in Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 P. 332; and one of the latest decisions of the Supreme Court so holding is Wood v. Peterson Farms Co., 214 Cal. 94, 3 P.(2d) 922, 923, the court there saying: "It has been held that an order denying relief from default in the preparation of a statement or bill of exceptions is appealable. Murphy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 641, 643, 72 P. 176; Brode v. Goslin, 158 Cal. 699, 701, 112 P. 280."

[2] Since it appears, therefore, that petitioner is afforded ample remedy by appeal to review the merits of the motion which he now seeks by this proceeding in mandamus to compel the trial court to grant, the application for the writ is denied.

Defendant appeals from an order of the trial court denying his motion (1) to set aside the judgment and sentence imposed upon him, (2) to withdraw his plea of guilty, (3) to be permitted to enter a plea of not guilty.

This appellant, charged with the crime of robbery while armed with a deadly weapon, had originally entered a plea of not guilty. While held in jail awaiting trial, at the request of a chief of detectives and a deputy district attorney, and with the approval of his own attorney, he made a complete disclosure in regard to the offense charged, and gave the law enforcement authorities such information as they desired and as was within his knowledge concerning other criminal activities in the community where the offense complained of was committed. Defendant was induced to make these disclosures by representations made to him by the officers mentioned that in consideration thereof every effort would be made to secure probation for him, and that at any rate upon a plea of guilty he could rest assured that he would receive no more severe punishment than is provided for second degree robbery; the district attorney having recommended and the court having accepted a plea of guilty to the offense of robbery in that degree in the case of an alleged accomplice of the defendant, who, it appears, was armed at the time of the offense, the defendant then being unarmed.

Acting upon these representations and inducements, the defendant changed his plea from not guilty to guilty and applied for probation. The court, on a statement of the facts relating to the offense being made by a deputy district attorney, fixed the crime as first degree robbery, and at a later time denied probation and sentenced defendant to San Quentin for the term provided by law. Prior to sentence being imposed, appellant's counsel asked the court to permit the defendant to withdraw his plea of guilty, stating that the request was based upon the inability of the prosecuting officers to secure for the defendant what they had given him every reasonable hope to expect, namely, lenient treatment at the hands of the court.

The judge, notwithstanding this presentation of the case, denied the request and imposed the sentence for first degree robbery. A week later he denied the formal motion on matters now before us. This motion was supported by affidavits as to which there is no counter showing, and which, uncontradicted as they are, indicate that the appellant in this case was the victim of the same kind of legal fraud as the appellant in the case of People v. Schwarz et al., 201 Cal. 309, 257 P. 71, 73, where, under practically the same state of facts as in the instant case, the Supreme Court entered a reversal. Here, as in that case, it may be said: "The facts as alleged fully warrant the conclusion that substantial rights of the defendant have been taken away from her without an opportunity for a hearing on the merits, and this by those persons charged with the enforcement of the law." It is interesting to note that counsel for the respondent, differentiating this case from one where a defendant voluntarily "gambles" on getting probation, and desiring to see that no injustice is done the defendant, joins with counsel for appellant in citing the case last mentioned as authority for a reversal at our hands. Accordingly, in expressing our decision, we adopt, so far as it is applicable, the language employed in that case.

The order of May 18, 1933, denying the motion to set aside the judgment and sentence, to grant permission to withdraw the plea of guilty, and to enter a plea of not guilty, is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the court below, with instructions to allow a further hearing of said motion, and if the material allegations made in support thereof are sustained, to accord to said defendant the right to withdraw said plea of guilty and to enter a plea of not guilty, and for such further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion as may seem meet and proper, including vacating of the finding as to the degree of the offense charged.

SPENCE, Justice.

Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $5,000 awarded for personal injuries resulting from an automobile accident. Defendant contends that the damages are excessive and that the trial court erred in refusing to give a certain instruction proposed by defendant.

[1] The facts surrounding the happening of the accident need not be stated, as the questions raised on this appeal relate solely to the issue of damages. When the automobiles of plaintiff and defendant collided, plaintiff's automobile was damaged to some extent, but plaintiff was neither thrown from her car nor rendered unconscious. Plaintiff sustained no fractures of any kind and her injuries appeared to be quite superficial in their nature. She remained at the scene of the accident for some time, examined her car, and conversed with defendant regarding the cause of the accident. Plaintiff and defendant exchanged cards and plaintiff stated that she was not hurt much. She did not seek or receive any emergency treatment, and after talking to some people at the drug store in the vicinity of the accident, she accepted a ride to her home. She did not consult a physician until the evening of the following day, when she went to a doctor's office for that purpose. The evidence produced on behalf of plaintiff showed that the physical injuries were slight and temporary in their nature. There was a swelling and a bruising of the right knee, right ankle, and left elbow. These injuries were treated with hot applications, and her physician testified that they had cleared up entirely some time prior to the trial, which was held four and one-half months after the accident. There were no scars. Plaintiff also had a swelling on the right side of her head which was tender for about six weeks. The doctor prescribed rest in bed, ice bags on the head, mustard footbaths, and sedatives. Plaintiff did not go to a hospital, but remained in bed at home for about two weeks, and was partially disabled for about four weeks thereafter. Plaintiff had resumed the driving of her automobile some time prior to the trial. The only injury claimed to be serious or lasting was some loss of memory. Plaintiff's testimony on this subject was far from satisfactory and was practically negated in its entirety by her general ability as a witness. Her physician's testimony on this subject was predicated upon statements made by plaintiff and certain memory tests, the results of which appeared to have been quite normal. We may state that defendant's expert testimony showed that plaintiff had suffered no permanent or lasting injury of any kind as a result of the accident. No special damage for loss of wages was alleged, but plaintiff endeavored to show loss of earning capacity under the general allegation of damage. Plaintiff was fifty-three years of age. She had worked as a nurse, but was not working at the time of the accident. During the ten months preceding the accident she had worked on but two cases and only for eleven weeks. The proof of loss of earning capacity was entirely based upon the testimony of plaintiff and her physician relating to her alleged loss of memory, which testimony has been commented upon above. The evidence relating to the expenses incurred as a result of the accident including X-rays showed that these expenses amounted to something less than $300.

After considering all of the evidence most favorable to plaintiff, we are still of the opinion that said evidence was insufficient to sustain the award of $5,000. In Aspe v. Pirrelli, 204 Cal. 9, 266 P. 276, and Davis v. Renton, 99 Cal. App. 264, 278 P. 442, the facts were not exactly on all fours with the present case, but the injuries were somewhat similar. The showing of damage in the last-named case was even stronger than the showing made in the present case. The court there referred to the well-settled rules governing appellate courts in considering the question of excessive damages, but after reviewing the evidence held that the judgment should be reversed. Upon the authority of the cases cited we cannot escape the conclusion that the judgment here cannot be permitted to stand.

[2] The refused instruction had to do with the duty of an injured party to use ordinary care to avoid aggravating or prolonging the effects of an injury. Its correctness as an abstract proposition of law may be conceded, but under the evidence in the present case we do not believe that the mere failure to give said instruction would alone constitute prejudicial error requiring a reversal.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the trial court for a new trial solely upon the issue of damages with directions to the trial court upon settlement of that issue to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount so found. The defendant will recover his costs on this appeal.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Defendant was convicted by a jury of first degree murder and sentenced to state prison for life, in accordance with the recommendation returned with the verdict. From the judgment and an order of the trial court denying a motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict of first degree murder or any homicide of a higher degree than manslaughter, and that therefore the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; also, that the trial court erred in not reducing the crime to manslaughter, under provisions of section 1181, Penal Code, par. 6; it being urged that upon consideration of the evidence and the law such action should now be taken by this court. It is incumbent upon us, therefore, to review the circumstances surrounding the commission of this offense.

On December 22, 1932, the defendant, a mechanic by trade, was engaged in the bootlegging business, having been, as he claimed, unable to secure other employment. Working for him was one Frank Tschurl, a brother-in-law of the deceased, Frederick Kasprovitz. Tschurl testified that about 7 o'clock of the morning of the date mentioned, while he was in the house occupied by himself and defendant, the latter told him of his suspicion that Kasprovitz had been involved in a raid made upon defendant's place of business; that with a customer named Joe they consumed two pints of whisky between 7 and 8:30 a. m., defendant taking about eight drinks and also drinking some wine, all without eating any breakfast; that defendant was in his opinion intoxicated, but was apparently in his accustomed jolly frame of mind when he left the house, not later than 11 a. m., having meantime taken a bath and appearing when about to leave the house with an automatic revolver in his hand, which the witness tried unsuccessfully to persuade him to leave at home; the defendant saying, "Now, I am going to go out and find out things and do things." There was testimony to the effect that defendant frequently carried several hundred dollars on his person and often went armed. The wife of the deceased testified that shortly before 1 p. m., seeing defendant on her back porch while she was in the kitchen with her husband, she said, "Here comes Johnnie. Come in"; that the defendant entered the kitchen, took a position within a few feet of the deceased, who was standing in the kitchen smoking a pipe, and asked him, "How much money did you get from Frank?" Upon Kasprovitz denying that he had received any money, defendant, according to Mrs. Kasprovitz, called him some vile names and drew a gun from his overcoat pocket, whereupon Kasprovitz said to his wife, "You see he is so yellow he needs a gun to talk to me"; that while defendant held the gun pointed at Kasprovitz and was uttering the words, "You are damned right and I will give you plenty," she got between the two men, telling defendant he did not need the gun and that he had better go out and get out; that her husband moved her to one side, and defendant thereupon backed out of the house and down the steps, Kasprovitz following him unarmed and step by step till they both passed down the back steps into the back yard to a point where defendant had parked his car; that there their voices subsided as they talked Polish, a language which the witness did not understand, for about ten minutes, during which time she "thought they made up, because they did not holler any more; neither one of them hollered"; that she then heard shots fired, and ran toward the door, and "that is where Fred met me." The record of Mrs. Kasprovitz' testimony at this point reads as follows:

"Q. When you ran towards the door, which door did you run towards? A. To the screen door.

"Q. And how many shots did you hear fired? A. There was four shots, yet it sounded like three, it was so fast; it was awfully fast.

"Q. Then you say you ran towards this door? A. Yes; and that is where Fred was; he was coming in, and I was going out.

"Q. He had already come up the steps? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, when the shots were fired, will you state whether or not Fred was still out in the yard, or was he up on the porch at that time? A. I think the shots were still going when he was coming; that is the way it seemed to me.

"Q. I see; and what is the next thing you saw when you met Fred there at the door? What was the next thing that was done? A. He said, 'He got me; he got me;' he says, 'Call the police.'

"Q. Did he have his pipe at that time? A. He still had the pipe in his hand."

It is undisputed that one of the bullets fired by defendant entered the abdomen of Kasprovitz and caused his death; the evidence indicating that shortly after entering his home, on being shot by defendant, he went first toward the telephone and then out a door and fell to the ground, where at about 2 p. m. a police officer saw him still alive but unable to talk. The jury was taken to view the premises and had an opportunity to observe the kitchen of the Kasprovitz home, the back porch, the screen door of the porch, the back steps, and the back yard. Their attention was there directed to three holes appearing respectively, first, in the main portion of the house, that is, to the left of the porch at a point midway between the window and the edge of the house; second, in the wood panel of the screen door of the porch; and, third, in the door jamb of the screen door. The witness Tschurl identified three bullets which were received in evidence, as to which quoting from appellant's brief, "He stated that he had dug the smaller one from the siding of the house near the driveway about two feet from the end of the house and about four feet or four and a half feet above the ground. That he had taken one of the other bullets from the screen door out of the panel at a height of about two feet, and that the third bullet had been taken out of the frame up in the corner of the same door; and that when he had extracted the bullet it had been necessary for him to open the screen door to remove it."

After the shooting, defendant ran through back yards and over fences and down a railway right of way to a lumber yard, where a police officer, one Magness, later found him hiding under a pile of lumber, at that time having in his pocket the automatic revolver which he had used with such deadly effect, and which still contained two bullets. To this officer defendant had first stated that he had no gun and that he had not done the shooting; later, on being asked by the officer why he shot the man, said that "Fred had double-crossed him and that he was a dirty stool pigeon." At this time defendant asked the officer to take him to a hospital so he could undergo a sobriety test; Magness merely replying that the doctor at the police station could look him over, if he needed such a test. This officer testified that in his opinion defendant, at the time of his arrest, was not intoxicated to such a degree that he did not know what he was doing. He further testified as follows: "A. I asked the defendant, again, the circumstances regarding the shooting, as to where he was when he fired the shots, and where Kasprovitz was when he fired the shots, and why he shot. The defendant stated that Kasprovitz was a prize-fighter and he was afraid of him. He came towards him; he was coming towards him; and he backed down the steps; and he said Fred put his hand in his pocket like he was going to draw out a gun, and that he beat him to the draw. He said he was afraid that Kasprovitz was either going to hit him or he was going to shoot him. * * * And I asked him why he thought Kasprovitz was going to shoot him. Well, he said he knew that Kasprovitz carried a gun; he was known to carry a gun; and he said, 'You go search the house, and you will find a gun.' Well, I went in and search the house, the lower portion of the house, and found a gun." He also testified that he found the body of the deceased upon the sidewalk and that he did not see any weapon on the body. Another officer, Harry Burch, gave the following testimony: "I asked the defendant if he had shot Fred Kasprovitz with a 25 automatic; and he said that he had. I asked him if he had shot him, that day, in the afternoon; and he said that he had. And I asked him why he shot him; and he said that Fred was a 'dirty rat.' I asked him to show me where he and Fred were standing at the time that he shot him; and he showed me. And I asked him if the shells—where the shells would fly from the gun after they were ejected; and he picked up some shells and showed me. He said those were the shells." The witness then identified three shells as the ones picked up by the defendant on that occasion and they were marked in evidence. He continued with the conversation as follows: "I asked the defendant if he had at any time seen a gun on the person of Fred Kasprovitz, and he said he had not." (Rep. Tr., pp. 191 to 194, inclusive.)

Mr. Rex McCormick, a neighbor of the deceased, testified that, just prior to his observing the defendant in flight, he had heard four shots, "two shots, and about two seconds later there were two more shots"; further, "when I heard the last two shots I started for the front door, and as I did, I saw this man go back through the driveway." This witness stated that Magness, the police officer, asked defendant why he had shot Kasprovitz, and defendant said he had done to him "just like all stool pigeons ought to be done to."

The defendant's version of his meeting with the deceased in the Kasprovitz kitchen differed from that of Mrs. Kasprovitz, in that he said, "Fred, did Frank give you any money, or did you make any money on the case that I had?" to which Kasprovitz replied, denying in profane language that he had made any money on the case, calling defendant a yellow rat, and saying to his wife, "Look at him, he has got his hand in his pocket." He stated that he was afraid of deceased because he saw a gun in his hand, and thereupon produced his own gun and aimed it at Kasprovitz; Mrs. Kasprovitz then coming between them. Immediately thereafter, while on the back porch, he realized that what he saw in the hand of the deceased was not a gun, but a pipe.

As to the actual shooting, the defendant testified that as he turned and tried to open the door of the automobile and enter it Kasprovitz made a quick move, turned around, and jumped up closer to the car, and, while they were shifting their positions, "Pulling his right hand back. I thought that he went after a gun; and, at the same time, he reached with his left hand and got hold of my hand.

"Q. And did you have anything in your right hand at that time? A. I had a revolver.

"Q. What did he do in relation to your right hand? A. He jerked my hand and at the same time the shots fired.

"Q. Well, why did you fire the shots? A. I was excited, and I don't mean to fire, but when he jerked my hand it just happened that I pulled on the trigger and it went off.

"Q. How far away was he from you at that time? A. About one foot." (Rep. Tr., pp. 303 to 306, inclusive.)

He testified further as follows:

"Q. Do you remember how many shots you fired? A. I fired—I am sure of firing one, when he got hold of my hand, or two.

"Q. Are you sure of any more than that? A. Yes; when he jerked me, then I jerked myself back and I almost fall down at that time; and I pulled myself towards the house, and I fire one or two more shots, I do not remember.

"Q. Now, what was your mental state at that time? A. What do you mean by 'mental state'?

"Q. Were you excited or not? A. I was, yes; I was very excited.

"Q. And in what way did that show itself? A. I got scared.

"Q. Got what? A. Well, I was afraid, when he was coming for me, all that time; and then when I heard the shots—when I fire, I got scared all together, all excited; I didn't know what I was doing."

Further testimony was as follows (Rep. Tr., 320):

"Q. Now, during that period (i. e., while he was backing down the steps and through the yard to the point where his car was parked) did Fred Kasprovitz, at any time, after you had started and up to the time as you came to the automobile, say anything? You may take the stand. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said, 'You son-of-a-bitch! I get you, this time.'

"Q. And when did he say that? A. When he was on the steps.

"Q. You mean the steps from porch 2? A. From the porch to the driveway.

"Q. And when you got to the automobile, what did he say then, if anything? A. I asked him to get away from me. I say, 'Fred, please let me go; I did not come in here to fight with you; I come in here to talk with you.' He say, 'You son-of-a-bitch, this is the last time you talk to me.'

"Q. Now, what did you say, if anything? A. Well, I could not say anything, because just about that time he jumped for the gun.

"Q. What was the state of your mind at that time, when he jumped for the gun? A. I tried to beat it away.

"Q. What was the state of your mind? A. I understood that he was going to beat me or kill me, or beat me up.

"Q. Were you afraid? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How great was your fear? Can you describe the degree of your fear? * * *

A. Well, I was so afraid that I did not know just what to do."

The defendant also stated that certain threats which had previously been made against him by deceased, who was considerably larger and more powerful than himself, together with what he had heard about Kasprovitz' brutality, had made him very much afraid of the deceased.

Counsel for appellant contends "that the evidence failed to show a crime of any greater degree than that of manslaughter," arguing that defendant did not have an immediate intention of taking the life of the deceased "or that he would have shot him the instant he pulled his gun in the kitchen of the deceased's home," further that: "Assuming for the sake of argument, but without conceding same to be a fact, that defendant went to the home of the deceased with murder in his heart, with a deliberate, wilful and premeditated intent to take the life of the deceased, the facts proved clearly show that such intent, if any, was abandoned either through fear of the deceased or the cooling of the defendant's anger or for some other reason, possibly a realization of the possible consequences, the intent was completely abandoned by the defendant and when he was told to leave the house by Mrs. Kasprovitz he immediately complied, but the deceased, who was a much larger man and very powerfully built, followed him step by step holding his pipe in his hand (the exact position of which does not clearly appear from the testimony, other than from the testimony of the defendant) and, when Mrs. Kasprovitz attempted to step in between them, the deceased curtly told her to get out of the way and pushed her to one side continuing to advance toward the defendant. Thus they reached a point in the vicinity of the defendant's automobile and appeared to Mrs. Kasprovitz to be talking in friendly tones as their voices were no longer loud and angry, and they stood there conversing in Polish for several minutes. She could see their faces and testified that she thought the quarrel was all over from their expression and voices, but she could not see anything but the faces of the two men. By a fair interpretation of this testimony there was some evidence not only that the defendant abandoned any design or intention, if any, to take the life of the deceased, but that he attempted to retreat and that the deceased thereupon became the aggressor."

Answering this contention, it may be that the jury concluded that Kasprovitz' action in moving his wife to one side and following the defendant with his gun still in evidence down the steps was taken for the purpose of getting Mrs. Kasprovitz out of an extremely dangerous position; in fact, realizing that the defendant at all times after first entering the kitchen had his gun drawn and that the deceased at no time had any weapon, it is difficult to conceive of his position as being that of an aggressor. On the theory that in some way this case presents an instance of self-defense, counsel invokes the doctrine of People v. Knapp, 71 Cal. 1, 9, 11 P. 793, saying: "The defendant was therefore entitled to have his testimony considered as bearing on the question of self-defense, and even though his testimony should fail to show a complete justification for the killing it would be sufficient in the absence of any other testimony bearing on the question to raise a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors as to the degree of the crime, whether it were manslaughter or murder. Section 1097 of the Penal Code reads as follows: 'When it appears that the defendant has committed a public offense, and there is reasonable ground of doubt in which of two or more degrees he is guilty, he can be convicted of the lowest of such degrees only.' It might be contended by the prosecution that the jury were entitled to disbelieve the testimony of the defendant as to the circumstances of the actual shooting, but in that event there is left no testimony whatsoever as to the facts and circumstances immediately preceding the shooting and a verdict of first degree murder based upon such circumstances can not be sustained." Citing People v. Howard, 211 Cal. 322, 295 P. 333, 71 A. L. R. 1385.

[1] The closing language of this argument brings us face to face with the vital point of this case. We do not agree that the testimony of the defendant, as given on the stand, was the sole testimony upon which the jury was bound to base its verdict. The jurors had a right to consider the fact that immediately after the shooting defendant fled, and that, when apprehended by the officers, instead of saying that the death was the result of an unfortunate accident or that he shot in self-defense, he stated that he had killed the deceased because he had double-crossed him, and was a dirty stool pigeon; also that, when asked later by the police officer Burch "Why did you shoot Fred Kasprovitz?" he said, "I don't know. I will get the rope for this. I killed my best friend."

Mrs. Kasprovitz also testified that, when the officers brought the defendant back to the house, when he was crying, he said, "I killed my best friend for nothing, that is all." Finally, it must be said that the jury may have considered as amply proven the fact that, while the two men were close beside each other just prior to the shooting, the deceased immediately thereafter made his way up the back steps, and, as he or his wife opened the screen door to admit him to the house, one of at least three bullets fired by the defendant in the direction of and against the house, which was at an elevation of several feet above the yard, entered the jamb of the screen door, while that door was open. All this discloses a situation where the jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that deceased, running, or attempting to run, away from defendant and on his own property and unarmed, was pursued by a rain of bullets. Taken in conjunction with the testimony of the witness McCormick as to the sequence of the firing of the shots, "Two shots, and about two seconds later, two more shots," Mrs. Kasprovitz' statement, "I think the shots were still going when he was coming," and appellant's own testimony, "Yes, when he jerked me, then I jerk myself back, and I almost fall down at that time; and I pulled myself forward to the house, and I fired one or two more shots, I do not remember," the facts recited placed the jury in position where they had before them as evidence bearing on the degree of the crime physical facts and various conditions other than defendant's testimony that the shooting was either an accident or resorted to in self-defense. Can it be said then that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict of first degree murder, as defined in section 189, Penal Code?

People v. Bowman, 81 Cal. 567, 22 P. 917, lays down the principle that "it is the province of the jury to determine, from all the facts and circumstances in evidence, whether the killing is accompanied by all the ingredients which go to make up the crime charged"; and in People v. Traichoff, 26 Cal. App. 659, 147 P. 1178, we find the following language: "There need be no appreciable space of time between the intent to kill and the act of killing. It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer; and, if such is the case, the killing is murder in the first degree [citing cases]; and the question of whether or not the defendant in this case acted with deliberation or premeditation in the act of killing was, under the circumstances just narrated, clearly a question of fact for the jury."

[2] In considering the motion for a new trial and the request that the offense be reduced from first degree murder to a lesser or included offense, the learned trial judge

In this case, after postponing action for several days and exhaustively summarizing the evidence, decided that under the law and the evidence he was not justified in granting the motion for a new trial or in reducing the offense. Taking the same view, we hold that the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment on the pleadings after the impaneling of a jury and from an order dismissing the action without leave to amend, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The complaint comprises two causes of action: One sounding in libel for the special damages alleged therein, for general damages and also for punitive damages for malice; the second for damages for the negligence of defendants in committing the acts complained of. A demurrer to plaintiff's complaint was interposed, argued, and overruled. At the trial, and after a jury had been impaneled, the court required plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action he would proceed to trial. Plaintiff elected to stand on the first. Upon motion of defendants the court then dismissed the action upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and granted a judgment for defendants without leave to amend.

The causes of action as set forth in plaintiff's complaint are substantially as follows: The first alleged that plaintiff was employed by the Sun Life Assurance Company, and was engaged by that company under a contract a portion of which provided, in substance, that plaintiff could not assign his commissions, or any part thereof, to any firm, person, or corporation, and that, in the event of such assignment, his contract with the company would be canceled. It is then alleged that defendants maliciously mailed to plaintiff's employer a notice of assignment of wages by plaintiff, which assignment was in fact and in truth never made. As a result of this act on the part of defendants, plaintiff was discharged and his contract canceled, causing him the loss and damage alleged in his complaint. The second count is one for damages for the negligence of defendants in publishing such notice and assignment.

[1] In reaching the conclusion that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, the trial court was of the opinion that, as the first count of the complaint was based upon the theory of libel, the words in the alleged publication, being clear and unequivocal and not libelous per se, were not libelous at all. In support of the conclusion of the trial court, respondents have cited us to the following authorities: Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 P. 150, 499; Des Granges v. Crall, 27 Cal. App. 313, 149 P. 777; Chavez v. Times-Mirror Company, 185 Cal. 20, 195 P. 666; Bates v. Campbell, 213 Cal. 438, 2 P.(2d) 383; Vedovi v. Watson & Taylor, 104 Cal. App. 80, 285 P. 418. In none of these cases, however, was special damage pleaded for the purpose of stating a cause of action. Under these circumstances the courts have held that words of common or ordinary import contained in a publication are either libelous per se or not at all. Where, as here, however, special damages are pleaded, this rule does not obtain.

[2-6] Plaintiff charged, and for the purposes of this case we are bound to assume the charges to be true (Allred v. Sheehan, 54 Cal. App. 688, 202 P. 681), that defendants maliciously published a direct falsehood and signed plaintiff's name thereto without his consent or knowledge, and thereby caused plaintiff to suffer damages, which damages were directly alleged. The facts pleaded clearly state a tortious wrong committed by defendants, and this irrespective of whether the action be called one for libel, negligence, or damages, and plaintiff should have been permitted to show that the damages suffered were the immediate, proximate, and direct result of the actual words published. Where a publication is not libelous per se, but special damages or injury is alleged as a natural and proximate result of such publication, and the publication is alleged to be false and to have been maliciously made, it is actionable. A party is liable in tort for all the consequences that reasonably and naturally flow from or follow his wrongful act, whether the consequences were actually contemplated or not. 17 R. C. L. 264, 311 et seq.; Cooley on Torts (4th Ed.) p. 499; Briggs v. Brown, 55 Fla. 417, 46 So. 325; Harrison v. Burger, 212 Ala. 670, 103 So. 842; Morasse v. Brochu, 151 Mass. 567, 25 N. E. 74, 8 L. R. A. 524, 21 Am. St. Rep. 474; Lombard v. Lennox, 155 Mass. 70, 28 N. E. 1125, 31 Am. St. Rep. 528. While, as above stated, the action may not be technically one for libel if the words are not defamatory, the name of the action is of no consequence provided plaintiff has stated sufficient facts to show a right of recovery. Hollenbeck v. Ristine, 105 Iowa, 488, 75 N. W. 355, 67 Am. St. Rep. 306; Morasse v. Brochu, supra.

[7] Respondents further contend in support of the judgment that the alleged publication, not being libelous per se, could not become libelous by virtue of the existence at the time of its publication of a specific contract between plaintiff and his employer, the existence of which was not alleged to be customary to the general employment of plaintiff, as the publication did not naturally cause damage. Whether defendants knew of the employer's rule that an employee who assigned his wages to a creditor would be discharged is immaterial where one claiming to be an assignee maliciously exhibits a forged wage assignment to the employer. Askins v. Sparks (Tex. Civ. App.) 56 S.W.(2d) 279.

[8] And finally, as to the claim that the court erred in compelling plaintiff to elect on what cause of action he would proceed to trial, it is sufficient to say that plaintiff had the right to state his cause of action in inconsistent counts. Tanforan v. Tanforan, 173 Cal. 270, 159 P. 709.

The judgment of dismissal is reversed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

While inspecting an apartment house nearing completion, at the invitation of the owner and in contemplation of renting an apartment therein, plaintiff fell from a stairway and was injured, as a result of which she instituted this action for damages against the owner and upon trial before the court sitting without a jury was awarded judgment for the sum of $3,500, from which the defendant has taken this appeal.

At the time the accident happened the building was 95 per cent. finished; and the defendant owner being desirous of having the apartments rented as soon as they were ready for occupancy, for some six weeks prior to the accident, had been inviting and permitting people to examine them. Signs were displayed at the front entrance reading, "Open for inspection," and, "Reservations now being made," etc.; and prior to the date on which plaintiff was injured approximately one hundred prospective tenants had visited the premises, and seven or eight apartments had been leased. Plaintiff resided with her married daughter a short distance from the apartment house and during its construction passed it frequently. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, during the month of March, in response to a special invitation extended by the leasing manager who was present on the premises, plaintiff, accompanied by her daughter, called at the building for the purposes mentioned, entered through the main door, crossed the lobby, and started to ascend the concrete stairway, which was built in three flights, winding to the left; the second and third flights being constructed at right angles with the one immediately below, with platforms at the top of the first and second flights. The right-hand side of the stairway abutted against the walls of the building, but the left side was unprotected; the balustrade not then having been installed. The day preceding plaintiff's visit the plasterers had been at work on the walls adjacent to and the ceiling above the stairway, and the refuse left by them on the stairway had not been removed. Part of it consisted of a piece of heavy scaffolding, about six feet long, which was not attached or fastened in any manner to the stairway or the building, but which had been left standing on the stairway in a vertical position, with one end resting on the tread of the stairway about a foot from the wall and the other end against the wall; furthermore, the light on the stairway which came through the main doorway was more or less obscured by boards and scaffolding which had not then been removed; and defendant's building superintendent was aware of all these existing conditions at the time plaintiff called to visit the premises. As plaintiff reached the fourth tread of the second flight of stairs, she stepped on some small hard object which she did not see, and which later proved to be a piece of plaster or cement; and she was thrown thereby against the loose timber on the stairway, which fell upon and precipitated her over the unprotected side of the stairway to the concrete floor below, a distance of eight or ten feet; and besides suffering severe contusions of the back and legs she sustained a fracture of the body of the second lumbar vertebra, which confined her to her bed for approximately five and a half months.

[1-3] It is held generally that an invitee is entitled to assume that the premises he is invited to enter are reasonably safe for the purposes for which the invitation is extended, and that he is entitled to recover damages from the owner for personal injuries sustained as a result of the owner's failure to exercise ordinary care in maintaining the premises in a reasonably safe and suitable condition. 45 C. J. 826; Thompson on Negligence, vol. 1, p. 890; Madigan v. O. A. Hale & Co., 90 Cal. App. 151, 265 P. 574; Brinkworth v. Sam Seelig Co., 51 Cal. App. 668, 197 P. 427. Here the trial court found that the accident which resulted in plaintiff's injuries was proximately caused by the failure of defendant to exercise such ordinary care and was not contributed to in any manner by any negligence on her part; and after reviewing the evidence, we are satisfied that the trial court's findings are supported thereby. It is true, as defendant contends, that "an invitation to use property on which work is being done extends to the property in its then condition, and invitees using the property assume the risk of such condition" (45 C. J., p. 837); but obviously such rule does not do away with the legal duty imposed upon the owner to use ordinary care to keep the premises in a reasonably safe condition for those he has invited to come upon them.

[4] Defendant points out that under the general rule the owner is not liable where the danger which resulted in the injury to the invitee is obviously exposed to the invitee or which would be obvious to him upon the ordinary use of his own senses (Weddle v. Heath, 211 Cal. 445, 295 P. 832); and it is argued therefrom that plaintiff may not recover here because the presence of the timber on the stairway and the fact that the outer edge of the stairway was not protected by a balustrade were admittedly obvious to any one ascending the stairway. All of this may be true, but as will be noted neither of those two elements constituted the proximate cause of plaintiff's fall. Beyond question they contributed largely to the serious injuries she sustained, because if it had not been for the presence of the timber on the stairway and the absence of a balustrade, or other protection on the outer edge of the stairway she would not have fallen over the edge of the stairway to the cement floor eight or ten feet below. But the actual cause of plaintiff's fall was the piece of mortar or cement on the steps. In other words, if there had been no piece of mortar or cement on the steps she would not have fallen at all; and in this connection plaintiff testified and the trial court found that its presence on the stairs was not obvious and that as a matter of fact plaintiff did not see it before she stepped on it and fell.

Defendant contends also that in order to sustain the judgment it must appear from the evidence not only that plaintiff's fall was caused by "a hidden risk," but that the "hidden risk" was known to defendant or had existed long enough for him to have known about it. As stated in Thompson on Negligence, supra, the owner "of real property is under the duty of exercising reasonable or ordinary care and prudence to the end of keeping his premises safe for the benefit of those who come upon them by his invitation, express or implied; and if, through a neglect of this duty, they are, without negligence or fault of their own, injured by reason of any negligent defect therein, he must pay damages. The person so invited to come upon the premises of the other, is entitled to assume that they will be in a reasonably safe condition." And here, as already pointed out, the building superintendent admitted having known of the refuse left on the stairway by the plasterers, including pieces of scaffolding, and that he knew also of the absence of the balustrade. Therefore, the trial court's finding that "* * * defendant negligently and carelessly kept and maintained the main stairway of said apartment house, leading from the lobby or first floor to the second floor thereof, in an unsafe, improper and dangerous condition * * *" appears to be legally supported.

Defendant makes the further point that in any event plaintiff should have used the elevator instead of attempting to ascend the stairway. The answer to this point is that plaintiff was not aware that an elevator had been installed; and, moreover, it was not established that on this particular day the elevator was in a condition to be used by passengers.

A number of authorities have been cited by the respective parties in their briefs, but a discussion of them is unnecessary because the law of the case appears to be well settled, the question of defendant's liability resting almost entirely upon the determination of the facts; and since the trial court's findings on the vital issues are legally supported by evidence, they are controlling on the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

CASHIN, Justice.

An appeal by defendants Jones from a decree quieting plaintiff's title to certain real property in Los Angeles county and enjoining the issuance of a sheriff's deed to the property.

According to a stipulated statement of facts submitted to the trial court, plaintiff was formerly the wife of defendant Robert W. Jones. In an action for divorce between them the real property mentioned was awarded to plaintiff as her separate property, and by the same decree said defendant was awarded judgment against plaintiff for $380. It was stipulated that: "On February 26, 1929, plaintiff and defendant, Robert W. Jones, by grant deed conveyed the above-described property by mesne conveyances to plaintiff Clara O. Jones as her separate property." On March 12, 1929, the above judgment was recorded in Los Angeles county, and on March 13, 1929, the deed mentioned was also recorded. On March 14, 1929, plaintiff transferred the property to John G. Fell by grant deed, which was recorded on the same day. On March 30, 1929, defendant Robert W. Jones executed to plaintiff a grant deed of the same property, which was recorded on April 2, 1929. This deed contained the following provision: "This deed is given to carry out the mutual agreement of the parties hereto that said property shall become vested in the grantee herein as her sole and separate property free of all interest or claim or title of the grantor herein now existing or which may hereafter arise by reason of the marital relations of said parties, and it is so accepted by said grantee, whose signature is subscribed hereto for confirmation thereof." Later defendant last named caused an execution to issue on the judgment, and on April 29, 1929, the same was levied upon the property. Fell thereupon brought suit against said defendant and the sheriff to enjoin a sale under the execution, and on February 16, 1931, judgment was entered permanently enjoining said sale.

As the ground for its judgment the court found: "That said defendant Robert W. Jones by the terms and conditions of a certain grant deed from Robert W. Jones and Clara O. Jones, as grantors, to Clara O. Jones, as grantee, and dated May 30, 1929, and covering the premises described in plaintiff's complaint, which said deed is recorded in book 9090, p. 296, Official Records in the office of the County Recorder of Los Angeles county, California, did waive the lien that is impressed upon said real property by the said record of said judgment, and by such waiver was estopped from enforcing payment of said judgment against said real property by means of the execution levied by the defendant William I. Traeger, sheriff, as alleged in paragraph 2 of plaintiff's first cause of action in said complaint."

On January 28, 1930, after the last-mentioned suit had been commenced, Fell transferred the property to plaintiff as her sole and separate property, and this deed was also recorded.

On April 17, 1930, another execution issued upon the same judgment and was levied upon the property. The property was sold thereunder to defendant Robert W. Jones, and a certificate of sale thereof was recorded. On March 26, 1930, the certificate was assigned by said defendant to defendant William H. Jones. Following this the present action was commenced to quiet title and enjoin the issuance of a sheriff's deed to the property.

The complaint alleged that the deed to plaintiff from defendant Robert W. Jones was executed for a valuable consideration, and this was not denied. It was the conclusion of the trial court that defendants had no right or title to the property, and judgment was entered accordingly.

Defendants contend that, notwithstanding Robert W. Jones waived his right to execute his judgment on the property, the plaintiff having conveyed to Fell and having subsequently received a reconveyance, the property became subject to the lien of the judgment and to sale on execution.

[1, 2] As stated, the judgment was entered and the same recorded before the latter deed to plaintiff was executed. Because of the fact that he chooses his own language, a deed is to be interpreted against the grantor, and consequently in favor of the grantee (8 R. C. L., Deeds, p. 1051; Civ. Code, § 1069), and, when different constructions of a provision are equally proper, that is to be taken which is most favorable to the party in whose favor the provision was made (Civ. Code, § 1069). Here the claim against plaintiff was existing when the deed was executed, and arose out of the marital relations of the parties. It may fairly be concluded from the language of the instrument that with respect to this or any other claim so arising against plaintiff said defendant intended to waive all right to enforce it against this piece of property; and the fact that plaintiff conveyed and then received a reconveyance of the same constitutes no valid reason for a different conclusion. Where the language of an instrument is ambiguous and either of two interpretations may reasonably be sustained, that of the trial court will not be disturbed, even though another interpretation may seem equally tenable. Kautz v. Zurich Gen. A. & L. Ins. Co., 212 Cal. 576, 300 P. 34; Slama Tire Protector Co. v. Ritchie, 31 Cal. App. 555, 161 P. 25; Manley v. Pacific Mill & Timber Co., 79 Cal. App. 641, 250 P. 710. Here the conclusion of the trial court is fairly supported by the language of the deed, appears to be in accordance with the intention of the parties, and no valid reason for reversal has been shown.

The judgment is affirmed.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

Defendant, convicted by a jury of the crime of grand theft, appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying a new trial.

The information alleged that he had suffered two prior convictions of felonies for which he had been imprisoned; the first, burglary; the second, violation of section 37, Federal Criminal Code (18 USCA § 88) and National Motor Vehicle Theft Act (18 USCA § 408) which convictions were admitted by the defendant.

Appellant claims that the trial court was guilty of misconduct in questioning defendant during the trial about the felonies of which he had been convicted, the convictions having been admitted by defendant at the time of arraignment; that the court erred in refusing to permit cross-examination of the complaining witness concerning his testimony at the preliminary hearing; that the verdict is contrary to the evidence by reason of the improbability that 'the complaining witness' identification of the defendant was correct. Considering these objections in reverse order, it appears from the record before us that the evidence was clearly sufficient to show that the defendant is the person by whom the crime was committed.

[1] The contention of appellant's counsel that his cross-examination of the complaining witness as to his testimony at the preliminary hearing was unjustifiably curtailed is based upon the court's sustaining an objection to inquiry concerning testimony appearing on page 23 of the preliminary transcript at line 18; the objection being "on the ground that it is immaterial and not being in any wise different from what the witness testified to today." To this the court remarked, "I will have to look at the transcript to determine that objection. May I see the transcript, please? Well, I don't believe that is in any way impeaching; it is practically what he testified to here. The objection is sustained." Just what language appeared in the transcript at the point referred to we do not know, for it is not quoted in appellant's brief, but no exception was taken to the ruling of the court at the time, nor was any offer of proof made, and we must conclude, therefore, that the conclusion of the court that the earlier testimony of this witness, at the page and line indicated, did not contradict his testimony at the trial, was well grounded.

[2] We come now to the claim that the judge who tried this case was guilty of misconduct in questioning the defendant concerning his prior convictions. The record on that matter reads as follows:

Question by Mr. Coleman: "Have you ever previously been convicted of a felony? A. Yes.

"Mr. Coleman: That is all.

"Q. By the Court: What felony have you been convicted of? A. Burglary.

"Q. What other felony? A. Conspiracy to violate the Dyer Act.

"Q. Conspiracy to violate the Dyer Act?
A. Yes, accessory after the fact, or something to that effect."

Appellant argues that these inquiries by the court were improper, as being prohibited by section 1025 of the Penal Code, which in part provides as follows: "In case the defendant pleads not guilty, and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial." However, the cases generally hold that when the defendant has made himself a witness, questions as to the character of the offense may be asked. People v. Eldridge, 147 Cal. 782, 786, 82 P. 442; People v. La Verne, 212 Cal. 29, 297 P. 561; People v. Romer (Cal. Sup.) 23 P.(2d) 749. It does not appear, therefore, that any error arose in this regard.

Having reviewed carefully all the evidence in this case, we see no valid reason why the verdict of the jury should be disturbed.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

5. Schools and school districts ⚡120.

In action for injuries to pupil resulting from teacher's negligence in operation of school bus, it was unnecessary to allege filing of verified claim within 90 days of accrual of cause of action (St. 1931, p. 2476, § 1; Civ. Code, § 1714½; School Code, § 2.801, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2487).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by Edgar Bates, by his guardian ad litem, Gilbert Bates, against the Escondido Union High School District of San Diego County and others. From judgment on the pleadings for the named defendant and for the Grossmont Union High School District of San Diego County, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

A. M. Thompson and Robert B. Burch, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Thomas H. Whelan, Dist. Atty., and Frank T. Dunn, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondents.

Frank J. Macomber, of San Diego, for respondent Grossmont Union High School Dist.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment on the pleadings which was rendered in favor of Escondido Union High School District of San Diego County and the Grossmont Union High School District of San Diego County, both duly organized and existing union high school districts.

[1, 2] In considering whether the judgment is supported by the record, it is only necessary for us to determine whether or not the complaint states a cause of action against the Union High School Districts of Escondido and Grossmont. In order to support such a judgment there must be an entire absence of allegation of some necessary fact or facts. This court cannot consider anything outside of the complaint itself and must disregard any defect that might be reached by a special demurrer. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Thornton, 117 Cal. 481, 49 P. 573.

The complaint alleges the legal existence of the two union high school districts; that appellant was a student in one of them; that John W. Gray was an employee of the Escondido Union High School District and L. T. Simmons of the Grossmont Union High School District; that in August, 1931, the duly authorized officers of the districts arranged an agricultural school tour for some of their students in the agricultural courses; that the Grossmont Union High School District furnished its bus and the districts placed Gray and Simmons in charge of the tour; that appellant was selected for the tour of inspection, which visited at the State Agricultural College at Davis, Cal., and agricultural exhibits at other points in California; that Gray and Simmons alternated in the actual driving of the bus and that all of the students were under their care and control; that Gray and Simmons were acting as employees of the two districts and in the course of their employment; that on August 28, 1931, when the party was returning from the tour, and at a point on a public highway about ten miles north of the city of Paso Robles, Gray, who was operating the bus, drove carelessly, negligently, and without regard for the safety of appellant and the other passengers and at an undue rate of speed on a curve in the highway and into collision with an automobile driven by George Warner, causing the serious injury of appellant. It is alleged that the accident was caused by the concurrent negligence of Gray, Simmons, and Warner. There is no allegation that a verified claim or demand for damages was filed within ninety days from the date of the accident with either of the high school districts.

Respondents state the questions to be decided upon this appeal as follows:

"1. Is an action of the sort outlined in the above-described complaint such as to come under the provisions of section 1 of Act 5150 of Deering's General Laws, 1931, so as to require the filing of a claim with the secretary of the legislative body of the School District within ninety (90) days from the time of the accrual of the cause of action and before the commencement of the action, and

"2. Is there any authority in the law for the planning and carrying out of a joint trip such as this by the School Boards so as to make the teacher handling this trip the authorized agent and employee of the School District, and thereby holding the District liable for any negligent act of these teachers during such trip?

"This latter question may be divided into two branches: (a) Can the Escondido High School District be held chargeable for the negligence of its teacher John W. Gray under the circumstances as outlined above? and (b) can the Grossmont Union High School District be held chargeable for the negligence of John W. Gray, a teacher of the Escondido Union High School District, under circumstances as outlined above?"

Respondents' contention that the filing of a verified claim for damages is a necessary prerequisite to the institution of this action is based on language contained in section 1 of an act of the Legislature approved June 19, 1931 (St. 1931, p. 2476), as follows: "Whenever it is claimed that any person has been injured or any property damaged as a result of the dangerous or defective condition of any public street, highway, building, park, grounds, works or property, and/or the negligence or carelessness of any public officer, a verified claim for damages shall be presented in writing and filed with such officer and the clerk or secretary of the legislative body of the municipality, county, city and county, or school district, as the case may be, within ninety days after such accident has occurred."

[3] In considering the question here presented we should keep before us three acts of the Legislature, each of which waive the immunity of a public agency against suit for damages when such agency is acting in its governmental capacity and is exercising a governmental function. These acts are the act approved June 13, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 675), which we will call the Public Liability Act, section 1714½ of the Civil Code, and section 2.801, article 4, part 2, of the School Code (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2487). A right of action against a public agency, or its officers, performing a governmental function, only arises in those instances where it is authorized by law. Pittam v. City of Riverside (Cal. App.) 16 P.(2d) 768.

The Public Liability Act gives such a right of action: (1) (section 2) Against the public agency for damages to person or property "resulting from the dangerous or defective condition of public * * * property" in cases and under conditions there specified, and (2) (section 1) against the "member of any * * * board of school trustees * * * for the negligent act or omission of any appointee or employee * * * when the member or members of such board making such appointment or employment knew or had notice that the person appointed or employed was inefficient and incompetent. * * *"

Section 1714½ of the Civil Code provides a liability on the part of a school district owning a motor vehicle for damages by reason of death or injury to person or property resulting from the negligent operation of such motor vehicle by its officer, agent, or employee when acting within the scope of his office, agency or employment. This section would seem to restrict actions brought under it to those cases where the injury was caused by a motor vehicle owned by the defendant district and negligently operated by an officer, agent, or employee of the district owning the vehicle and acting within the scope of his office, agency or employment. The phrase "operation of any said motor vehicle" in this section is used "in its popular and ordinary sense as applied to motor vehicles." Chilcote v. San Bernardino County (Cal. Sup.) 23 P. (2d) 748, 749. In the instant case the bus was owned by the Grossmont Union High School District and at the time of the accident was being operated by Gray, who was an employee of the Escondido Union High School District. Of course, it is also alleged that the bus was under the joint control of Gray and Simmons. It is not necessary for us to decide whether a liability on the part of either or both districts would be created by this section under these facts.

Section 2.801 of the School Code (as amended by St. 1931, p. 2487) creates a liability on the part of a school district for injury "to person or property arising because of the negligence of the district, or its officers or employees." In speaking of section 1623 of the Political Code, which was re-enacted with modifications in the School Code, the Supreme Court said: "As amended in 1923 [it] creates a liability on the part of the school districts for damages sustained by a pupil by reason of the negligence of the school district, its officers, or employees." Ahern v. Livermore Union High School District, 208 Cal. 770, 782, 284 P. 1105, 1110. It would seem that the district is liable to a pupil for damages following an injury caused by the ordinary negligence of the district, its officers or employees. Damgaard v. Oakland High School District, 212 Cal. 316, 298 P. 983; Maede v. Oakland High School District, 212 Cal. 419, 298 P. 987; Henry v. Garden Grove Union High School District, 119 Cal. App. 638, 7 P. (2d) 192. Section 1623 of the Political Code was re-enacted in 1929 into sections 2.800 to 2.806, inclusive, of the School Code with an important change in language [St. 1931, p. 2487]. The old section restricted liability to "a pupil." The new section enlarged this to liability for injury "to person or property" without the former limitation. This would seem to extend the liability to all damages to person or property caused by ordinary negligence of the district, its officers or employees, acting within the scope of their office or employment.

[4, 5] We have seen that the act approved June 19, 1931 (St. 1931, p. 2476), requires a verified claim to be filed where injury to person or property results from a "dangerous or defective condition" of certain publicly owned property or where it is caused by the negligence of an officer. This suit is not predicated upon the negligence of an officer of either school district nor could it be as a school teacher is not such an officer. Leymel v. Johnson, 105 Cal. App. 694, 288 P. 858. In so far as the provisions of this act are involved here, it only requires the filing of the verified claim where injury or damage results from a dangerous or defective condition of some form of public property. This parallels the provisions of the Public Liability Act which gives the right of action for damages so caused. It does not by its terms require the filing of any such claim where the injury results from damage caused by negligence to recover which the right to sue is given by section 1714½ of the Civil Code or section 2.801 of the School Code. The complaint does not attempt to bring the cause of action within the terms of the Public Liability Act, but within the provisions of either section 1714½ of the Civil Code or section 2.801 of the School Code. As the act in question does not require the filing of any verified claim for damages before instituting an action under the provisions of those code sections, it was unnecessary to allege the filing of such a claim.

[6] In considering the second contention of respondents we wish to observe that the complaint in this action is far from a model pleading. It is uncertain and leaves much to intendment. However, the uncertainty of a pleading furnishes no ground for support of a judgment on the pleadings. We believe that the allegations of the complaint or the necessary inferences to be drawn from them set forth the following facts: That the two high school districts included agricultural courses in their curricula and that appellant was taking such a course in one of them; that the boards of trustees of the districts planned the tour in question for the instruction of the students taking it; that Gray and Simmons were placed in charge of the tour by the districts; that while Gray was driving the bus at the time of the accident it was under the joint control of both men; that their negligence, concurring with that of Warner, was the proximate cause of the accident. The only question now arising is whether the boards of trustees had any authority in law to authorize the tour.

[7] Respondents urge that we should take judicial notice that both schools were in vacation during August, 1931. We have no knowledge on this subject. We do know that some of the high schools in the state commence their regular fall terms early in August. We hesitate to take judicial notice of a fact concerning which we have no information.

[8] Section 3.805 of the School Code (1929) provides that high schools may give courses in agriculture. Section 3.670 of the same code provides that school boards may maintain vacation schools of high school grade. The two respondent schools were therefore authorized to give instruction in agriculture during either the regular school term or in vacation schools.

Section 1.80 of the School Code (as re-enacted by St. 1931, p. 2579) authorizes school boards to furnish transportation to pupils under the conditions there specified. Section 1.90 of the same code (as re-enacted by St. 1931, p. 2206) provides: "The governing board of any school district may use the school buses of the district to transport pupils attending the schools of the district to and from school athletic contests or other school activities held within or without the district and in which such pupils participate."

[9] We therefore conclude that if the tour was a regularly and legally constituted school activity of the respondent high schools, that a liability would attach for injury "to person or property arising because of the negligence of the * * * employees" of the districts, or against either district because of the negligence of its employee. Section 2.801, School Code. Out of an overabundance of caution we deem it best to state that we are establishing the law of the case only in so far as the sufficiency of the complaint is concerned. The evidence may not support some of the inferences which we have drawn from the allegations.

We suggest that appellant, if he be so advised, be permitted to amend his complaint. Judgment reversed.

FOREST LAWN MEMORIAL PARK ASS'N,
Inc., v. STATE BOARD OF EMBALMERS
AND FUNERAL DIRECTORS et al.
Civ. 4975.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 28, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 26,
1933.

1. Licenses ⇨22.

Petitioner for license as funeral director held to be conducting business at specific street address or location as required by statute, though building was within confines of cemetery (St. 1929, p. 259, § 3, as amended by St. 1931, p. 1737, § 3).

Facts were that the engineering department of city had fixed and assigned to mortuary building a street number, that building was approximately 300 feet from property line of street, and that building, though within confines of cemetery, was a large imposing structure separate and distinct from any other building in group.

2. Evidence ⇨20(1).

It is common knowledge that many mortuaries are set back from property line of street at various distances, and that some are even inclosed by iron or masonry walls.

3. Licenses ⇨20.

As regards right to license as funeral director, it is not necessary, in order to have designated street number, that mortuary building must be abutting on street (St. 1929, p. 259, § 3, as amended by St. 1931, p. 1737, § 3).

4. Licenses ⇨20.

Petitioner held entitled to license as funeral director as against contention that place of business located in cemetery would not be devoted exclusively to care and preparation for burial and transportation of human dead bodies (St. 1929, p. 259, § 3, as amended by St. 1931, p. 1737, § 3).

5. Licenses ⇨20.

Petitioner held entitled to license to conduct business of funeral director as against objection that proposed funeral establishment was situated on land dedicated to cemetery purposes (St. 1931, p. 2434).

6. Licenses ⇨22.

State board of embalmers and funeral directors has no powers other than those granted in statute creating it, and cannot deny license to applicant who has complied with statute for any reason not set forth therein (St. 1929, p. 259, § 3, as amended by St. 1931, p. 1737, § 3).

7. Licenses ⇨22.

As regards granting of license as funeral director against objection that funeral establishment was situated on land dedicated to cemetery purposes, question of what would constitute cemetery purposes is question for judicial body, not board of funeral directors and embalmers (St. 1931, p. 2437, § 2).

8. Constitutional law ⇨230(3).

Licenses ⇨7(1).

Funeral Directors and Embalmers Act held not invalid as denying equal protection (Const. Cal. art. 1, § 21; Const. U. S. Amend. 14; St. 1929, p. 261, § 9, and pp. 259, 260, §§ 3, 7, as amended by St. 1931, pp. 1737, 1739, §§ 3, 6).

Application by Forest Lawn Memorial Park Association, Inc., for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to State Board of Embalmers and Funeral Directors and others to compel the issuance to petitioner of a license to conduct the business of funeral director in California.

Writ granted.

John L. McNab, of San Francisco, Call & Murphey and H. R. Snyder, all of Los Angeles, and Glenn Whitney and Harold Morrison, both of Glendale, for petitioner.

Frank J. Barry and W. L. Pollard, both of Los Angeles, and Albert E. Sheets, of Sacramento, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Petitioner herein, Forest Lawn Memorial Park Association, Inc., a corporation, seeks by this writ of mandate to compel respondents, state board of embalmers and funeral directors, to issue to petitioner a license to conduct the business of funeral director in the state of California, as provided in an act entitled Funeral Directors and Embalmers Act, chapter 140, p. 258, St. 1929 (as amended by St. 1931, p. 1736).

Petitioner was empowered by its articles of incorporation, among other things, to engage in, conduct, and deal generally with and in everything pertaining to the preparation of bodies for burial, including the owning, operation, and management of mortuaries, and to do all things necessary or incidental to the preservation, burial, or cremation of bodies of deceased persons. In accordance with such corporate powers petitioner presented and filed with respondent board, upon an approved form, a written application for a funeral director's license to be issued to Mr. M. Newton Howell, the duly elected, qualified, and acting president of petitioner. Accompanying this petition were the plans of a building then under construction situated in the group of administrative offices of Forest Lawn, and designated 1716 South Glendale avenue, Glendale, Cal. This building has now been completed and is ready for occupancy by petitioner, where it proposes to carry on its business as a funeral directing establishment, and includes a chapel, preparation rooms, and display rooms.

An objection or protest was filed with the state board of embalmers and funeral directors to the granting of this petition, and the matter was set for hearing, and, after a hearing thereon, respondent took the application and the objections thereto under advisement, and in due time the petition was denied, and the matter now comes before us on an application for a writ of mandate.

From the order of the board it appears that the refusal to grant the application was based upon two grounds: First, that petitioner's proposed place of business would not be conducted at a specific street address or location, or devoted exclusively to the care and preparation for burial or transportation of human dead bodies; and secondly, that petitioner's proposed funeral directing establishment was situated upon land dedicated for cemetery purposes as defined in the General Cemetery Act (chapter 1148, p. 2434, St. 1931), and therefore petitioner could not conduct an "established business" thereon, as such term is defined by the Funeral Directors and Embalmers Act.

No objection was found by the board to the applicant's corporate capacity, the qualifications of its president, the character of its officers, directors, or members or the form or substance of its application for a license; neither was objection found with applicant's mortuary establishment.

Petitioner alleges that the action of the respondent in refusing its application was arbitrary and capricious, not in conformity with, or supported by, the facts established at the hearing thereon, is contrary to the provision of the Funeral Directors and Embalmers Act in California, and is in violation of the right of petitioner under said act to conduct and carry on said business and is in excess of its jurisdiction.

[1-3] Respondent found that petitioner's proposed place of business would not be conducted at a specific street address or location as required by the provisions of section 3 of the statute (as amended by St. 1931, p. 1737), which defines a "funeral director" as a person, partnership, corporation, association or other organization engaged in or conducting as an established business, the business of preparing for burial dead human bodies, etc., and then defines an "established business" to mean a place of business conducted at a specific street address or location devoted exclusively to the care and preparation for burial or transportation of human dead bodies, etc.

It is held by the board that this requirement as to a specific street address or location is not fulfilled because the proposed mortuary is located approximately 500 feet from a public thoroughfare on lands controlled by applicant within the confines of a cemetery, and that the place of business is not accessible to the public, as the cemetery is inclosed by a high wall, and the entrance thereto is by gates which are and may be closed to the general public at certain hours of the day or night as applicant may determine, and the claim that the business has a specific street address is not obviated by numbering the building wherein the proposed funeral directing business of applicant is to be conducted as 1716 South Glendale avenue, for the reason that the building is not situated on South Glendale avenue, but approximately 500 feet therefrom. As to these findings of respondent board we do not find support in the record nor in the act itself.

The engineering department of the city of Glendale in the usual course of its duties fixed and assigned to said mortuary building the street number 1716 South Glendale avenue. The record discloses that the building in question is approximately 300 feet from the property line of Glendale avenue, that it is directly opposite the entrance, and the space between the building and the entrance is open, and drives and walks lead directly from the entrance to the mortuary building. This building is a large and imposing structure separate and distinct from any other building in the group, with at least five entrances, all opening on to the driveway directly leading to the entrance.

An inspection record by an employee of the board on file also recites that floodlights were being installed to light the area between the building and Glendale avenue, and the particular section occupied by the mortuary building and the driveway to the entrance thereof is to be separate from the cemetery ground at night, and the entrance gates will remain open twenty-four hours a day. Even if this arrangement were not proposed, we would not be inclined to attach great importance to the fact that the proposed mortuary building was not immediately fronting upon the avenue. It is a matter of common knowledge that many mortuaries are set back from the property line at various distances; that some are even inclosed by iron or masonry walls. The argument of respondent would lead one to assume that even the front doors of a mortuary must remain open and unlocked throughout the twenty-four hours. Neither is it necessary in order to have a designated street number that a building must be abutting upon the street. The purpose of the statute was undoubtedly to prevent the issuance of a blanket license to transact such business of a funeral director, to have said business conducted at a fixed and designated place or establishment where it could be found by officers and inspectors of the board, and where individuals having business to transact could, by the use of ordinary intelligence, find the mortuary. Even conceding, however, that the mortuary has no specific street address, it cannot be claimed that it is not at a specific location; the statute requiring either a specific street address or a specific location. Surely the location is specific, and the business will be carried on at a fixed place or establishment.

[4] Objection is also made by respondent that petitioner's proposed place of business neither is nor will be devoted exclusively to the care and preparation for burial and transportation of human dead bodies.

This construction is based, not upon the fact that within the building or structure itself other businesses will be carried on, but rather that the land upon which the mortuary is located had been dedicated exclusively for a cemetery and cemetery purposes, and therefore it would be impossible to devote the building exclusively for the care of human dead bodies. The error in this reasoning is that the dedication is of the area known as Forest Lawn Memorial Park, while the exclusive feature as required by the act refers to, and is confined to, that much smaller area within the structural walls of the mortuary itself. It is probably true that within the cemetery area are offices where the business of the cemetery association is conducted, and where sales of graves, crypts, urns, flowers, statuary, etc., are dealt in, but all such activities are carried on without the building proposed as a mortuary, and are not of concern to the present issue.

[5-7] A second ground urged for the denial of the application is that the proposed funeral establishment is situated upon land dedicated to cemetery purposes under the General Cemetery Act, and therefore the structure cannot legally be used as a mortuary. We do not believe this objection is justifiable nor is it a matter within the cognizance of respondent and does not furnish a legal reason for denying the application.

It is a well-established rule of law that a board has no powers other than those granted in the statute creating it, and hence cannot deny a license to an applicant who has complied with the statute for any reason not set forth therein. Under our Constitution, the question of what would constitute cemetery purposes vests, not in this board, but is a question that must be determined by a judicial body.

The board of funeral directors and embalmers here is interested only with the mortuary building and its fixed requirements, and is not concerned with the duty of enforcing the Cemetery Act, or has it judicial powers to determine what use may be made of property dedicated for cemetery purposes, nor to deny an application for a mortuary because it is located on land dedicated for cemetery purposes. For the board to assume such responsibilities would necessitate its passing upon title to property, covenants and restrictions in deeds, zones and zoning ordinances, contracts and defeasances, and other questions too numerous to conjecture. Such an inquiry would be unwarranted and an exercise of a judicial function not granted by law.

Petitioner argues with considerable force that the establishment of a mortuary in a cemetery is not only consistent with the purposes for which the land was dedicated, but is expressly authorized by the Cemetery Act itself.

Under the provisions of section 2 of the General Cemetery Act of 1931, cemetery business and cemetery purposes "shall mean any and all business and purposes requisite or necessary for or incident to the establishing, maintaining, managing, operating, improving and conducting a cemetery and the interring of the human dead, and the care, preservation and embellishment of cemetery property."

Petitioner reads the section as follows: "Cemetery business" * * * shall mean any and all business and purposes * * * incident to the * * * conducting a cemetery and the interring of the human dead. * * *

While we are not prepared to follow counsel to the full limit of his contention, it does appear a judicial question of importance is raised, and, were it necessary for the determination of the issues here presented, that question would receive serious consideration.

We believe the location and arrangement of the mortuary in question fully complies with the statute, has both a specific street address and a specific location, and, as far as appears from the record, will be used exclusively for the care and burial or transportation of the human dead.

[8] Petitioner also questions the constitutionality of the entire Funeral Directors and Embalmers Act as being violative of section 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution, and denies to petitioner the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Under the provisions of section 9 of the statute, every funeral director engaged in or conducting business as a funeral director at a fixed place or establishment on the effective date of the act, who should register on or before September 1, 1929 (the act becoming a law August 14, 1929), became entitled to receive, and did receive, a license regardless of the location of his or its place of business, and regardless of whether it was devoted exclusively to the purposes specified in section 3 of the act, whereas by the provisions of sections 3 and 7 thereof (as amended by St. 1931, pp. 1737, 1739, §§ 3, 6), before petitioner can engage in the same business as those under section 9 or obtain a license as funeral director, it must conform strictly to the requirements of those sections, and, in addition, must have as its president or corresponding officer a licensed embalmer.

This contention has been similarly urged on other occasions, and the contention has been rejected. Without reviewing in detail the particular cases, reference is hereby made to Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 P. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13, where the court, in passing upon the constitutionality of the Dental Law, held such a provision was not unconstitutional as conferring special privileges and immunities upon certain practitioners, upon the theory probably that the fact they had been engaged in the practice of this calling within the state was sufficient evidence of their proficiency in their profession or business. A somewhat similar question has been decided in regard to the exercise of the police power in regulation of business under the Zoning Law. In Jones v. City of Los Angeles, 211 Cal. 308, 295 P. 14, 18, this question is discussed in some detail as follows:

"In response to the charge that exemption of existing nonconforming uses would be discriminatory, the courts have very generally held the exemption to be valid and necessary. * * * As the court said in City of Aurora v. Burns, 319 Ill. 84, 149 N. E. 784, 788: 'The building zone ordinance * * * permits lawful uses of buildings at the time of the passage of the ordinance, although not in conformity with its provisions, to continue thereafter. This exception is made so that the ordinance shall not have a retroactive operation. It would be manifestly unjust to deprive the owner of property of the use to which it was lawfully devoted when the ordinance became effective.' In Spector v. Building Inspector, 250 Mass. 63, 145 N. E. 265, 268, the same conclusion is reached: 'To exempt buildings already devoted to a use from a prohibition of such use of other buildings or buildings thereafter erected in a specified area is not unequal but lawful.' This court has also spoken to the same effect in Zahn v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 497, where it is said on page 512, 234 P. 388, 394: 'As to the objection that the ordinance was not retrospective, but permitted the continuance of existing uses, it will suffice to say that for the purpose of zoning it is not necessary that existing uses shall be removed. * * *' See, also, A. C. Blumenthal & Co., Inc., v. Cryer, 71 Cal. App. 668, 236 P. 216."

There can be no question but what the provisions in the act now under consideration applied to all alike and are valid exercises of police power.

Petitioner also contends that it has heretofore changed its original dedication of certain property lying within the original confines of Forest Lawn Memorial Park by eliminating from the area dedicated to burial purposes the lands upon which the mortuary is erected, but the conclusions we have reached on other points make it unnecessary to pass upon this, as well as certain other points urged by petitioner in its brief.

We believe enough has been said, however, to make clear the views of this court on the material issues presented, and, for the reasons given, respondent board is hereby directed to grant and issue to petitioner a funeral director's license as prayed for in its petition.

BEEKS v. W. ROSS CAMPBELL CO.

Civ. 4633.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 17, 1933.

Customs and usages §15(1).

Evidence of custom in real estate office, whereby salesman could obtain assistance of executive of employer in closing deal, held admissible as showing subsequent oral supplement to salesman's written contract with employer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by Herbert S. Beeks against the W. Ross Campbell Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Roy V. Rhodes, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chandler, Wright & Ward, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KING, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action by a real estate salesman against his broker employer for one-half of the commission paid the employer on the sale of real property. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

The defendant W. Ross Campbell Company is a large concern engaged in handling real estate in Los Angeles, employing some thirty-five or forty salesmen. Plaintiff was one of these salesmen, employed under a written contract originally dated December 4, 1922, and reciting that his remuneration shall consist entirely of commissions, and that on sales "personally closed by Beeks" after certain deductions he "shall receive fifty per cent of the gross commissions, the balance to go to W. Ross Campbell Company."

The defendant had for sale what is referred to as the "Stith Property" situate on South Hope street in Los Angeles.

This property was sold for $264,000, a deposit of $5,000, represented by a check of Lee A. Phillips being received by Mr. McCourt, vice president of the defendant corporation, dated August 17, 1925. The "Sales Deposit Receipt" was dated August 19, 1925, G. M. Anderson being named as the purchaser. Later the deed was executed to G. M. Anderson, who was secretary for Lee A. Phillips. She eventually conveyed to Pioneer Securities Company, a corporation controlled by and used for Phillips.

The W. Ross Campbell Company had a custom whereby a salesman endeavoring to make a sale would obtain the assistance of an executive of the company in closing a deal, and in such a case the salesman still was entitled to the commission. Plaintiff claims that this was such a case, and that he consulted Mr. McCourt in regard to contacting Mr. Phillips; that McCourt, as a result of this consultation, phoned to the office of Mr. Phillips and made an appointment and told Beeks that he had the appointment, but preferred to talk to Mr. Phillips along general lines first, and would make an appointment for Beeks to see Phillips the following day; that later that day Mr. McCourt told Beeks that he had put the property up to Mr. Phillips, but that Phillips was not interested, and that he, McCourt, had interested a woman in the property; that at a sales meeting of the W. Ross Campbell Company on August 19th (his consultation with McCourt having been on August 17th), Mr. McCourt announced to the sales organization that the property had been sold. Beeks asked to whom the sale was made and McCourt told him it was sold to a woman. This woman to whom the conveyance was made was G. M. Anderson, a secretary of Mr. Phillips.

Plaintiff had judgment in the lower court, and defendant appeals.

Appellant makes seven points:

First, that the action is based on a written contract which is clear and unambiguous in its terms, and parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms thereof, especially in the absence of appropriate pleading.

The other six "points" respectively attack findings I, III, IV, V, VI, and VII, alleging that said findings respectively are "not supported by the evidence and is not responsive to the issues joined by the pleadings."

The first count of the complaint is for the reasonable value of services, but upon this no evidence was offered. The second count is for money had and received, and the third pleads the employment of plaintiff by defendant; that plaintiff was to receive half the commission received by defendant upon a sale of any property made by defendant by or through the efforts of plaintiff; that plaintiff should have the exclusive right to the half of a commission "on any sale made to any purchaser listed by plaintiff with defendant as one of plaintiff's prospects, provided that no other salesman of defendant had, within fifteen days prior to such listing, listed the same prospect for the purchase or sale of the same property." It is then alleged that the Stith property had been listed by its owner with defendant; that plaintiff had collected the data necessary regarding the property and determined to try to sell it to Lee A. Phillips, and on August 13, 1925, plaintiff listed Phillips as a prospective purchaser; that on this last-mentioned date plaintiff tried to contact Phillips, calling at Phillips' office; that on August 17th, plaintiff reported to Robert L. McCourt his inability to contact Phillips and asked McCourt's co-operation in meeting Phillips and making the sale; that McCourt agreed to do this, interviewed Phillips, and made an agreement of sale for the Stith property; that McCourt reported to plaintiff that Phillips was not interested in the property and that McCourt had sold it to a woman; on plaintiff's demanding half the commission defendant refused.

Defendant strenuously objects to any evidence of a custom or practice in the office of defendant such as before stated, but the court received the evidence and found that such a custom existed and was practiced in the office of the defendant.

As to the first "point" raised by appellant, it appears to us that under the pleadings the evidence of the custom of defendant's office was admissible as showing a subsequent oral supplement to the original written contract and the making of new promises and arrangements added to the written contract. In such view of the case, it follows that the point is not well taken.

The six other points or objections are objections to the findings of the court, and in view of our holding that this evidence of the custom and practice in the office of the defendant was properly admitted, the holding must be that the findings have ample support in the evidence, and are responsive to the issues joined by the pleadings.

Plaintiff is fairly entitled to the judgment as rendered by the trial court. The judgment is affirmed.

OSBORNE et ux. v. WINTER.

Civ. 8575.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 11, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 9, 1933.

1. Negligence ⇨108(1).

Complaint held to state cause of action under statute authorizing treble damages for negligently setting fire or suffering such fire to spread, as against contention that complaint did not state more than common-law cause of action (Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344).

The first cause of action stated in the complaint alleged the setting of a fire, the second allowing the same to escape, and the third and fourth alleged violations of municipal ordinances.

2. Negligence ⇨21.

Under statute respecting persons who "suffer" any fire to extend beyond their lands, "suffer" means to allow, admit, or permit, implies approval of or acquiescence in act, and denotes knowledge and intention (Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Suffer," see Words & Phrases.]

3. Negligence ⇨21.

Degree of care corresponding to danger of starting fire without compliance with law is required, and due care requires circumspection.

4. Negligence ⇨21.

Legal basis for action for starting or spreading fire does not imply demand for proof of more than mere disregard of due care, and does not arise solely under provisions of Forestry Act (Civ. Code, § 3346a).

5. Damages ⇨208(1).

Under evidence, it was for court to determine whether case for starting and permitting spread of fire warranted recovery of treble damages (Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344).

6. Damages ⇨227.

Proof of negligence alone may warrant imposition of treble damages for starting and permitting spread of fire (Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344).

7. Negligence ⇨21.

Burning of grass, weeds, and rubbish other than in "woods" is within scope of statute prohibiting negligent setting of fire or suffering it to spread (Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344).

8. Municipal corporations ⇨122(1).

In pleading municipal ordinance or right derived therefrom, it is sufficient to refer to such ordinance by title and day of passage (Code Civ. Proc. § 459).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James H. Pope, Judge.

Action for damages for negligence in permitting the spread of fire brought by Ernst R. Osborne and wife against Henry Winter, sometimes known as Henry Winters. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. C. Schaefer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Justice.

Certain property of the respondents having been destroyed by fire communicated to their premises from that of the appellant, an action for damages based upon alleged negligence and the violation of a county ordinance by the latter was commenced. Judgment having been rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendant appealed from the same, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Following the reception of evidence the trial court rendered findings and a judgment in treble the amount of damages found to have been sustained by the plaintiffs from a conflagration which had destroyed their premises after crossing the party line from an adjoining lot of the defendant. The sufficiency of the complaint to state more than a common-law cause of action, and of the evidence to support said judgment, are challenged upon appeal. By four separate causes of action the plaintiffs alleged: (1) That the defendant intentionally kindled a fire on his own land and so negligently watched and attended the same that it extended upon that of the plaintiffs, and wholly consumed their dwelling and its contents; (2) that the defendant intentionally kindled a fire on his own land, that he had charge thereof, and that he negligently and without proper precaution allowed the same to escape from his control and to spread, as a result of which it came upon the plaintiffs' premises and destroyed said dwelling and personal property; (3) that the defendant lighted a fire and used the same to burn brush and grass upon land within 500 feet of brush and grass-covered land containing inflammable material, without first having obtained a permit from the state or county fire warden, and less than 40 feet therefrom, in violation of a certain ordinance of the county, by reason of which the same came upon the plaintiffs' premises and destroyed valuable property; (4) that the defendant allowed a fire built out of doors to spread into and upon the plaintiffs' real property and to consume and destroy said dwelling and contents, contrary to the provisions of an ordinance of said county. In each such instance, the ordinance relied upon was alleged only by title and date of enactment. In brief, the first cause of action alleged the setting of a fire, the second allowing the same to escape, and the third and fourth alleged violations of municipal ordinances. As to the first two it was provided by statute: "Damages for Firing Woods. Every person negligently setting fire to his own woods, or negligently suffering any fire to extend beyond his own land, is liable in treble damages to the party injured." Civ. Code, § 3346a; Pol. Code, § 3344.

[2-7] The appellant strenuously denied any knowledge as to the origin of the brush fire, and there was no direct testimony of any eyewitness as to its origin or cause. It is contended that the complaint did not state a cause of action with the intent of the statute as it then existed, and that the evidence was not sufficient to establish a charge that the appellant intentionally or negligently caused or permitted the same to be communicated to the lands of the respondents, nor that he "suffered" any fire to extend beyond his own land." One of the meanings of the term "suffer to occur" is to allow, to admit, or to permit. Gregory v. Marks, 10 Fed. Cas. 1194, No. 5,802; Adams v. Nichols, 1 Aikens (Vt.) 316; City of Ft. Wayne v. De Witt, 47 Ind. 391; Dunseath v. Pittsburg, A. & M. T. Co., 161 Pa. 124, 28 A. 1021. It implies an approval of or acquiescence in an act, and more than nonresistance. Purinton v. Jamrock, 195 Mass. 187, 80 N. E. 802, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 926. And denotes knowledge and intention. Bunnell v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 99 S. W. 237. Since the defining of the term as above, section 1113 of our Civil Code, which declares that a grant insures among other things that an estate is at the time of conveyance free from incumbrances done, made or suffered by the grantor, has been construed. Crist v. Fife, 41 Cal. App. 509, 183 P. 197. As there said: "Suffered," as used in the statute, implies reasonable control, and it cannot be held to apply to an incumbrance not caused by the act of the party nor within his power to prevent." And in Block v. Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, 57 Cal. App. 518, 207 P. 510, it was held that condemnation proceedings could not be said to constitute an incumbrance "made, done, or suffered by the vendor." That "suffer," in this connection, implies responsible control; and it cannot be held to apply to a thing not caused by the act of the party nor within his power to prevent. Crist v. Fife, supra; Smith v. Eigerman, 5 Ind. App. 269, 31 N. E. 862, 51 Am. St. Rep. 281. It appeared that the defendant was alone, and was raking dead grass from his premises to a roadway; one Wood had delivered a load of stones to said property, and upon his return with a second load a fire was burning in front of the defendant's house, between 25 and 30 feet from the plaintiffs' property; Winter attempted to extinguish it with his rake when it began to spread, but there was no hose nor water on the premises, and water was obtained from the premises of the plaintiffs. Wood inquired if he was gathering the grass to haul the same away, the defendant replying, "Maybe—probably." He stated that the fire had gotten away from him, and when asked by Wood if he raked it together to destroy it, he said that "that did not matter." When examined by the trial judge, the defendant was asked where the first flame was, to which he replied:

"Right in front, where I stood with my rake, where it is marked 'A' there.

"Q. Was it right by you? A. Yes.

"Q. How far away from you in feet was the first flame you saw? A. Why, it was all about the same as between you and me.

"Q. Three or four feet? A. Yes; or two feet."

Previously he had sworn that it started underneath his house, that it started in a nearby ravine, and that he did not know where it started. Further quotation from the record is unnecessary to indicate the conflicting evidence upon which the trial court based its conclusion that the defendant had intentionally put in motion the element of cause. It was not contended that he had first obtained a permit therefor as required, and it plainly was shown by other evidence that the fire had started "right where he was raking," and that there was "plenty of wind." A degree of care corresponding to the danger both as to time and place of starting a fire without compliance with the law, is required in such a case, and due care requires circumspection. Galvin v. Gualala Mill Co., 93 Cal. 263, 33 P. 93; McVay v. Central Cal. Investment Co., 6 Cal. App. 184, 91 P. 745. The contention that the legal basis for such an action implies a demand for proof of more than the mere disregard of due care, and that it arises solely under the provisions of the Forestry Act, is untenable. Paiva v. California Door Co., 75 Cal. App. 323, 242 P. 887; Kennedy v. Minarets & W. R. Co., 90 Cal. App. 563, 266 P. 353; Whalen v. Yank, 94 Cal. App. 157, 270 P. 729. It lay with the trial court to determine whether the case warranted a recovery of treble damages under said sections, or of actual damages under general provisions of law. Whalen v. Yank, supra. The proof of negligence alone may warrant the imposition of treble damages. And such burning of grass, weeds and rubbish other than in "woods" as argued by the appellant has been recognized as within the scope of said sections. Paiva v. California Door Co., supra.

[8] The remaining counts or causes of action alleged the acts recited contrary to a certain ordinance entitled, "An Ordinance regulating the use of fire by any and all persons in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, passed July 1st, 1925, and as amended by an ordinance of said county of Los Angeles entitled, 'An ordinance amending sections I, II and V of Ordinance No. 1315, New Series,' passed March 30, 1927," etc. In pleading a municipal ordinance or a right derived therefrom, it is sufficient to refer to such ordinance by its title and by the day of its passage. Code Civ. Proc., § 459. It must be said of the appellants' contention in this respect that the complaint was sufficiently complete. However, it may not be assumed that the trial court was otherwise in doubt as to the provisions of the ordinances mentioned and so pleaded, since they were introduced in evidence as a whole.

Prejudicial error not appearing, the judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed, for the reason that such right in section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure was repealed in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 209).

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 20, 1933.

1. Licenses ⇨39.

Sale of certificates of beneficial interest in oil leases impliedly represents issuance of statutory permit; hence purchaser, unaware of falsity of representation or of facts imposing duty of inquiry, may sue for appropriate relief.

This is true, even though vendors of such certificates have acted in good faith in reliance on opinion of Commissioner of Corporations that no permit authorizing sale of such certificates is necessary.

2. Limitation of actions ⇨96(2), 100(6).

Action for money paid for certificates, issued without permit, of beneficial interest in oil leases held not barred where brought within three years after purchasers discovered fraud or mistake (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4).

3. Licenses ⇨39.

CONREY, Presiding Justice.

This action was commenced by complaint filed May 10, 1929. It was tried upon the amended complaint filed August 29, 1929, and the answers thereto. The action is brought by the plaintiff as trustee for Ralph R. Martin, Albert H. Bailey, and C. P. Wiand (assignee of E. D. Lindley) to recover moneys paid by the plaintiff trustee's said beneficiaries to R. G. Welch as agent for the other defendants and for the Long Beach National Bank, in consideration of the issuance by said bank to said purchasers, of certain certificates of beneficial interest in three oil leases which had been assigned to the bank as trustee by the lessees, who were Dallas, Boland, McKie, and R. G. Welch. In the certificates the trust was described as "Three For One Oil Royalties." The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

As found by the court, the Martin purchase was made on February 10, 1923; the Bailey purchase on March 1, 1923; and the Lindley purchase on April 12, 1923. It thus appears that this action was not commenced until a date more than six years subsequent to the time of the said purchases; the same being the times when the moneys were paid therefor. The court decided that the statute of limitations had run against each and all of the alleged causes of action prior to the date of commencement of the action.

As the record on appeal consists of the clerk's transcript and reporter's transcript, we have no specifications of error other than those set forth in the brief of appellant. In the specifications there found, we find no objection to the first three findings of fact, and therefore we may assume without question that those findings are sustained by the evidence. The first of these findings is: "That the Three For One Oil Royalties was a common-law trust and was known to be such by the plaintiffs Ralph R. Martin, Albert H. Bailey and E. D. Lindley at the time each of them purchased his certificate of beneficial interest therein, and each of them knew at that time that he was buying a beneficial interest or unit in the proceeds and avails arising and growing out of said trust." The second finding states the dates of the several purchases of certificates. The third finding is as follows: "That at the time each of said plaintiffs purchased his said certificate, neither the said Three For One Oil Royalties, nor the trustee, nor any one of these defendants, nor any one acting for or in behalf of them, or either of them, had obtained from the Commissioner of Corporations of the state of California a permit authorizing the sale of said certificates, and that because of the failure to so obtain such permit the certificates issued to plaintiffs Ralph R. Martin, Albert H. Bailey and E. D. Lindley respectively were void and invalid." And it is conceded, without any contention to the contrary, that no permit had been obtained, and that for that reason the certificates were void. In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593.

We have no doubt that this action is barred by limitation, unless the facts bring it within the terms of the exception stated in section 338, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure. According to that section, the period prescribed is three years, for "an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake. The cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." In this case there is persuasive evidence that the purchasers did not discover such facts until a time less than three years before the complaint was filed, although the court made no finding on this point. It does not appear that the vendors of the certificates made any statement to the purchasers that a permit had been issued by the commissioner. In fact, the vendors had been advised by the commissioner, in accordance with the opinion held by him at that time, that such certificates might be issued lawfully without obtaining any "permit" from the Commissioner of Corporations. But appellant contends that even upon the basis of these facts, the sale of the certificates was fraudulent.

In Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, 82 Cal. App. 109, 255 P. 225, 227, the plaintiff was the purchaser of a certificate of stock in an unincorporated association. It was held by the court that the fact that the sale had been made in good faith, and in reliance upon a statement made by the Commissioner of Corporations that no permit was necessary, was not a defense to an action brought by the purchaser as an action to recover damages arising out of fraud and deceit of the defendant in issuing the certificates of stock. The court declared that in such case the defendants are legally responsible for their acts, even though those acts were done through mistake and without any fraudulent intent. This was so, because the sale carried with it an implied representation that the certificate was genuine, and since the certificate was void, the purchase was made "on what in law amounted to a false representation." In that case, however, the action was brought within two years from the date of the transaction. No question of limitation of time was there presented, and there is nothing to indicate that the court was considering or attempting to determine the point of time when the right of action accrued to the plaintiff.

[1, 2] In the case at bar it was not found, and apparently it is not true, that there was any false representation actually made, or any concealment of the facts, or that there was any confidential relation between the parties. By reason of a mistake of law, honestly lodged in the minds of the vendors, they sold and issued these certificates, which by reason of the terms of the statute were void. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the sale of the certificates, and their issuance, constituted a representation that the bank was authorized to issue the certificates. This necessarily included an implied representation that the Commissioner of Corporations had issued a permit for the issuance of such certificates. In accordance with decisions directly in point, it follows that in such case an innocent purchaser, unaware of the fact that the representation was false, and without knowledge of facts which would impose the duty of inquiry, may sue for the appropriate relief. Further, with reference to section 338, subd. 4, Code of Civil Procedure: "It appears to be settled in this state that, if fraud enters into a cause of action, the latter clause of this subdivision will apply and the cause of action will not be deemed to have accrued until the facts are discovered, regardless of the form or character of the action." Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane, 161 Cal. 689, 702, 120 P. 771, 777, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1093. In MacDonald v. Reich & Lievre, Inc., 100 Cal. App. 736, 281 P. 106, where the facts were very much like those of the case at bar, the same rule, and for the same reason, was approved. We conclude that the causes of action herein were not barred by limitation of time.

[3] It is contended by respondents that the Long Beach National Bank, being a banking corporation organized under the laws of the United States, was not subject to regulation by state laws, and that all national banking associations are specifically excepted from the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act of California by the terms of subdivision 3 of section 2 of that act. It is true that said section of the Corporate Securities Act, at the time when the certificates in question here were issued, excepted from its definition of the word "company," "all national banking associations and other corporations organized and existing under and by virtue of the acts of the congress of the United States." Stats. 1917, p. 673. The decisions cited by respondents as bearing upon this question apparently are confined to cases relating to stocks or securities of national banks, or rights of depositors, or other direct obligations, all of which are held to be free from state legislative interference. We have not been directed to any decisions which hold that when a national bank undertakes to assume the responsibilities of a trust, it does not thereby subject itself to state laws governing the subject-matter of the trust. Probably it was in recognition of the need of a better definition that the exception found in section 2 of the Corporate Securities Act with respect to national banks has been amended to read as follows: "Any security issued by and representing an interest in or a direct obligation of a national bank," etc. Corporate Securities Act, § 2 (b), subd. 3, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1931 Ed., Act 3814, p. 1927. We think that the contention of respondents that in the instant case the trustee, before issuing said "certificates of beneficial interest," was not obligated to procure a permit therefor, is without merit.

Since, in our opinion, the judgment should be reversed, and since in the event of a new trial the record may be different in some respects from the present record, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the various other questions presented in the briefs of counsel.

The judgment is reversed.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action on a surety bond.

On September 29, 1930, the state of California, acting through the department of public works, awarded to H. H. Boomer a contract to grade and construct a certain road in Trinity county. The contract covered several parcels. After the award was made, Mr. Boomer, as principal, and the Ætna Casualty & Surety Company, as surety, executed in due form the bond required by the provisions of the statute. Chapter 321, p. 538, Stats. 1925. At about the same time Mr. Boomer employed Bruce Markle as subcontractor to do the excavating on one parcel. About October 31, 1930, Mr. Markle had in place on the job a power shovel and commenced to execute the contract. That power shovel was owned by the plaintiff and was turned over to Mr. Markle under a written lease. Before the award was made to Mr. Boomer, in expectation of the business, Mr. Markle had entered into oral negotiations for the rental of the shovel, and, after the award was made, the written lease was executed October 14, 1930. Before employing Mr. Markle, Mr. Boomer had a conversation with him regarding his equipment, finances, and ability to execute the contract if a subcontract was awarded to him. Mr. Markle stated that he had a shovel and two trucks. In reply to Mr. Boomer's question, he stated that he was the owner of the shovel, but that it was not wholly paid for. Mr. Boomer made no inquiry as to who was Mr. Markle's creditor or the amount of the indebtedness. By its terms the lease covered a term of six months, and the rental provided was $600 per month to commence from the time the machine was loaded and to continue until the machine was returned to lessor's place of business. The rent was payable on the 10th day of each calendar month, but the plaintiff consented in a letter of even date that the first month's rent might be postponed for thirty days. When the first rent became payable, the plaintiff rendered its bill therefor to Mr. Markle and monthly thereafter. The excavation under the main contract was completed by the end of December or the first part of January. Some extra work was ordered by the state officials which Mr. Boomer turned over to the subcontractor, and the extra work was done by him. All work was completed in February, 1931. A stop notice in due form was served by the plaintiff on March 6, 1931. In that notice the plaintiff claimed rental at $500 per month for four and one-half months in the total sum of $2,250. Thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action. The defendants answered separately. The action was tried before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment thereon the defendants have appealed.

[1, 2] It is contended that the plaintiff is estopped. That claim is based on two theories. The first theory is as follows: The defendants assert that, when Mr. Markle negotiated for his contract, he told Mr. Boomer that he owned the shovel, but it was not wholly paid for; and that his creditor would not make any claim against Mr. Boomer. The defendants also state that Mr. Markle had a sign attached to the cab on the shovel, and that the sign had printed thereon in large letters words indicating that it belonged to Mr. Markle; that the plaintiff knew all of these facts, but took no steps to inform the defendant Boomer of its claim of ownership. In reply, the plaintiff cites passages from the record showing that there was a conflict in the evidence as to what statements were made by Mr. Markle, and that there was evidence to the effect that the plaintiff was not informed that Mr. Markle had made the statements charged to him or that Mr. Markle had attached to the shovel the sign above mentioned. The second theory presented by the defendants is based on the provisions of section 3543 of the Civil Code, which provides: "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." This theory was not presented during the trial, and is advanced for the first time in this court. In making this contention, the defendants assert that the plaintiff was negligent because it did not, on Mr. Markle's first default in payment of his rent, notify Mr. Boomer. The plaintiff replies that the second theory is not applicable to the facts of this case because it must be assumed from the verdict returned by the jury that it made the implied finding that the plaintiff was not negligent. That is true. Furthermore, it is perfectly clear that under the authorities there can be no doubt but that Mr. Markle could have been required by Mr. Boomer to execute to him the bond provided for in chapter 321 of the Statutes of 1925, and that Mr. Boomer was negligent in not making the request. It follows that under the facts it may not be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff was estopped. The defendants cite and rely on MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 95, 170 P. 616, and Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267. An examination will disclose that neither case is pertinent to the facts before us.

[3] It is earnestly contended that the verdict was excessive. The defendants concede that the evidence was conflicting as to the value of the shovel, and that there was evidence to the effect that the value per month was as much as $500. However, they earnestly contend that the shovel started to work on November 4, 1930, and it continued to work until December 23, 1930, when the work stopped for the holidays. It is then asserted that the work again started on December 26, and was finished on January 3, 1931. While it is true that such evidence was given, there was evidence that the rental value was as high as $600 per month. There was also evidence that the work commenced October 27, 1930, and continued until February 27, 1931. Again, there was evidence that, working in certain formations, the shovel would excavate only about fifty yards per day, and that it would have taken one hundred and sixty days, or nearly five months. In other words, there was evidence to the effect that the use of the shovel for a period of five months was reasonably necessary, and, at $600 per month, the damage proved amounted to $3,000. The verdict of the jury was for the sum of $2,250. Applying the rule stated in Burr v. Gardella, 53 Cal. App. 377, 396, 397, 200 P. 493, the verdict was not excessive. It is also claimed that some of the work was extra work.

Whether all of the work was done under Mr. Markle's first contract, or whether some was extra work, all of it was done by him for Mr. Boomer under the latter's contract with the state.

[4] The defendants complain because the trial court modified an instruction which they requested. The instruction purported to define the rule for ascertaining damages. The closing part of the instruction was: " * * * And their only right of action is one made under good faith for the use of said machinery only, and the value of this use must be a reasonable value as determined by the time it actually worked on said job, and the reasonable value for such time as may be determined by you regardless of the amount of rental mentioned in the lease agreement between plaintiff and defendant Markle." The modification consisted in striking out the words which we have emphasized. We think the trial court did not err in striking them out. Whether the shovel stood idle on Sundays, holidays, and stormy weather was immaterial to the issue on trial. Williamson v. Egan, 209 Cal. 343, 349, 287 P. 503.

[5] The defendants offered evidence which the trial court refused to receive to the effect that Mr. Markle was the reputed owner of the shovel. The evidence was properly rejected. Ownership was involved, but reputed ownership was immaterial.

[6] The defendants requested an instruction regarding the law of estoppel. It was refused, and they assert the refusal was error. We think they are mistaken. The law on that subject as applicable to the case on trial was fully covered by other instructions.

[7] After the trial court had instructed the jury, one of the jurors stated that he would like to hear a restatement of the law of estoppel. Thereupon the court re-read the instructions on estoppel. In doing so, a paragraph regarding reasonable value was also read. The defendants complain that the effect of reading the latter paragraph was to emphasize the case for the plaintiff as against the defendants. It will suffice to state that the record discloses nothing tending to show that the trial court in any manner expressed its opinion on the facts. It confined its attention solely to reading again instructions that had already been read.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Appeal from a judgment denying appellant's petition for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel respondent justice's court and the justice of the peace thereof to issue a writ of execution to enforce a judgment of said court more than five years after the entry thereof.

Appellant contends that section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, permitting a judgment to be enforced after the lapse of five years, applies to all judgments, including those of a justice's court.

The case of White v. Clark, 8 Cal. 512, decided in 1857, arose under the Practice Act, section 214 of which, so far as material here, provided that "after a lapse of five years from the entry of judgment, an execution shall be issued only by leave of court, on motion." In that case an execution was issued in a justice's court more than five years after its entry. The Supreme Court held that section 214 referred "only to executions issued by the clerk of a Court of record having a seal, and not to executions issued by justices of the peace," and, the execution therein having been issued without authority, that "the sheriff was not justified in enforcing it." Then, as now with our Code of Civil Procedure, a separate chapter of the Practice Act dealt with the subject of judgments and executions in the justices' courts. In 1866 such section was amended to read: "In all cases other than for the recovery of money, the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion. * * *" Stats. 1865-66, p. 704. The amendment limited the application of the section to judgments other than those for the recovery of money. In 1872 such section became section 685 of our Code of Civil Procedure, and was amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 38), so far as material here, by striking out the words "other than for the recovery of money," making it applicable to all judgments, as before the first amendment.

Appellant urges that by the use of the words "in all cases," in the amendment after the case of White v. Clark, supra, the Legislature intended to broaden the section to apply to cases arising in justices' courts. The history of the section, however, shows that the amendment by which such words were introduced into its provisions actually narrowed its application, and did not change in any way, in our opinion, the situation which led the Supreme Court to rule that it did not apply to justices' courts. The section still appeared in connection with the subject-matter of executions in superior courts, and when the exceptions applying to money judgments were stricken by amendment it left the section applying to all judgments, as it had originally, and it still came within the rule of White v. Clark. While we are of the opinion that there is nothing in section 925, Code of Civil Procedure, which would prevent the application of section 685 to judgments of the justices' courts, even though no special provision makes it applicable, still we believe we are bound by the decision of the case above cited.

Judgment affirmed.

FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN

Civ. 9243.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 30, 1933.

Habeas corpus ⇨48.

San Francisco superior court is not required to entertain habeas corpus proceeding where prisoner at time of filing petition was in custody of state prison at Folsom (Const. art. 6, § 5).

Application by George Zeigler, in propria persona, for mandate prayed to be directed to the superior court, city and county of San Francisco, to compel the judge to hear and determine petition for writ of habeas corpus claimed to have been filed therein.

Writ denied.

George Zeigler, in pro. per.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Petitioner, a prisoner in the state prison at Folsom, has made application in propria persona to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to hear and determine a petition for a writ of habeas corpus which he claims was heretofore filed by him in said court. It appears from the present application, however, that, at the time petitioner claims to have instituted said habeas corpus proceeding in the city and county of San Francisco, he was imprisoned in the state prison at Folsom, Sacramento county; and the Constitution provides that superior courts have jurisdiction to issue writs of habeas corpus on behalf of any person in actual custody, "in their respective counties." Article 6, § 5, Const. of Calif. It is evident, therefore, that there was no legal duty imposed upon the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to entertain said proceeding; and upon that ground the application for a writ of mandate is denied.

7. Mechanics' liens ⇨304(1).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Benjamin C. Jones, Judge.

Action by Sam Shelley, doing business under the name and style of the Sam Shelley Pipe Supply House, against Casa De Oro, Limited, a corporation, the Malesa Development Company, and another. Affirmed.

Sanders & Jacques, of San Diego, for appellant.

Hamilton, Lindley & Higgins, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

In this action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff entered into a written contract with Casa De Oro, Limited, for the installation of a sprinkling system on certain described land. Malesa Development Company and a third corporation were joined as defendants, it being alleged that all three defendants were the owners of the land. An attorney entered an appearance for "the defendants," and later the action was dismissed as to the third corporation. After a trial, the court entered a judgment on May 21, 1932, denying the claim of a mechanic's lien on the ground that notice had been filed too late, but giving a personal judgment for the amount claimed against the two remaining defendants.

On June 22, 1932, the Malesa Development Company gave notice of a motion to vacate and set aside this judgment upon the ground that no summons had been served upon it, that no appearance had been made by it or by any one authorized by it to appear, and that the purported appearance by the attorney referred to was entirely without its authorization and without its knowledge or consent. After a hearing upon the records and files in the action and upon certain affidavits, the court granted the motion and vacated and set aside the judgment referred to. From that order this appeal is taken.

It was stipulated and is conceded that the respondent was never served with summons, and, while the appellant maintains that the evidence produced upon the hearing was not sufficient to overcome certain recitals in the judgment to the effect that the "defendants" appeared by an attorney, the affidavits contain ample proof that the attorney referred to was never authorized to appear for the respondent, including an affidavit by him admitting that he was not authorized to so appear and stating the reasons why the mistake was made.

[1] It is urged by the appellant that this evidence was improperly received, that this was a collateral and not a direct attack upon the judgment and, for that reason, no facts dehors the record could be received. It is well settled that such a motion as this is a direct and not a collateral attack upon the judgment, notwithstanding the consideration of other evidence. Merced County v. Hicks, 67 Cal. 108, 7 P. 179; Norton v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 P. 585, 32 P. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198; People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 571, 36 P. 9; People v. Western Meat Co., 13 Cal. App. 539, 110 P. 338; Sharp v. Eagle Lake Co., 60 Cal. App. 386, 212 P. 933; In re Dahnke, 64 Cal. App. 555, 222 P. 381.

[2] It is further urged that a judgment may not be set aside under these circumstances in the absence of an affidavit of merits. The motion was made in part upon the record and files in the action, and not only does a sufficient showing of merits appear therefrom, but it is well settled that a judgment may be set aside without a showing as to the merits, where application is promptly made and where the court has not acquired jurisdiction through the service of summons or through voluntary appearance. Norton v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., supra; Crescent Canal Company v. Montgomery, 124 Cal. 134, 56 P. 797; Toy v. Haskell, 128 Cal. 558, 61 P. 89, 79 Am. St. Rep. 70; German Savings, etc., v. Bien, 18 Cal. App. 267, 122 P. 1096.

[3, 4] It is next urged that the respondent waived any objection as to jurisdiction by making, in fact, a general appearance, and we think this contention must be sustained. The notice of motion to set aside the judgment states six grounds or reasons upon which it was based. The first five relate entirely to the facts that the respondent had not been served, had not appeared, and had authorized no one to appear for it. The sixth ground is as follows: "For the reason and upon the ground that said judgment is not sustained by the Findings of the Court in said action, but is contrary thereto." It seems to be settled in this state that the inclusion in the motion of any ground inconsistent with the sole claim that the judgment is entirely void for want of jurisdiction of the person is sufficient to convert the attempted special appearance into a general appearance. Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Boston, etc., 126 Cal. 418, 58 P. 941, 59 P. 296; Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 P. 317; Taylor v. Superior Court, 93 Cal. App. 445, 269 P. 727.

[5-8] Finally, it is urged that the respondent is estopped to deny the validity of the judgment originally entered in this case because it is a joint owner of the real property on which a lien was sought to be established and, therefore, a trial could avail the respondent nothing. Neither reason nor authority is given why a party should be estopped from denying the validity of a personal judgment when it appears from the judgment roll alone that no personal judgment should have been entered against him. In other words, it matters not whether the appearance be special or general if it appears that the judgment should not have been entered and was properly set aside. The complaint is one to foreclose a mechanic's lien. It alleges that the plaintiff entered into a written contract with Casa De Oro, Limited, to furnish certain labor and material for the installation of a sprinkling system on certain land; that the plaintiff installed the equipment; that, under the terms of the agreement, Casa De Oro, Limited, agreed to pay to the plaintiff a certain sum; and that this amount was still owing and unpaid. It is alleged that the three defendants "were owners and/or reputed owners of the lands hereinbefore described." Judgment is prayed against "the defendants" for the sum named; that this amount "be adjudged a lien upon the land and premises hereinbefore described"; and that the lands be sold and the plaintiff have execution for any deficiency. The court found that the plaintiff entered into a written contract with Casa De Oro, Limited, for the installation of this sprinkling system; that more than ninety days elapsed between the completion of the system and the recording of the mechanic's lien notice; that the claim of lien was barred; and that Casa De Oro, Limited, and this respondent were the owners of the land. Based upon these findings, a personal judgment was entered against Casa De Oro, Limited, and the respondent. It thus appears that neither the findings nor the complaint are sufficient to support a personal judgment against the respondent, since nothing therein shows or even indicates any personal liability upon its part. Where an inspection of the judgment roll is sufficient to disclose the invalidity of a judgment, the same may be set aside on motion. In re Dahnke, supra. It does not appear from the record just how or in what manner the two corporations named were "owners" of the land referred to. If Casa De Oro, Limited, was purchasing the land from the respondent, the latter would not be personally liable, not having joined in the contract. Pilstrand v. Greenamyre, 34 Cal. App. 799, 168 P. 1161. If the two owners were cotenants, the one had no power to bind the other by contract. Wagoner v. Silva, 139 Cal. 559, 73 P. 433; Nielson v. Gross, 17 Cal. App. 74, 118 P. 725; Sarina v. Pedrotti, 103 Cal. App. 203, 284 P. 472.

In a mechanic's lien action, a personal judgment against an owner where there is no contractual liability between such owner and the claimant is erroneous. Roberts v. Security T. & S. Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673; Beard v. Lancaster Midway Oil Co., 72 Cal. App. 148, 236 P. 970. While it has been held that an owner may be personally liable in such a case, where the party contracting for the improvement is merely his agent (Ridens v. Economy Home Builders, Inc., 104 Cal. App. 677, 286 P. 481), nothing in either the complaint or the findings hints of such a situation here. This complaint is based solely on a written contract with one of the owners, and nothing appears to in any way indicate the existence of any express or implied contract with the respondent. Under such circumstances the judgment was erroneous and was properly set aside. Giant Powder Co. v. Flume Co., 78 Cal. 193, 20 P. 419; Golden Gate B. M. Co. v. Fireman, 205 Cal. 174, 270 P. 214.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by John Shrode against the Savoy Auto Parks and Andrew Pansini, doing business under the name and style of the Savoy Auto Park. From the judgment, the last-named defendant and others appeal. Motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal. Motion by appellants to vacate the order of submission of the motion to dismiss the appeal, and to permit the filing of certain affidavits.

Appellants' motion denied, and respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal granted.

Burke, Hickson & Burke, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Elbert E. Hensley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground that the appellants "have failed to complete their record on appeal within the time required by law."

[1] Although the appellants were given twenty-five days' notice of the date of the hearing of said motion, they failed to file, or to offer to file, any opposition thereto until the morning of the day on which said motion had been noticed for hearing, at which time they offered to the clerk of this court for filing herein an affidavit and certain authorities which purported to relate to and be in opposition to the granting of said motion. Under the provisions of section 3 of rule XX of this court, in the absence of an order by which the time of serving and filing "opposition to the motion" may be shortened, the said affidavit and authorities offered by the appellants in said matter were presented too late, and consequently were properly refused filing by the clerk of this court. Nor does the record herein disclose either that any motion by appellants to be relieved from their default in that particular was ever presented to this court, or even the existence of any extenuating fact or circumstance which might tend to excuse the said dereliction of the appellants.

On the date when the motion to dismiss the appeal was noticed for hearing, it was ordered submitted for decision by this court. However, four days later appellants gave notice of the hearing of a motion to vacate said order of submission and to permit the filing, not only of the said affidavit which previously appellants had been denied the right to file, but as well additional affidavits which related principally to facts which had occurred subsequent to the date on which the motion to dismiss the appeal came on for hearing in this court. No grounds for the said motion presented by appellants are set forth in their notice of motion; nor are any legal grounds therefor apparent. As far as concerns the original affidavit which, as hereinbefore indicated, was properly refused filing, its physical attachment to, and its incorporation into, the motion made by appellants would appear to be but an attempt by them to evade the consequences of their failure to timely present opposition to the motion to dismiss the appeal. As to the facts set forth in the remaining affidavits which accompanied appellants' motion, it is clear that in no way could they affect the propriety of the order by which the motion to dismiss the appeal was submitted for decision.

Regarding the motion to dismiss the appeal, by the "certificate of the clerk of the court below" (rule VI), among other essential particulars required by the rule of this court, the following facts appear: "That notice of order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial was filed and served on the 31st day of May, 1932; that no proposed bill of exceptions has been filed by the said defendants or either of them herein; that no bill of exceptions has been settled; that there has been no request made to the clerk to prepare a transcript under the provisions of section 963a of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California; that no proceedings are pending for the settlement of the transcript under the provisions of section 963a of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California. * * *

[2] Since the motion to dismiss the appeal was not filed until long after the regulatory period had expired within which the appellants were entitled "to complete their record on appeal," nor until after many months had elapsed following the date of the service upon appellants and the filing with the clerk of the trial court of the notice of the "order denying defendants' motion for a new trial," and since no legal reason or justification for such delay has been properly presented to this court, a ruling that the said motion should be granted becomes imperative.

It is ordered that the motion to vacate the order of submission of the motion to dismiss the appeal, etc., be, and it is, denied. It is further ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal be, and it is granted.

Fraud $\Rightarrow$ 58(1).

Judgment for plaintiff in action for fraud in sale of realty was held not sustainable, where no evidence showed what value of property would have been had alleged false representations been true, and record failed to disclose method trial court employed in determining plaintiff's damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. Parker Wood, Judge.

Action by Sarah Ingalls against the Olympic Realty Corporation, W. A. Cory, the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York appeals.

Lewis Cruickshank and Donald Armstrong, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Olympic Realty Corporation and W. A. Cory.

DESMOND, Justice pro tem.

This appeal was placed upon the calendar of this court upon an order to show cause why the judgment herein should not be reversed, and the cause remanded to the trial court for a new trial, or such other order made as might be meet in the premises. At the time of the entry of such order to show cause, it appeared that appellant's brief had been filed herein, but that no brief on behalf of respondent had been filed; further, that the time for filing such brief had long since expired. Upon the calling of such calendar, counsel for respondent appeared and consented that the judgment appealed from be reversed and a new trial ordered. We have examined the transcript and have noted the points raised by appellant in his brief. We observe that the complaint alleges that certain of the defendants induced the plaintiff through fraudulent representations to buy, under four separate executory agreements, four parcels of land for the aggregate price of $8,690; that a total of $3,490.70 was paid thereon, including the sum of $293.10, as interest; that no rescission is claimed to have been effected or attempted, but damages are claimed in the amount paid, namely, $3,490.70, payment of that sum having been demanded from the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, surety upon bonds furnished under the law to the state real estate commission by the broker and salesman who made the sales to the plaintiff. We observe that by the answer filed by defendants, an offer is made to convey all the property mentioned upon payment of the amounts still due on account of principal and interest under the terms of the contracts. The only evidence relating to the value of the lots in question was given by two witnesses, one appearing for the plaintiff, the other for the defendants. The plaintiff's witness, a deputy county assessor, testified that the respective parcels were appraised by his office at approximately one-fifth to one-tenth of the selling prices fixed in the agreements of sale, and that in the office of the county assessor appraised values are "about 50% of what we consider to be the sales value of lots." This witness gave no testimony as to the actual value of the lots. A salesman, employed by some of the defendants, appeared as their witness on values, and testified that, in his opinion, the lots were worth at or within a few months of the selling dates approximately $1,000 to $1,500 more in the aggregate than the plaintiff undertook to pay for them. No evidence was offered by either party as to what the value of the lots or any of them would have been if the allegedly false representations had been true, and the record fails to disclose, either in the evidence or findings of fact, the method employed by the court in determining that the plaintiff was entitled to damages in the sums of $300, $400, $500, and $650, on the respective contracts, a total judgment of $1,850. It cannot be ascertained from the record whether in assessing these damages the court took into account the balance due upon the contracts, allowing for the respective payments thereon in the sums of $646.50, $902.74, $729.50, and $918.75. It is felt that under these circumstances counsel for respondent acts advisedly in consenting to the granting of the motion.

It is ordered that the judgment appealed from be, and the same is hereby, reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Remittitur to issue forthwith.

PER CURIAM.

The defendant and appellant was convicted in the superior court in the county of Alameda of a felony, to wit, robbery. A jury trial was waived and the trial court found the crime as of the first degree.

Judgment was duly entered April 12, 1933, and the transcript on appeal was filed in this court on May 4, 1933. The cause was regularly placed on the calendar for oral argument on June 12, 1933. No appearance was made for appellant at the time the cause was called for hearing other than a request for additional time to file a brief. No brief has been filed in his behalf and the time granted for that purpose has long since expired.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code, the judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

1. Criminal law ☞598(5).

2. Criminal law ☞1202(7).

Weight of evidence that pardon had been granted to defendant charged with prior conviction was for trial court.

3. Criminal law ☞195(1), 1209.

In prosecution for robbery and burglary, proof of prior conviction in foreign state did not place accused in double jeopardy nor assess double penalty for same offense (Pen. Code, §§ 644, 668).

4. Criminal law ☞1202(1).

Where prior conviction was properly charged in information and admitted by accused, trial court held not to have abused its discretion in disallowing accused to withdraw plea and deny same (Pen. Code, §§ 644, 668).

CRAIG, Justice.

Upon charges by information of robbery and burglary, and the allegation of a prior conviction of felony in another state, verdicts of guilty were returned by the jury, and the defendant appealed from the judgments entered accordingly.

It was alleged, and the prosecuting witness testified, that the offense was committed on or about the 2d day of February, 1932. The defendant swore that he was not at the scene of the robbery on that date. However, said witness was not positive, as to the exact date thereof, and police records proved by the people showed the same offense to have been committed on the 13th day of February, 1932. "The precise time at which the offense was committed need not be stated in the indictment or information, but it may be alleged to have been committed at any time before the * * * filing thereof, except where the time is a material ingredient in the offense." Pen. Code, § 955.

[1] It is contended that the trial court abused its discretion in denying a motion for a continuance, and that the appellant was deprived of an opportunity to produce a material witness. It was shown by affidavit that said witness had left the state, but no showing was made as to diligence in attempting to locate or communicate with him, nor as to the date of his departure, the date of his expected return, or where he might be found. The trial had been continued from various dates over a period of more than a month. Affirmative proof of facts tending to show that the ends of justice required a further continuance not having been offered, it cannot be said that it was error to deny the same.

[2-4] The information charged a prior conviction of a felony in another state for which the defendant had served a term in the penitentiary. Motions were interposed to dismiss said charge, based upon an affidavit that the defendant had been pardoned, which motions were denied. A form of pardon naming another person or the defendant by a different name appears in the appellant's brief, but it does not appear to have been signed nor offered in evidence upon the trial. The weight to be given such evidence, if it really was offered, was for the trial court to determine, and it cannot be afforded greater weight on appeal than it can be said to have received below. Nor did the allegation and proof of a prior conviction place the defendant again in jeopardy therefor, nor amount to assessing for the same offense a double penalty therefor, as contended. Section 668 of the Penal Code provides that, in case of a conviction outside this state, a person thereafter convicted in this state is punishable for the subsequent offense in the manner prescribed in section 644, which requires imprisonment for life and forbids release on parole for at least twelve years. The prior conviction having been properly charged by information, and admitted by the defendant, the trial court cannot, in view of the foregoing, be held to have abused its discretion in refusing to permit him to withdraw his plea and to deny the same.

[5] The contention that the jury might have been influenced by remarks of the trial judge and the curtailment of examination of witnesses upon matters which appeared to be immaterial is also untenable. It was the duty of the court to expedite the hearing and determination of the proceedings in a manner commensurate with the serving of the ends of justice. Pen. Code, § 681a. The jury were instructed to disregard any expressions by the trial judge which might indicate an opinion in the matters before them, and examination of the record fails to reveal any instance wherein the defendant was deprived of the right to evidence which was material to the issues. He does not show how he was prejudiced by the procedure to which he would take exception.

[6] Further, it is insisted that certain of the jurors may have been present in the courtroom during the trial of another case in which the appellant here was being tried for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, and have been prejudiced by the evidence therein. We cannot presume that jurors in the subsequent trial falsely testified as to their qualifications, nor that the defendant was deprived of an opportunity to examine them fully, in the absence of such showing. The record contains no evidence of unfairness. Objection to the jurors was overruled by the statement of the court that no juror who sat in the former trial was a juror in the second. In the absence of showing to the contrary it must be presumed that they were not disqualified. People v. Gilmore, 17 Cal. App. 737, 121 P. 697.

[7] The defendant was positively identified by the prosecuting witness, and a watch which she testified he had taken at the time of the robbery was identified by description and number. It is contended that such identification was insufficient, but we are furnished with no suggestion of more complete evidence that might have been demanded. Other points raised by the appellant's brief are covered by what has been said herein.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Action by E. W. King and another against Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

JENNINGS, Justice.

This action was instituted by the sureties on an appeal bond to recover from the surety on an undertaking given to secure redelivery of property seized by virtue of a writ of attachment. Upon the conclusion of the trial the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the full value of the property attached. From the judgment thus rendered the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

The action which gave rise to the present action was entitled McClintick v. Leonards, 103 Cal. App. 768, 285 P. 351. In it the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,300, together with interest and costs. Upon the filing of the complaint therein a writ of attachment issued directing the sheriff to attach any property of the defendant in the county wherein the action was commenced as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that might subsequently be rendered in plaintiff's favor. Pursuant to such writ of attachment the sheriff seized and took into his possession the sum of $761 which was the property of Leonards, defendant in said action. Thereupon an undertaking was executed by the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, defendant in the present action, whereby the said surety agreed to redeliver the money attached to the sheriff "to be applied to the judgment, or in default thereof, that defendant (Leonards) will, on demand, pay the plaintiff (McClintick) the full value of the property released." Upon the filing of this undertaking the money which had been seized was ordered released.

Upon the trial of the action in McClintick v. Leonards, judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,423.53. Thereafter, Leonards, the defendant in said action, appealed from the judgment thus rendered against him and for the purpose of securing a stay of execution pending the appeal executed an undertaking upon which the plaintiffs herein, E. W. King and Edward Weit, were sureties. This undertaking, which was executed pursuant to the provisions of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, provided that the said sureties are "jointly and severally bound in double the amount named in said judgment, and that if said judgment or order appealed from or any part thereof is affirmed, or the appeal dismissed, the appellant will pay the amount directed to be paid by said judgment and all damages and costs awarded against the appellant upon said appeal not to exceed the amount of the bond." Subsequently the judgment rendered in said prior action in favor of the plaintiff McClintick was affirmed. McClintick v. Leonards, 103 Cal. App. 768, 285 P. 351. Thereafter McClintick applied to the trial court for judgment against the sureties on the supersedeas bond and after proceedings regularly taken the court entered judgment against said sureties, plaintiffs herein, for the sum of $1,737.64. Thereupon a writ of execution issued on the judgment thus rendered and the sureties, E. W. King and Edward Weit, paid to McClintick the sum of $1,719.64, in full satisfaction of the judgment which had been rendered against them.

During the pendency of the appeal in the case of McClintick v. Leonards the judgment debtor died and the executrix of his will was substituted as defendant in said action. A claim against the estate of Leonards for the amount of the judgment was filed, but, as alleged in the complaint in the present action, the claim was unpaid and "said estate is insolvent and * * * the assets thereof were exhausted and wholly paid out and expended in the satisfaction and discharge of the costs and expenses of administration and claims having a priority over the claim of said McClintick."

Following the affirmation of the judgment in McClintick v. Leonards, a demand was made upon the defendant in the present action that it pay over and deliver to the plaintiffs herein the property attached in the former action. Upon the failure and refusal of said defendant to comply with the demand thus made, the present action was instituted resulting as aforesaid in the rendition of a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, sureties on the supersedeas bond, against the defendant, surety on the release of attachment bond, for the full value of the property seized under the writ of attachment. It should here be observed that the court found that all of the allegations contained in paragraph 5 of plaintiff's amended complaint are true. One of the allegations therein contained which is of importance in the present appeal is the following: "These plaintiffs, at the instance and request of said Leonards (italics ours) and for the purpose of securing a stay of execution pending said appeal, made, executed and delivered to the clerk of said court their certain written undertaking on appeal." From the aforesaid finding we are warranted in concluding that the trial court found that the stay bond was executed solely at the request of Leonards and that the defendant herein, surety on the release of attachment undertaking, neither concurred in the request of the judgment debtor nor consented thereto. We understand that there is no dispute between counsel upon this point, and it may be remarked that the record herein fails to disclose that the defendant had any knowledge of the execution of the stay bond.

[1-3] The single problem which is here presented is therefore whether the sureties on a supersedeas bond who have been compelled to pay the judgment upon its affirmation are entitled to recover from the surety on a release of attachment bond when the stay bond was executed solely at the request of the judgment debtor and without the knowledge or consent of the surety on the prior bond.

It is immediately apparent that if recovery may be had in such a situation as is here presented, it must be by virtue of the equitable doctrine of subrogation. In re Estate of Whitney, 124 Cal. App. 109, 118, 11 P.(2d) 1107, 1110, the following language from Southern Surety Co. v. Tessum, 178 Minn. 495, 228 N. W. 326, 329, 66 A. L. R. 1136, is quoted with approval: "Subrogation is equity's method of compelling the ultimate payment by the one who in justice and good conscience ought to make it—of putting the charge where it justly belongs. Enmert v. Thompson, 49 Minn. 386, 52 N. W. 31, 32 Am. St. Rep. 566. It is not an absolute right, but depends upon the superiority of the equities of him who asserts it over those of the one against whom it is sought. 'It will never be enforced when the equities are equal or the rights not clear.'"

The general rule with respect to the application of the equitable doctrine of subrogation as between successive sureties is stated in the note appearing in 77 A. L. R., at page 458, in the following language: "The general rule seems to be that a surety on a supersedeas bond will not, upon paying the judgment rendered against his principal, be subrogated to the creditor's remedies against the sureties on a prior bond of the same debtor, in the absence of special circumstances rendering his equities equal or superior to theirs,—such as a case in which the surety on the supersedeas bond becomes in fact a surety for the sureties on the prior bond of the same principal."

In Stearns on Suretyship (2d Ed.) § 254, the rule is stated as follows:

"The execution of a suretyship obligation in the course of a legal proceeding for the collection of a debt for which another is already bound as a surety, or where bonds are given in the prosecution of legal remedies in the appellate courts in which successive undertakings are required, generally results in placing the ultimate liability upon the last surety, through whose agency the litigation has been prolonged, and while as between such surety and the creditor he may be properly termed a surety for the prior promisor, yet if his contract is solely in the interest of the principal, and without the assent of the prior surety, he is regarded as debtor of all the prior parties, and not entitled to subrogation to the remedies of the creditor against the prior sureties; but on the contrary if the prior surety pays he will recover by subrogation from the later surety. * * *

"This rule is usually put upon the ground that the successive surety by prolonging the litigation makes himself an obstacle to the prior promisor by preventing an adjustment of the controversy, wherein the prior surety might have had immediate subrogation to the rights of the creditor against the principal, and this conclusion seems to be reached without requiring any showing that the prior surety has in fact been injured."

The rule is often declared in brief form in the following language: Successive sureties on judicial bonds are liable to each other in the inverse order in which they became sureties. Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. King et al., 68 Okl. 100, 172 P. 74, L. R. A. 1918D, 1188; Chrisman v. Jones, 34 Ark. 73.

The application of the above-stated rule to the situation here presented would indicate that the trial court erred in permitting the sureties on the supersedeas bond to recover from the surety on the release of attachment bond and that the judgment should be reversed. Respondents contend, however, that, because of certain statutes of California, the court's action in permitting recovery was correct and that the judgment should be affirmed.

The statutes upon which particular reliance is placed by respondents in support of the judgment are section 1059, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 2849, Civil Code. The former of these sections is in the following language: "Surety on appeal substituted to rights of judgment creditor. Whenever any surety on an undertaking on appeal, executed to stay proceedings upon a money judgment, pays the judgment, either with or without action, after its affirmation by the appellate court, he is substituted to the rights of the judgment creditor, and is entitled to control, enforce, and satisfy such judgment, in all respects as if he had recovered the same."

As was pointed out in Holmes v. Hughes, 125 Cal. App. 290, 295, 14 P.(2d) 149, this section literally covers all cases wherein an undertaking on appeal is filed irrespective of any question of privity between the parties and regardless of whether the judgment debtor knew that such an undertaking had been filed. But the right of a surety to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor against the judgment debtor is not at all dependent upon the statute. It is a right long recognized and enforced in equity. Section 1059 of the Code of Civil Procedure simply gives to the surety a summary remedy of utilizing the judgment itself to enforce rights against the judgment debtor which he possesses not by virtue of the statute, but by virtue of recognized fundamental equitable principles. The statute therefore may properly be characterized, as was done in the above-cited decision as providing simply a mode of procedure based upon the doctrine of subrogation and governed by the same equitable principles.

Section 2849 of the Civil Code is in the following language: "Surety entitled to benefit of securities held by creditor. A surety is entitled to the benefit of every security for the performance of the principal obligation held by the creditor, or by a co-surety at the time of entering into the contract of suretyship, or acquired by him afterwards, whether the surety was aware of the security or not." This section is found under article 3 of chapter 2 of title 13, pt. 4, div. 3, the Code. The title of chapter 2 is "Suretyship" and the heading of article 3 is "Rights of Sureties." In this article are described various rights and remedies specifically conferred by statute upon sureties. Section 2849 and the section immediately preceding deal particularly with the right of a surety who satisfies his principal's obligation to be subrogated to whatever remedy the creditor has against the principal (section 2848) and to be subrogated to the benefit of any security for the performance of the principal obligation which the creditor or a co-surety held at the time the suretyship contract was executed or which is acquired by the creditor subsequent to the execution of the suretyship contract (section 2849). However, these sections of the Code do not add anything to the recognized principles of subrogation. They are "but a re-enactment of the well-settled rules of equity on the subject of subrogation or substitution." Mr. Justice Shaw, in Martin v. De Ornelas, 139 Cal. 41, 49, 72 P. 440, 444. It was pointed out in Estate of Elizalde, 182 Cal. 427, 432, 188 P. 560, that section 2848 of the Civil Code does not exclusively measure the rights of sureties to subrogation and that thereby the Legislature did not intend to announce all the law on the subject. It seems equally evident that the Legislature did not intend by the enactment of both sections under consideration to encompass completely the entire subject of subrogation. Irrespective of the question of whether the release of attachment bond may properly be regarded as a security held by the creditor for the performance of the principal obligation, we are convinced that the great weight of authority in the United States has established the rule that the surety on a supersedeas bond is not entitled, upon paying the judgment recovered against his principal, to be subrogated to the creditor's remedies against sureties on a prior bond of the same debtor in the absence of special circumstances which operate to render the equities of the later surety superior to those of the earlier.

In the instant case it is apparent that there are no special circumstances which relieve it from the operation of the above-stated rule. As heretofore noted, the court found that the supersedeas bond was executed "at the instance and request" of the judgment debtor and there is no showing that the surety on the release of attachment bond, appellant herein, concurred in the action taken by the judgment debtor or consented thereto. The result produced by the execution of the supersedeas bond was to prevent the enforcement of present payment of the judgment debtor and thus to prolong the responsibility of the prior surety. The delay which was thus brought about through the interposition of the second sureties may have injuriously affected the position of the surety on the prior bond. In this connection, it is to be borne in mind that, pending the appeal, the judgment debtor died and that the court, by finding that the allegations of paragraph 6 of the amended complaint are true, found that the estate of the judgment debtor is insolvent. This circumstance points strongly to the fact that appellant's position was injuriously affected by the delay produced through the interposition of respondents in becoming sureties on the supersedeas bond. It is therefore apparent that the equities of respondents are not only not superior to those of appellant, but that in fact the equities in appellant's favor preponderate over those of respondents.

[4] It may be remarked in conclusion that the judgment may not be sustained on the theory that the parties to the present action were cosureties and that respondents are entitled to recover from appellant under the equitable doctrine of contribution. The record shows that the action was tried on the theory that respondents were entitled to subrogation and the judgment which was rendered was based on the principle of subrogation. No attempt was made to segregate the amount which was paid by respondents into the constituent elements of damages, interest, and costs incurred in the trial of the action in McClintick v. Leonards, and costs on the appeal in said action. On the contrary, the judgment from which this appeal is taken was for the full value of the attached property. Furthermore, respondents and appellant were not cosureties. They were bound for the same principal but for different obligations. Appellant's obligation under the redelivery bond was to redeliver the attached property or to pay its value to the proper officer on demand. No judgment had been rendered when appellant's undertaking was executed and there was no promise to pay a judgment if one should be rendered. Respondents, on the other hand, bound themselves to pay the amount of the judgment which had then been rendered and all damages and costs awarded upon appeal if the judgment should be affirmed. The obligations of the parties to this action were distinct obligations having no connection by privity or otherwise. Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland v. Bowen, 123 Iowa, 356, 98 N. W. 897, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1021; Chrisman v. Jones, 34 Ark. 73.

It follows therefore that, in our opinion the trial court's conclusion that respondents "are entitled to judgment" against appellant was incorrect and that the judgment rendered in favor of respondents may not be sustained.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in appellant's favor.

Interlocutory decree of divorce limiting to 90 days wife's occupancy of homestead awarded to husband held error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles E. Haas, Judge.

Action for separate maintenance by Mary S. Leavitt against Earl V. Leavitt, who filed cross-complaint for divorce. From an interlocutory decree for defendant and cross-complainant, plaintiff and cross-defendant appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft and Thurlow T. Taft, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Isador Morris, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action for separate maintenance. Defendant filed a cross-complaint, alleging extreme cruelty, and prayed for a divorce.

The trial court found certain personal property, consisting of household furniture, to be community property of the spouses. It further found certain real property to be the sole and separate property of the defendant and cross-complainant, upon which plaintiff and cross-defendant had placed a homestead. After awarding plaintiff certain costs and sums for her support, the court made an equal division of the community property, and decreed the real property to belong to defendant and cross-complainant, and that plaintiff and cross-defendant had no interest therein. It then decreed that defendant and cross-complainant be granted an interlocutory decree of divorce, and that plaintiff be allowed to occupy the real property for a period of ninety days.

Two points are relied upon for a reversal. It is first claimed that the finding that plaintiff and cross-defendant was guilty of extreme cruelty is not supported by the evidence, nor is the corroborative evidence offered in substantiation thereof sufficient to sustain the findings; second, that the interlocutory judgment is erroneous to the extent that it attempts to limit to a period of ninety days appellant's right to the occupancy of the homestead of the parties.

There is no merit in the first contention. We do not deem it necessary to review the evidence. Suffice it to say there was sufficient evidence to support the charge of cruelty pleaded by cross-complainant and testified to by him, and there was also sufficient corroboration substantially tending to confirm such charge.

[1] In an action for divorce, corroboration of every act sworn to by a plaintiff is not required, but evidence substantially tending to confirm plaintiff's testimony is sufficient. Percy v. Percy, 188 Cal. 765, 207 P. 369.

[2] We see no answer, however, to appellant's second contention, that the interlocutory judgment is erroneous in attempting to limit her right to the occupancy of the homestead of the parties to a period of ninety days. An interlocutory decree of divorce cannot of itself have the effect of nullifying the homestead character of the property, nor should the trial court have attempted to destroy or assign it until such time as the marriage was actually dissolved by the final decree of divorce. Radich v. Radich, 64 Cal. App. 605, 222 P. 182; Remley v. Remley, 49 Cal. App. 489, 193 P. 604. The interlocutory decree is not a decree of divorce, nor does it dissolve the marriage. The court, therefore, should not have limited appellant's right to the occupancy of the homestead until such time as the marriage shall be dissolved by the final decree. Strupelle v. Strupelle, 59 Cal. App. 526, 211 P. 248; 13 Cal. Jur. 535. This being so, the interlocutory decree must be modified by striking therefrom that portion which imposes a limitation upon the appellant's right to the occupancy of the homestead prior to the date when the divorce shall have become final.

As so modified the judgment is affirmed.

HOUSER, Justice.

It appears that in a certain action pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff therein and against the corporation defendant therein for the principal sum of $3,463, and that thereafter a writ of execution which was issued on said judgment was duly returned "wholly unsatisfied." Thereupon the plaintiff in that action instituted another and separate suit, termed a "creditor's bill," against the said corporation for the sole asserted purpose of having a receiver appointed to administer the assets mentioned and described in the complaint in said suit, together with the business of the corporation, to the end that the proper and legal claims of all creditors of said corporation, including that of the plaintiff, be satisfied and paid. The answer of the defendant corporation in said suit "admits all and singular the allegations of the complaint, and hereby consents to the appointment of a receiver." In due course the petitioner herein was appointed such receiver; who thereupon, and for a period of more than one year thereafter, proceeded to and did administer the affairs of said corporation and conduct its business. After the expiration of more than one year's service by petitioner as such receiver as aforesaid, a judge of the superior court, in whose department thereof the said suit was pending, "did summarily, upon his own motion as judge of the superior court, vacate the order theretofore made appointing said receiver and discharged said receiver on the ground that said court in said action had no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver"; and thereafter, on the presentation by said receiver to said court of his report, account, and petition for discharge as such receiver, the said judge sitting as said court "declined to hear such report and account, or to discharge said receiver and exonerate his bond on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction in said action to appoint said receiver." In such circumstances, on an application by petitioner, this court issued its alternative writ of mandate by which the said judge and the said court, as respondents herein, were required either to proceed with the hearing of the said report, account and petition for the discharge of said receiver, or, on a specified date, to show cause why compliance had not been made with said order.

The effect of the answer and the argument presented by the respondents herein is that in the face of the facts and the pleading, as shown by the complaint in the suit called a "creditor's bill," the superior court was without jurisdiction to appoint a receiver; that any acts performed by the receiver in the performance by him of his assumed official duty as such were in law unauthorized and void; and consequently that neither the respondent court nor the judge thereof now may be required to proceed further either in the hearing, the settlement, or the approval of the report, account, and discharge of said receiver, or otherwise, or at all.

In effect, by the terms of subdivision 4 of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a receiver may be appointed by the court in which an action is pending "after judgment * * * in aid of execution, when an execution has been returned unsatisfied. * * *

As hereinbefore indicated, in the action which gave rise to the instant application, the procedure suggested for the purpose of inducing appropriate action for the appointment of a receiver was by means of a "creditor's bill." In section 106, volume 1, Pomeroy's Equitable Remedies, it is stated that "it has been held, in many cases, that in a judgment creditor's suit, on the return of the execution unsatisfied, it is almost a matter of course to appoint a receiver to collect and preserve the judgment debtor's property pending the litigation"—citing authorities. And, as is said in 11 California Jurisprudence, p. 146: "Under the old system of practice when a judgment creditor had exhausted the remedy by writ of execution, he had a right to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity by a proceeding known as a creditor's suit for the purpose of compelling a discovery of assets, tangible or intangible, and applying them to the satisfaction of his execution. And formerly this was the only method of reaching assets which could not be seized on execution. Supplementary proceedings were created to provide an easier and less expensive method of reaching the same result, and are intended as a substitute for creditors' suits. This being so, resort must be had to supplementary proceedings, unless in exceptional cases in which the legal remedies are unavailing"—citing authorities.

By the terms of sections 714 to 723, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, commonly known as proceedings supplemental to execution, a complete procedure at law is provided by which may be obtained results similar in purpose and effect to those intended by the more cumbersome method authorized by the provisions of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, as just stated, contemplate the filing of a creditor's suit and the consequent appointment of a receiver. In each of a number of cases decided by the Supreme Court of this state it has been declared that the statutory proceeding supplemental to execution was intended as a substitute for a creditor's bill. Adams v. Hackett, 7 Cal. 187, 201; McCullough v. Clark, 41 Cal. 298, 302; Pacific Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 520, 522, 40 Am. Rep. 120; Habenicht v. Lissak, 78 Cal. 351, 20 P. 874, 5 L. R. A. 713, 12 Am. St. Rep. 63; Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 275, 33 P. 857, 37 Am. St. Rep. 50; Matteson, etc., Co. v. Conley, 144 Cal. 483, 485, 77 P. 1042; Nordstrom v. Corona City W. Co., 155 Cal. 206, 211, 100 P. 242, 132 Am. St. Rep. 81; Travis Glass Co. v. Ibbetson, 186 Cal. 724, 727, 200 P. 595; Bonner v. Lehfeldt, 39 Cal. App. 649, 653, 179 P. 722; McKenzie v. Hill, 9 Cal. App. 78, 80, 98 P. 55.

And, although the statutory provisions may contain no express authorization for the appointment of a receiver in aid of the purpose to be effected, as early as 1864, in the case of Hathaway v. Brady, 26 Cal. 581, 593, it was ruled by the Supreme Court of this state (syllabus) that "in proceedings supplementary to execution, the Court has power, when it has all the parties before it, to appoint a receiver." That that principle has been recognized and established is attested by Professor Pomeroy in volume 1 of Pomeroy's Equitable Remedies, § 110, where it is said: "Proceedings supplementary to execution being designed to be a substitute for the equity procedure by creditors' bill, receivers are appointed in such proceedings very much as a matter of course, where it appears that the judgment creditor (debtor) has, or probably has, property that ought to be subjected to the satisfaction of the judgment, after the return of the execution unsatisfied."

But, aside from such implied equity power, the express, statutory, power of the court is ordinarily ample, and affords abundant and practicable relief in the premises in a less cumbersome and more economical manner, not only as such procedure may affect the court, but as well the litigants. Considered, then, as a full and complete substitute for a creditor's suit, the question arises as to whether the statutory remedy ordinarily supplants the remedy afforded by equity.

[1] The ordinary rule is that, where the law affords a remedy, equity will not assume jurisdiction; but in some jurisdictions, even with recognition being given to such rule, it has been held that, in the absence of statutory provision by which the pre-existing equitable jurisdiction is either expressly or impliedly denied, the equitable remedy may be invoked. Crass v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 96 Ala. 447, 11 So. 480; Greil Bros. Co. v. City of Montgomery, 182 Ala. 291, 62 So. 692, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 733; Chapman v. American Surety Co., 261 Ill. 594, 104 N. E. 247; 1 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. 279, 280. And in one case it has been held that the statutory proceedings supplementary to execution do not exclude the equitable remedy by creditors' suit. Enright v. Grant, 5 Utah, 334, 15 P. 268. But, quite to the contrary, see MacLaury v. Hart, 121 N. Y. 636, 24 N. E. 1013, where it was said that "a court of equity is never at liberty to draw to its general jurisdiction a question remitted to a competent and sufficient authority by express command of a statute, unless under some very exceptional circumstances, which do not exist here."

As an introductory statement to section 2295, volume 5, Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, it is said: "It is a necessary result from the whole theory of the creditors' suits that jurisdiction in equity will not be entertained where there is a remedy at law; but such remedy, in order to oust and prevent jurisdiction in equity, must be in all respects as satisfactory as the relief furnished by a court of equity"—citing authorities.

[2] Notwithstanding the apparent contrariety of opinion with reference to the question which exists as between various respective jurisdictions, by weight of authority therefor the rule in this state appears to be well settled that, if statutory proceedings supplemental to execution of a judgment furnish adequate relief, they are exclusive of the equitable remedy afforded by means of a creditor's suit. 7 Cal. Jur. 800 et seq. However, as indicating a contrary view, especially as applied to alleged fraudulent transfers of property by the judgment debtor, see Swift v. Arents, 4 Cal. 390.

In the case of Phillips v. Price, 153 Cal. 146, 148, 94 P. 617, 618, it is said: "That, since our statutes have provided a method of reaching such assets by supplementary proceedings, there is no longer, in cases where the statutory method is adequate, any ground for the interposition of equity." And in Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 276, 33 P. 857, 859, 37 Am. St. Rep. 50, in effect the rule is announced that a creditor's suit will not lie, except "in those exceptional cases in which it appears that equity must be invoked because legal remedies are unavailing." See, also, Matteson, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Conley, 144 Cal. 483, 77 P. 1042; Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 P. 303.

The allegations in the complaint of the creditor's suit upon which the plaintiff relied for the appointment of the receiver were as follows:

"That said defendant corporation is engaged in the business of drilling an oil well at Venice, California, and has drilled such oil well which is located on the following described property, Lot One (1), Block 'Q,' Ocean Strand Tract, Venice, California, to a depth of 5,765 feet; that said defendant corporation expects to obtain production at a depth of 4,500 feet; that said well of said defendant corporation is in proven territory, and is surrounded by producing oil wells; that said well, if placed on production, will have an estimated capacity of 400 barrels of oil per day; that said defendant corporation has expended to date the sum of $60,000.00 in the drilling of said well to its present depth.

"That plaintiff herein is a judgment creditor of the defendant corporation in the amount of $3,463.00; that execution has been issued on said judgment and returned unsatisfied; that plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore alleges that said defendant corporation has liabilities outstanding in the amount of $18,000.00; that if said well is placed on production it will be possible to pay and discharge all such liabilities; that if said well is permitted to be placed on production said well will have a market value of $120,000.00; that the corporation is now without any cash or liquid funds; that said property is now in the possession of the County Assessor and is advertised for sale on July 21, 1931, for the nonpayment of taxes; that there are unpaid claims of laborers who are pressing for payment and threatening attachment proceedings; that numerous creditors have threatened to cause attachments to be levied and the sheriff placed in charge of said property; that if said property is permitted to be sold at such tax sale and if such property is permitted to be levied upon by creditors through attachment and execution proceedings the assets of said defendant corporation will be dissipated and wasted and the creditors receive practically no payments on their obligations; that plaintiff is informed and believes that an arrangement can be worked out whereby the necessary money to complete said well can be borrowed if a receiver is appointed and the attachment creditors and the county assessor restrained from making any sales; that it is impossible for the defendant corporation to make such financing on account of such threatened attachment proceedings by creditors."

[3, 4] An examination of such pleading reveals the fact that the situation there presented was not one wherein adequate relief was impossible of attainment through the employment of the means made available to the plaintiff by the terms of the statutes to which reference has been had. Moreover, aside from the general allegation "that execution has been issued on said judgment and returned unsatisfied," the so-called complaint is silent as to whether at any time preceding the filing of the suit the judgment creditor availed himself of the remaining remedy or remedies afforded him by the provisions of the statutes. Specifically, and waiving the question of the assumed right of the appointment of a receiver as an ultimate implied right arising from such statutes, as hereinbefore has been indicated might accrue to the plaintiff, the complaint is destitute of any allegation of fact showing either the institution, or the pursuit, of any "proceedings supplemental to execution," as outlined in sections 714 to 723, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. But more than that, although in apparent recognition of the provision expressed in subdivision 4 of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that, before a receiver may be appointed in proceedings in aid of execution, as hereinbefore set forth, the complaint contained the allegation that execution had been returned unsatisfied—the complaint contained additional allegations in substance that the judgment debtor was the owner of an oil well "in proven territory * * * surrounded by producing oil wells," which well had been drilled to a depth of 5765 feet, and "if placed on production will have an estimated capacity of 400 barrels of oil per day; * * * that said defendant corporation has expended to date the sum of $60,000 in the drilling of said well to its present depth." From the pleading itself, it thus becomes manifest that, notwithstanding the general rule regarding the conclusiveness of the return of a writ to the effect that no property can be found of which the judgment debtor is the owner, the admitted fact with regard to the actual ownership by the defendant of property upon which the writ of execution might have been levied and upon a sale of which property, at least in part the judgment might have been satisfied, should result in a conclusion that the statutory prerequisite preliminary to the filing of a creditor's suit regarding the implied inability of the plaintiff to satisfy his judgment from the sale of property belonging to the defendant, in fact had not been met or complied with by the plaintiff.

[5] It must be apparent that the ultimate purpose in placing a writ of execution in the hands of the sheriff is to realize a satisfaction of the judgment. His return to the writ "wholly unsatisfied" is at least an indication that no property belonging to the judgment debtor can be found. Ordinarily, such a return is regarded as conclusive of such fact; but manifestly, where the person who has a right to rely upon that fact sets up other independent facts which utterly repudiate the fact that the judgment debtor has no property subject to execution, it would be but a travesty to permit a conclusion arising from the sheriff's return to the writ to prevail.

[6, 7] From all the foregoing, and in the instant circumstances, it follows, not only that the "creditor's bill" was improperly brought, but as well, if not for other reasons unnecessary to be here noticed, that it failed to state a cause of action. The fact that the corporation had consented to the appointment of a receiver of its assets and business is wholly immaterial to the question of whether the court thereby acquired jurisdiction. Elliott v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 727, 145 P. 101; 22 Cal. Jur. 458, and authorities there cited.

[8] Where a complaint fails to state a cause of action, an order by the court by which a receiver is appointed therein is of no validity. Hobson v. Pacific States Mercantile Co., 5 Cal. App. 94, 89 P. 866. See, also, Salisbury v. Wilcox, 128 Cal. 347, 60 P. 979; Lewis v. Shaw, 77 Cal. App. 99, 246 P. 86; Col Co. v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 604, 238 P. 926.

[9] The order appointing the receiver being void, it follows that any subsequent order which might be made by the court based upon the assumed validity of its former order likewise would be invalid. Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 79 P. 537; Grant v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 71, 47 P. 872.

This court has neither the authority to direct, nor the inclination to require, the lower court to perform a void act. It follows that the alternative writ heretofore issued herein should be discharged. It is so ordered.

STEPHENS, Justice.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal entered in the superior court for defendants William L. and Jennie Riley. The facts are stated in the opinion.

In an eminent domain action under the Street Opening Act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376, as amended) the question of a proper award to defendants Riley for property to be taken was heard and determined by a board of referees and subsequently by the court upon exceptions. The court made its interlocutory judgment and caused the same to be entered August 17, 1925. On August 6, 1926, an injunction was issued in Blackburn v. City of Los Angeles, superior court No. 199097, the full effect of which is in dispute in the instant case and will hereinafter be discussed. Thereafter the city attorney reported to the council in part: "This injunction prevents any further steps being taken to complete this proceeding. I would suggest that you consider the matter with reference to commencing new proceedings." The council thereupon instructed the city attorney to prepare and present to the council an ordinance abandoning the proceedings, but no further action was ever had on this resolution by the city attorney or by the city council. Thereafter, however, proceedings were had to accomplish exactly the same improvement under another ordinance. On June 14, 1930, defendants Riley filed a notice of motion to dismiss the original action on the ground that "the same has been abandoned by the plaintiff" and for judgment of dismissal with costs and attorney's fees under section 1255a, Code of Civil Procedure. The city claimed that its acts could not be construed to amount to abandonment, but, "the court held otherwise and granting said motion further adjudged that the Rileys should recover their costs and expenses, including reasonable attorney's fees hereby taxed in the sum of $4,335.00." Thereafter defendants Riley filed their cost and disbursement bill in the sum of $8,835 and a motion followed to tax costs upon the grounds, among others, that costs as contained in the bill were excessive and unlawful. The court taxed the costs at the same figure fixed in its judgment just mentioned.

[1] The only difference between the instant case and the case of City of Los Angeles v. Abbott (Cal. Sup.) 17 P.(2d) 993, is that in the instant case an interlocutory judgment was rendered by the superior court prior to the issuance of the injunction, whereas in the Abbott Case it had not been prosecuted to the point of trial when the injunction was issued. In all other respects these two cases were identical in principle, and the Abbott Case is controlling over this one. Respondents contend that there was an actual abandonment in the instant case, but we think the facts do not bear out this conclusion. They contend that under section 1255a, Code of Civil Procedure, they are entitled to attorney fees in addition to costs of suit, but their contention in this respect is negated by the Abbott Case above cited.

[2] It is contended by appellant that the sum awarded respondents in the interlocutory judgment included appraisers' fees, and that this allowance should not have been made as an item of costs. The case of City of Los Angeles v. Clay, 126 Cal. App. 465, 14 P.(2d) 926, supports this view.

Respondents make the point that the interlocutory judgment had become final because of the lapse of more than a year before the permanent injunction was issued, and thus attempt to distinguish it from the Abbott Case, but there is evidence in the record that less than a year elapsed before the injunction was issued. Respondents also claim that the interlocutory judgment became the final judgment after the expiration of the 30-day period for payment, as provided in section 1251, Code of Civil Procedure, but the vice of this claim is that the proceedings are under a special act adopted by the Legislature and approved March 24, 1923, commonly called the Improvement Act of 1923, and the provisions of this act are such that this 30-day period could not apply thereto. From all that is furnished us, the proceedings were being followed and were being pressed in the usual and ordinary manner up to the time of the issuance of the injunction, in the case hereinabove referred to, and but for such injunction would in all probability have been pressed to a conclusion. It would seem then, without question, that the doctrine of the Abbott Case applies, that is, there was no voluntary abandonment.

The point made in respondents' brief to the effect that a new assessment could have been levied is not borne out by the facts, for the judgment enjoining the city is in broad terms a prohibition against any action under the ordinance.

The facts of this case entitle the respondents to a dismissal of the action, and the judgment is to that extent affirmed, with ordinary costs of the trial, but is reversed as to the allowance of appraisers' fees other than ordinary witness fees, and reversed as to the allowance of attorneys' fees. Each side is to bear its own costs on this appeal. The cause is remanded, and the superior court is directed to enter judgment in accord herewith.

KNIGHT, Justice.

The petitioner, Eugenia Sales, and one Pastor Santellian were produced as witnesses for the people at the trial of a criminal action in the superior court in and for Contra Costa county, and, after being sworn, refused to answer the questions propounded by the district attorney upon the ground that their answers would tend to incriminate them. The court instructed them to answer, but they still refused so to do, and thereupon they were adjudged guilty of contempt, and each was sentenced to five days' imprisonment in the county jail and to pay a fine of $400, or, in default of such payment, to be imprisoned in said county jail at the rate of one day for each $4 of the said fine until said fine was satisfied. Upon being taken into custody by the sheriff of said county in obedience to the judgment of sentence, they applied to this court for, and were granted, writs of habeas corpus, the ground urged therefor being that under the attending circumstances they were legally justified in claiming the benefit of the privilege afforded by the constitutional guaranty that no person shall be compelled in any criminal action to be a witness against himself.

The two proceedings were heard as one; and the following are the facts, as they appear from the record: The criminal action in which petitioners were called upon to testify was one wherein several persons named Leon Kintanilla, Mrs. Theresa Kintanilla, V. Kang, E. Codog, Alberta Asis, Maria Galvez, and R. Costillo were indicted jointly and being tried for the murder of a young married woman named Cecelia Navarro. All of the accused persons, many of the witnesses including petitioners, and Mrs. Navarro, were Filipinos; and all except the petitioner Santellian belonged to a lodge or society which restricted its membership to persons of that nationality. The prosecution claimed and sought to prove that at a meeting of the lodge held in Stockton on the night of November 20, 1932, Mrs. Navarro was placed on trial for certain alleged matrimonial misconduct, and that at the conclusion of the trial was taken blindfolded in an automobile, driven to an isolated spot on an island in Contra Costa county, and there thrust into an excavation and buried alive. The indictment charging these persons with the commission of the murder was founded in part at least on the testimony given before the grand jury by these petitioners, and, according to the affidavits filed herein by the district attorney, petitioners, subsequent to the finding of the indictment and prior to the commencement of the trial, confirmed the truth of the testimony given by them before the grand jury and agreed with the district attorney to again so testify at the trial. The testimony given by them before the grand jury as it is shown by the reporter's transcript thereof was substantially as follows: Eugenia Sales stated that she was a member of said lodge or society and attended the meeting thereof in Stockton on the night in question; that one of the purposes of the meeting was to investigate the alleged misconduct of Mrs. Navarro, and that petitioner was present in the lodge room part of the time the investigation was going on, but that she did not know what determination had been made thereof. However, at the close of the session, so she stated, she was told by Mrs. Kintanilla to go along with the others, including Mrs. Navarro, in an automobile driven by Kintanilla; that the other occupants of the car were Mrs. Navarro, Mrs. Kintanilla, and four other women; that they drove out to the island, and upon arriving there sat in the car for a few minutes until some one came up and said "everything is ready"; that she was then instructed to get out of the car and follow the others; that Mrs. Navarro's face was "bandaged," her body wrapped "with something," and she was crying; that after proceeding some distance they reached "the big hole in the ground there" and that she saw some of the women push Mrs. Navarro into the hole and then throw "dirt on top"; after which they returned to the automobiles and drove away.

Santellian stated that he was a resident of Pittsburg, Contra Costa county; that his wife was a member of said society but that he was not; that on the evening in question he took his wife to Stockton in an automobile to attend said meeting, and waited outside for her; that later on during the evening a number of women came down from the lodge room, among them being the defendants Mrs. Kintanilla, Mrs. Asis, and Mrs. Galvez; that they told him that they wanted him to drive some of the women in his car out to the island; that he protested against doing so, and that Mrs. Asis "pinched" him and told him to go and to follow the other car driven by Kintanilla; that although he knew "something was going to happen to Mrs. Navarro" he did not know exactly what was going to be done with her; that he pleaded with those present to forgive her, to let her go, stating that she was going back to Honolulu, but that both Mrs. Asis and Mrs. Galvez told him that they were going to punish her, and that they would not let her go; that after driving some distance Mrs. Asis told him to stop the automobile, and he did; that the women got out of the car, and that he then learned that they were going to put Mrs. Navarro "down in a hole"; that he protested again, but that Mrs. Galvez told the others to "go on, go ahead"; that Mrs. Galvez then took hold of Mrs. Navarro's arm and shoulder on one side, and Mrs. Asis took her by the arm and shoulder on the other side, and accompanied by the others they disappeared in the darkness, going toward the hole; that about half an hour afterwards they returned, but Mrs. Navarro was not with them; that they then re-entered the automobiles and drove back to Stockton.

As before stated, however, when petitioners were produced as witnesses at the trial and the district attorney sought to elicit from them the foregoing facts, they refused to testify upon the ground that their answers would tend to incriminate them.

The powers a trial court may exercise, and the rights and privileges a witness may claim under said constitutional privilege, are clearly defined in a number of cases, among them being In re Berman, 105 Cal. App. 37, 287 P. 126. Many of the earlier authorities are there cited and discussed, the most outstanding of which is the case of United States v. Burr (In re Willie), 25 Fed. Cas. page 38, No. 14,692e, wherein Chief Justice Marshall laid down certain rules for guidance which, as stated in the Berman Case, have since been followed universally in all jurisdictions. The learned Chief Justice there said: "When a question is propounded, it belongs to the court to consider and to decide whether any direct answer to it can implicate the witness. If this be decided in the negative, then he may answer it without violating the privilege which is secured to him by law. If a direct answer to it may criminate himself, then he must be the sole judge what his answer would be. The court cannot participate with him in this judgment, because they cannot decide on the effect of his answer without knowing what it would be; and a disclosure of that fact to the judges would strip him of the privilege which the law allows, and which he claims. It follows necessarily then, from this statement of things, that if the question be of such a description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness, according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be, to answer the question or not. If, in such a case, he say upon his oath that his answer would criminate himself, the court can demand no other testimony of the fact. If the declaration be untrue, it is in conscience and in law as much a perjury as if he had declared any other untruth upon his oath; as it is one of those cases in which the rule of law must be abandoned, or the oath of the witness be received. The counsel for the United States have also laid down this rule according to their understanding of it; but they appear to the court to have made it as much too narrow as the counsel for the witness have made it too broad. According to their statement a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of a crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible but a probable case that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description."

[1] Applying the foregoing rules to the cases of these petitioners, it becomes evident that they were entitled to the benefit of the privilege granted by the provisions of said constitutional guaranty, because manifestly the admission or confession on their part that they were among those who took the unfortunate Mrs. Navarro out to the place where it is claimed she was murdered, that they knew at the time she was removed from the automobile that she was to be done away with, and that one of the petitioners was present when Mrs. Navarro was shoved into the excavation and covered with earth, could be urged against them afterwards as strong circumstances tending to establish that they, too, were principals in the commission of the crime. True, as pointed out by the district attorney, both petitioners claimed in effect that up to the time they arrived at the scene of the crime they were unaware of the manner in which Mrs. Novarro was to be punished, and Santellian claimed that after he learned what was to be done he protested against it; but these circumstances alone would not exculpate them from criminal responsibility; and in any event the truth of their statements in this regard would be for a jury to pass upon, in case petitioners were thereafter charged with being parties to the crime; and, if rejected, their admissions that they were present at the scene of the crime at the time it was perpetrated, together with the other admissions above mentioned, would doubtless serve as incriminating facts tending to establish their guilt. Under such circumstances, petitioners, in our opinion, were entitled to claim said privilege. As stated in People ex rel. Taylor v. Forbes, 143 N. Y. 219, 38 N. E. 303, 306, cited in the Berman Case, if to the mind of the witness the testimony he is called upon to give "may constitute a link in the chain of testimony, sufficient to convict him when other facts are shown, or to put him in jeopardy, or subject him to the hazard of a criminal charge, indictment, or trial, he may remain silent."

The district attorney contends that petitioners in seeking to invoke the aid of said constitutional privilege are doing so for a fraudulent purpose—that they did not decline to testify because of any fear that their answers would be incriminating or subject them to prosecution for the commission of the crime—that their real purpose in so refusing was to shield and protect those who were then on trial for the commission of the crime. There are doubtless good grounds for so believing; nevertheless, the attending circumstances, as they are shown by the record before us, are such as to place petitioners in the position where they may legally claim the benefit of the constitutional privilege, and, that being so, under the decision in the Berman Case, it can make no difference what other purpose they may have sought to serve by their silence.

[2-4] The district attorney also cites authorities to the effect that a person may enter into a contract to waive said constitutional privilege, in which event he may be thereafter estopped from claiming the same; and in this connection it is contended that petitioners' agreement to testify at the trial to the same state of facts revealed by them before the grand jury constituted such a contract. We are unable to sustain this view. The action is one instituted and prosecuted by and in the name of the people of the state for the alleged commission of a crime; and consequently there can be no contractual relationships with the witnesses. In other words, any person having knowledge of material facts connected with the commission of a crime may be compelled to testify thereto, regardless of his personal inclinations, unless, as here, his testimony would tend to incriminate him; and any agreement attempted to be made by him as to whether or not he would testify would be wholly void and no rights whatever would be created thereunder. Nor did the fact that petitioners testified before the grand jury constitute a waiver of their right to claim the privilege at the trial of the action. Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 63 P. 372; In re Berman, supra.

For the reasons stated, it is our opinion that the imprisonment of the petitioner Eugenia Sales pursuant to said judgment of contempt is illegal; and therefore, so far as her commitment thereunder is concerned, she is discharged from custody.

James F. Hoey, Dist. Atty., of Martinez, and Lewis F. Byington, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

This is a proceeding in habeas corpus, whereby the petitioner, Pastor Santellian, seeks to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of Contra Costa county, after commitment issued pursuant to a judgment of contempt for refusing to testify as a witness for the prosecution in a criminal case then on trial in the superior court in and for said county, upon the ground that his answers to the questions would tend to incriminate him. It is a companion proceeding to one, this day decided, entitled: In the Matter of the Peti-

All of the facts and circumstances involved in the present proceeding are set forth and considered in the opinion filed therein; and for the reasons and upon the grounds there stated it is ordered that, so far as the commitment here involved is concerned, the petitioner be, and he is, hereby discharged from custody.

Mr. Presiding Justice PULLEN delivered the opinion of the court.

Petitioner herein seeks by this writ to review an order of the superior court modifying the terms of an interlocutory decree of divorce.

Pending the divorce trial, the parties entered into an agreement for a settlement of their property rights. This agreement, among other provisions, contained the following: "It is mutually agreed between the parties hereto that the wife in consideration of the premises and in consideration of the payment to her of $75.00, and $20.00 per month as hereinafter set forth, does by these presents, grant and convey unto the husband all the right, title and interest in and to all property now owned by the said husband and wife as community property; and in consideration for such release and conveyance by the said wife the said husband agrees to pay to the wife the sum of $75.00 plus the further sum of $20.00 per month in advance on the 10th. day of each calendar month commencing with the date hereof, and the wife hereby acknowledges receipt of the payment of said sum of $75.00, together with the further sum of $80.00 for said monthly payments otherwise due on the 10th. days of July, August, September and October, 1930." And "It is further agreed that in the event of the remarriage or death of the wife, that the aforesaid monthly payments of $20.00 shall terminate as of the date of such remarriage or death."

Upon her part the wife released the husband from any debts or liabilities owing by each to the other except the payments above set forth, released any right, interest, or title as heir at law or otherwise to any property of the husband, and waived any claim to contest or oppose the will of the husband or right to homestead allowance, and agreed that in any divorce proceedings pending or hereafter to be brought she would not have the right to recover costs, counsel fees, alimony, support or maintenance, thereby waiving all claims thereto and any claim for future maintenance or support; the agreement being intended as a complete adjustment of all property rights.

At the trial the defendant failed to appear, and his default was entered. Judgment was ordered for plaintiff, and the following was entered in the minutes of the court: "An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted plaintiff, property agreement confirmed. Plaintiff was awarded $20.00 per month for support beginning August 1, 1930, until the further order of the court."

Application by Helen Griffith for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Superi-

Subsequently a formal decree was signed by the court and filed in the records thereof, which decree embodied in full the agreement hereinbefore referred to between the parties, but made no reference to an allowance until further order of the court, as appeared in the minutes above.

A final decree was entered at the expiration of one year, which by reference adopted the terms of the interlocutory decree. Defendant continued to make payments of $20 monthly as provided in the agreement, but in May, 1933, moved the respondent court to modify the interlocutory decree by reducing the amount of $20 per month allowed therein as permanent support and maintenance, to nothing. This motion was based upon the terms of the minute order, which as will be noted, provided that payments should continue until terminated by order of court. Upon the hearing thereof the motion was granted, and petitioner, being dissatisfied, seeks here to review the order so made, contending that the formal decree submitted to the court and signed by the judge was the order of the court, and that the time had expired within which defendant could move to modify the same.

[1-3] The motion was properly directed to the interlocutory decree, for where, as here, the interlocutory decree deals with the status of the parties and also with their property rights, that decree, if not vacated in the mode prescribed by law, becomes a final decree as to such property rights. Abbott v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 660, 232 P. 154; Sullivan v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 531, 237 P. 782. The question urged by counsel is, What constitute the judgment and decree of the court, whether the minute order as entered by the clerk or the formal decree signed by the judge and filed in the case? There seems to be no doubt under the circumstances of this case the order as noted and entered by the clerk constitutes the order of the court. The defendant had defaulted and no findings were necessary nor required and none were made (Waldecker v. Waldecker, 178 Cal. 566, 174 P. 36), and, where findings are not required, the entry of its decision in the minutes of the court constitute a rendition of judgment. Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 488, 26 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Aspegren, etc., Co. v. Sherwood, etc., Co., 199 Cal. 532, 250 P. 400; Azadian v. Superior Court, 88 Cal. App. 296, 263 P. 298; In re Cook, 83 Cal. 415, 23 P. 332; Collins v. Beiland, 37 Cal. App. 139, 173 P. 601; Brown v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. App. 734, 234 P. 409, 411, which says: "Nor is it necessary that the judgment be signed by the judge. The judge's signature gives it no additional validity. 14 Cal. Jur. p. 914; Crim v. Kessing, supra. The principal object of the judge's signature is to afford the clerk a surer means of correctly entering what the court has adjudged." There are instances where the order should contain sufficient information on its face to apprise the parties of the scope and limit of the rights determined. This is particularly true in cases where injunctive relief is granted, for an injunction should contain sufficient information on its face to apprise the party upon whom it is served of what he is restrained from doing. Wheeler v. Superior Court, 82 Cal. App. 202, 255 P. 275. We do not believe, however, the decree necessary in the instant case is so complicated as to bring it within the foregoing rule. The entry in the minutes sets forth the interlocutory decree was granted, the confirmation of the property settlement, the amount of support, the amount and period of its duration, which seems complete in all its essential elements.

[4] Neither do we find any irreconcilable conflict between the minute entry of the clerk and the formal order filed in this proceeding. The wife in her agreement waived all claim she might have to support and maintenance, which agreement was confirmed by the interlocutory decree and spread upon the minutes of the court.

The court, however, acting within the scope of its authority, saw fit to award to the wife $20 per month for support until modified by further order; when the matter of continuing the payments thereof was again brought to the attention of the court, an order was made terminating the same. Such an order does not, nor does it appear that it was the purpose of the court in any way to, change or modify the written agreement of the parties and ratified by the court.

We must assume that petitioner meant to comply with her agreement when she executed the following: "The wife hereby waives, yields up any and all claims that she may have to support and maintenance from the said husband," and, "neither of the parties shall in any divorce proceeding now pending * * * have the right to recover there-in any * * * support or maintenance."

[5] The court had jurisdiction to make the original order directing the payment of support to the plaintiff in the divorce action and had authority to modify such order. Nothing is here said as to the validity of the property agreement between the parties which is not affected hereby; our attention being confined solely to the order of the court.

The writ is discharged.

Sept. 7, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 6,
1933.

1. Mandamus ☞172.

Court's erroneous determination that court made oral ruling constituting order denying motion to discharge attachment did not foreclose application for writ of mandate to enter order granting subsequent motion for same relief; being conclusion of law, not fact finding on conflicting evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 182, 951, 1003, and § 963, subd. 2).

2. Mandamus ☞172.

Trial court's erroneous conclusion on law question must be disregarded by reviewing tribunal.

3. Attachment ☞7.

Complaint alleging that consideration for purchase of land failed in material respects and that land was not adapted to growth of grapefruit, as defendants represented, stated cause of action in tort for fraud, so as to entitle defendant to writ of mandate requiring court to discharge attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 537).

4. Attachment ☞7.

Allegations of complaint, in action for fraudulent misrepresentations of quality of land, that defendants failed to perform covenants of lease from plaintiff, did not indicate that cause of action was for breach of contract so as to authorize attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 537).

Application by Thaddeus D. McCall for a writ of mandate to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Imperial.

Application granted, and issuance of writ ordered.

M. W. Conkling, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Harry W. Horton and S. L. McCrory, both of El Centro, for respondent.

JENNINGS, Justice.

The petitioner has made application to this court for the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel the respondent superior court to make and enter its order granting petitioner's motion to discharge an attachment issued in an action pending in said court entitled Harry E. Griffin and Almeda H. Griffin, Husband and Wife, Plaintiffs, v. Thaddeus D. McCall et al., Defendants.

The complaint of the plaintiffs in said action was set forth in three counts. In the first count it was alleged that plaintiffs had been induced to enter into an agreement to purchase certain land from the defendants and to pay therefor a specified sum of money in conformity with said agreement through certain alleged false and fraudulent representations regarding the quality of the land and its adaptability to the growth of grapefruit trees, which representations were made by the defendants with intent to deceive and defraud plaintiffs; that the said land was not suitable for the growth of said fruit trees; that upon discovery of the fraud plaintiffs had given notice of rescission and had demanded that the defendants return to them all moneys paid by plaintiffs on account of the purchase price of said land; that plaintiffs offered to return and redeliver possession of said land to the defendants.

The second count of the complaint was in the form of an action to recover the money paid by plaintiffs to defendants pursuant to the agreement for the sale of the land which, by reason of failure of consideration, it was alleged was held by the defendants for the use and benefit of plaintiffs.

The third count of the complaint was in the form of an action for money had and received. It is evident that the causes of action set forth in the three counts arose out of the same transaction and that they are in reality identical.

Upon the filing of the complaint in said action, the plaintiffs sought and obtained a writ of attachment and caused the same to be levied upon certain property of the defendants. The defendants thereupon moved the court to release from attachment all property in excess of that required to satisfy the demands of plaintiffs. This motion was granted and the court ordered all property released from attachment except the sum of $6,455 on deposit in a certain bank in the city of Los Angeles. Subsequently, the defendants filed an undertaking for the release of attachment, whereupon the court ordered that the property remaining under attachment be released. In the meantime the defendants in said action moved the court to dissolve the writ of attachment on the ground that it had been improperly issued. The record herein discloses the absence of any written order of court granting or denying the motion. It also appears that no entry was made in the minutes of the court indicating that the court took any action with respect to the motion. The cause later proceeded to trial and a judgment was finally rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount which they had paid on account of the purchase price of the land, together with interest on said sum. On March 7, 1933, ten days after the rendition of the aforesaid judgment, the defendant T. D. McCall, petitioner herein, moved the court to discharge the writ of attachment originally issued in the action of Griffin v. McCall on the ground that it had been improperly issued. On May 5, 1933, the respondent court on motion of the plaintiffs made its order striking from the files of the action the notice of motion to discharge the attachment filed by petitioner, T. D. McCall, on March 7, 1933, together with the affidavit of said T. D. McCall filed in support of the motion. This last order which constitutes the basis for the present proceeding was evidently made on the ground that the respondent court had in the year 1930 passed upon and determined adversely to petitioner the prior motion to discharge the attachment in said action and that the motion of petitioner to discharge the attachment made on March 7, 1933, was subject to the inhibition contained in section 182, Code of Civil Procedure, as this section then provided.

[1, 2] The first contention advanced by respondent is that the order of May 5, 1933, striking from the files the second motion to discharge the attachment and its supporting affidavit was necessarily based upon a finding that the court in 1930 had passed upon and refused a motion of the same tenor. In other words, it is urged that the respondent court made a finding upon a disputed question of fact, and that in accordance with the familiar rule a reviewing court may not disturb a finding of fact when it appears that the evidence respecting the fact is conflicting. It may be observed that there is no doubt that the evidence bearing upon the question of whether the court had passed upon and determined the first motion to discharge the attachment was conflicting. Affidavits alleging that the court had acted upon the prior motion and had denied it were presented by plaintiffs and a number of counter affidavits were filed by petitioner. Among the counter affidavits was one made by the judge before whom the action was pending in which affiant declares positively that he "made no ruling whatever upon the (prior) motion to dissolve the attachment."

There is, however, no doubt that whether or not the court passed upon the prior motion and orally announced his decision thereon, no written direction denying the motion was ever made and no entry appears in the court's minutes indicating that the court passed upon the motion. Section 1003 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that every direction of a court or judge, made or entered in writing and not included in a judgment, is denominated an order and that an application for an order is a motion. Petitioner's original motion for dissolution of the attachment was therefore an application for an order. Since the court made no written direction granting or denying the application, it follows that no order with respect to the application was ever made. That this must be true is further apparent, since subdivision 2 of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, specifically provides that an order dissolving or refusing to dissolve an attachment is an appealable order and section 951 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that on an appeal from an order the appellant must furnish the reviewing court with a copy of the order from which the appeal is taken. If the court could orally direct that a motion for discharge of attachment be denied and this could be regarded as an order, it would follow that the defendant could appeal therefrom; but since he could not furnish to the reviewing court a copy of the order his appeal would manifestly be unsuccessful.

Respondent's order striking from the files petitioner's motion to dissolve the attachment amounted to a refusal to entertain the motion, and it is alleged that the order was made on the ground that the prior motion for discharge of the attachment had been denied. However, in order that the court should have found that there was a denial of the prior motion it must have determined that its oral decision denying the motion was an order. The court's determination that there was an oral ruling denying the prior motion and that this oral ruling was an order amounts, not to a finding of fact, but to a conclusion upon a question of law, and as we think the court's conclusion in this regard was erroneous, we entertain the opinion that petitioner is not foreclosed from making application for a writ of mandate. An erroneous conclusion upon a question of law drawn by a trial court must be disregarded by a reviewing tribunal. Dufton v. Daniels, 190 Cal. 577, 581, 213 P. 949.

[3] The disposition of respondent's preliminary contention that the court's order striking petitioner's motion for dissolution of the attachment was based upon a finding of fact upon conflicting evidence leaves for consideration respondent's principal contention which is that the writ of attachment properly issued and that petitioner's application for the issuance of a writ of mandate requiring respondent to discharge the attachment should not be granted.

In this connection, it is urged that the complaint in Griffin v. McCall alleges that there was an entire failure of consideration, and that under such circumstances the law implies a promise to return the money paid on account of the contract. It is further pointed out that the complaint alleges a rescission of the contract by the vendees on the ground that the consideration had entirely failed and a demand in the prayer of the complaint, not for damages occasioned to the plaintiffs through the fraud of the defendants, but for the return of the money paid on the purchase price. It is argued that these circumstances show that the cause of action alleged in Griffin v. McCall was not one sounding in tort, but that it was in reality a cause of action sounding in contract based on the implied contract of the vendors to return the money paid on the purchase price after it had become evident that the consideration for the promise of the vendees to pay the agreed price for the land had entirely failed. It is contended that these facts show that the action was one based upon an implied contract for the direct payment of money, and that it therefore came strictly within the provisions of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the writ of attachment properly issued, and that petitioner is not entitled to have the attachment dissolved as having been improperly issued.

We think that respondent's contention in this regard may not be sustained. The carefully worded allegation of the complaint with respect to failure of consideration is that "the consideration running to these plaintiffs for the making and entering into said contract has failed in all material respects," (Italics ours.) It is significant that the findings of the trial court were to the same effect, viz.: "That the consideration * * * has failed in material respects." We think that an allegation that the consideration has failed in all material respects is not equivalent to an allegation of total failure of consideration. It is further to be noted that the complaint contains no allegation that the land which was sold to plaintiffs was valueless, the allegations in this regard being confined to statements that the land, because of the quality of its soil and climatic conditions, was not adapted or suited to the growth of grapefruit. It is also admitted in the complaint that the plaintiffs had received the sum of $86.43 from the sale of grapefruit produced on the land.

These circumstances strongly indicate that the gravamen of the action in Griffin v. McCall was fraud and that the cause of action was therefore one which sounded in tort rather than in contract. We think therefore that the reasoning of the Supreme Court in Stone v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. 272, 4 P.(2d) 777, 77 A. L. R. 743, is directly applicable to the problem here presented and that on the authority of the aforesaid decision petitioner's application should be granted. Respondent contends that Stone v. Superior Court, supra, has in effect been overruled by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Bennett v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 21 P.(2d) 946. We do not so understand it. It is clearly stated in the later decision that no element of fraud entered into the transaction which constituted the foundation for the cause of action therein and that the entire transaction sounded in contract. It is pointed out that the Stone Case held strictly to the rule that an action based on fraud is ex delicto and that no implied contract for the direct payment of money, or any other honest implication could possibly be ingrafted upon a transaction that was fraudulent ab initio. The decisions in Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1, San Francisco Iron & Metal Co. v. Abraham et al., 211 Cal. 552, 296 P. 82, and Powers v. Freeland, 114 Cal. App. 146, 299 P. 736, are in line with the decision in Stone v. Superior Court, and confirm our opinion that petitioner's motion for discharge of the attachment in Griffin v. McCall should have been granted.

[4] Petitioner endeavors to make some point of the fact that the complaint in Griffin v. McCall contained allegations that in a certain lease agreement executed by plaintiffs as lessors and the McCall Brothers Company, a corporation, as lessee, the lessee agreed to farm the land and to irrigate, cultivate, and fertilize the same and prune the trees and to develop the land into a mature and profitable grapefruit grove, and that the defendants in said action did not properly perform their contract in this regard. These allegations are said to indicate that the cause of action in Griffin v. McCall was not entirely one ex delicto and that bound up in it and forming a part of it is an alleged breach of contract by the defendants in said action sufficient to support the issuance of the writ of attachment. The contention thus presented may not be sustained. The allegations with respect to the execution of the lease and the failure of defendants to perform their covenants to cultivate, irrigate, and fertilize the land are entirely incidental to the cause of action set out in the first count, which is unmistakably one based solely and entirely on the alleged fraud perpetrated by defendants and therefore a cause of action sounding purely in tort. There is no contention that the causes of action for money had and received and for money held for the benefit of plaintiffs in the action are different in any respect from the cause of action set forth in the first count. The decisions in Stone v. Superior Court, supra, and Powers v. Freeland, supra, are therefore directly in point and furnish ample authority for the issuance of a writ of mandate requiring the superior court, respondent herein, to discharge the writ of attachment illegally issued by it in the case of Griffin v. McCall et al.

Petitioner's application is therefore granted, and it is ordered that the writ issue as prayed for.

Action on guaranty for price of hay delivered to buyer within three years of filing of amended complaint held not barred by three or four year limitation statutes, since liability did not accrue until hay was delivered and buyer failed to pay (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subds. 1, 4).

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

From a judgment rendered against him as principal upon a writing signed by him as agent for one Robert Gardiner, president of defendant Jersey Farm Dairy Company, a corporation, defendant Masters has appealed.

The writing upon which the action is based is in the form of a letter on the stationery of Jersey Farm Dairy Company, addressed to plaintiff, which in effect guarantees "future purchases of Mr. Pete Deghi" from plaintiff for feeding his cows. The letter was signed, "Robert Gardiner, By Geo. Masters." The original complaint was filed April 29, 1929, against defendant Jersey Farm Dairy Company, Golden State Milk Products Company, Robert Gardiner, George Masters, and Pete Ciabbarri, and sets forth eight deliveries of hay to Deghi, sold solely by reason of said guaranty. The case was tried before the Honorable Raglan Tuttle, who filed an opinion in writing in which he found that the written guaranty had been executed by defendant Masters without any authorization from the other defendants and without belief on his part that he had authority to so act. The court ordered briefs to be filed on the question of amendment of the complaint. After considering the briefs submitted it then made an order granting leave to plaintiff to file its proposed amended complaint, which in effect alleged, in addition to the allegations of the original complaint, excluding allegations referring to the other defendants, that Masters executed said writing without believing in good faith that he had authority so to do. The court also ordered that all defendants except Masters have judgment against plaintiff. The amended complaint was filed June 10, 1930. The eight alleged sales and deliveries of hay to Deghi occurred on different dates from December 19, 1927, to February 14, 1928. An answer to the amended complaint was filed by defendant Masters on June 20, 1930, which among other defenses pleaded the statute of limitations, and the cause came on for trial on the issues raised by the amended complaint and answer before the Honorable Thomas C. Gould, on September 26, 1930, who found in substance that the writing was executed and delivered by Masters without any belief in good faith or at all that he had authority to sign the same; that he did not have authority so to do; that plaintiff sold and delivered said hay relying upon said guaranty; and that Masters had notice of such deliveries and of the amount thereof. Judgment was entered on such findings for $2,658.35 against Masters.

Appellant contends (1) that he was deprived of a fair trial in that neither judge heard and weighed the entire testimony taken; (2) that the trial court erred in permitting the amendment of the complaint as it did and changing the complaint from an ex contractu liability to one ex delicto; (3) that no bad faith is shown by the evidence on Masters' part; and (4) that the action is barred by the statute.

[1] 1. The record shows that at the trial before Judge Gould both sides stipulated that the hay was sold and delivered to Deghi as alleged in the amended complaint, that it had not been paid for, and that Deghi was at all times a shipper of the Jersey Farm Dairy Company, which was a condition of the continuing guaranty. Evidence was then introduced by plaintiff proving the execution of the writing by Masters and that Deghi's financial condition was such that plaintiff would not sell him without a guaranty of his account and would not have delivered him any hay except for such guaranty. Defendant Masters, who was the auditor of Jersey Farm Dairy Company and who also kept Deghi's books, testified that he had no authority from any one to execute the writing, and that he knew Gardiner, defendant company's president, would not sign any such letter because he had frequently so told him.

So far as the record shows, no objection was made to proceeding before the second judge, but it apparently shows a perfect willingness to so proceed on the part of both parties. So far as the record shows there was no necessity to resort to any of the evidence produced at the first trial, and that produced before Judge Gould amply supports the judgment. As far as the evidence is concerned, the second trial had no relation to the first, and appellant had the benefit of a trial before a judge who had not already found against him on the material point involved. We fail to see where he was prejudiced in any way.

[2] 2. There has been some confusion in the past as to the nature of the liability upon which this action is based. Some of the decisions hold that to treat it as a liability on the contract, which did not have apt language to charge the agent personally, would result in making a new contract for the parties (Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 567, 89 Am. Dec. 64), and that the only remedy against an agent so acting is either for damages for breach of his warranty of authority to execute the contract or for deceit. Section 2343 of the Civil Code makes one who assumes to act as agent "responsible to third persons as a principal for his acts" when he enters into a written contract in the name of his principal without believing, in good faith that he has authority so to do. Whatever the doubt may have been in the past as to such liability, in our opinion it is now set at rest by the well-reasoned case of Borton v. Barnes, 48 Cal. App. 589, 192 P. 307, 309, in which the Supreme Court refused to grant a hearing. In that case the defendant, an officer of a corporation, without authority so to do, entered into a written contract in the name of the company employing a broker to sell certain real estate belonging to the corporation. The first count of the complaint, as in the complaint here, charged that defendant entered into the contract without believing in good faith that he had the authority to do so, and the court so found. It was contended on appeal that plaintiff's only right of action was under the second and third counts, which had been dismissed, and some of the same cases are cited as are cited by appellant here on his contention that the action is one ex delicto and not on the contract. The court, after discussing the cases holding otherwise and also section 2343 of the Civil Code, held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover "in the same manner as he could have done had the defendant been the real principal in the transaction." The court quotes with approval from the case of Kennedy v. Stonehouse, 13 N. D. 232, 241, 100 N. W. 258, 260, 3 Ann. Cas. 217, 219. In the latter case the court decided that, whatever the modern rule might be, the Legislature, in taking from the proposed Field Code the provisions from which our own sections 2342 and 2343 of the Civil Code are copied in toto, which codified the law of New York as announced in the earlier decisions in that state, adopted the rule of liability announced in such cases, saying: "It does not admit of doubt that plaintiff has a right of action upon the contract against the defendant as principal therein, for the statute just quoted declares in express language that 'one who enters into a written contract in the name of his principal without believing in good faith that he has authority to do so'—and that is this case—'is responsible to third persons as a principal.'" (Italics ours.) We are of the opinion that there was no change in the nature of the action by the amendment, and that it was properly made.

[3] 3. Appellant's own testimony amply supports the finding that he entered into the contract in the name of the principal without believing in good faith that he had authority so to do, and that is all the statute requires.

[4, 5] 4. It is urged that the cause of action is barred by subsections 1 or 4 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure. The liability under the guaranty did not accrue until the sales were made and Deghi had failed to pay. Assuming that the price was to be paid in cash on delivery, no liability could accrue until the date of delivery at the earliest. All of the deliveries appear to be within three years from the date the amended complaint was filed, so there seems to be no merit in appellant's contention, even assuming that it is a liability created by statute. Under the cases cited, however, the liability being that of the principal, who is not bound by the unauthorized contract, would, as we have said, seem to be one founded upon an instrument in writing, action on which is barred if not brought within four years from its accrual. Section 337 (1), Code Civ. Proc.

Appellant also urges that section 2343 of the Civil Code should be literally construed if in derogation of the common law. The section does not seem to need any construction, as its language is clear and definite.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Criminal law §511(3).

Evidence corroborating accomplice must tend in some degree to implicate defendant, but it need not be by direct evidence (Pen. Code, § 1111).

2. Criminal law §511(1).

Evidence corroborating accomplice held sufficient to support conviction for kidnapping (Pen. Code, § 1111).

The sheriff who arrested defendant testified to statements made by defendant implicating himself in kidnapping, and testimony of accomplice was also corroborated by persons who were kidnapped.

3. Criminal law §369(1).

Ordinarily, evidence of commission of other independent offenses by defendant is inadmissible.

4. Criminal law §369(2).

Evidence that other independent offenses were committed by codefendant held not inadmissible in kidnapping prosecution.

5. Criminal law §369(2).

Testimony respecting collection by kidnappers of money offered by victims as price of release held not inadmissible as evidence of other offense committed subsequent to consummation of object of conspiracy (Pen. Code, § 209).

As regards admissibility of evidence of other offenses committed by codefendant after object of conspiracy was consummated, crime of kidnapping for purpose of extortion and robbery was not complete when victims were released from enforced confinement.

6. Kidnapping §5.

Evidence showing attempted destruction of defendant's clothing by accomplice in kidnapping before payment of final installment of money demanded of victim held admissible (Pen. Code, § 209).

JENNINGS, Justice.

The defendant and seven other persons, including James Doolen, were jointly accused by an indictment returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county of the crime of kidnapping for the purposes of extortion and robbery. Upon arraignment the defendant entered a plea of not guilty and a plea of former jeopardy. The trial of the cause resulted in a verdict of conviction of the charge of kidnapping and a verdict in favor of the people upon defendant's plea of former jeopardy. The defendant then presented to the trial court a motion for a new trial, which was denied. The court thereupon pronounced judgment upon the defendant whereby it was ordered that he be imprisoned in the state prison at Folsom. From the judgment thus rendered, and from the court's order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

Appellant specifies three alleged errors committed by the trial court which he contends entitle him to a reversal of the judgment. These are, first, that the court erred in denying his motion to dismiss the indictment on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to corroborate the testimony of the alleged accomplice, James Doolen, regarding the participation of appellant in the commission of the offense; second, that the court improperly admitted evidence of other crimes and offenses over appellant's objection; third, that the court erroneously admitted evidence of acts and transactions which occurred and declarations that were made subsequent to the consummation of the object of the conspiracy.

[1,2] With reference to the first of the aforesaid errors allegedly committed by the trial court, it may be remarked that the record shows that the witness James Doolen was an accomplice of appellant in the commission of the offense of which appellant was convicted, and that the testimony of this accomplice which detailed appellant's participation in the offense undoubtedly contributed largely to appellant's conviction.

No useful purpose can be subserved by indulging in an extended discussion of the legal principles involved in the subject of corroboration of accomplices. Section 1111 of the Penal Code of California provides that a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by other evidence which tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense.

The defense of noncorroboration is a most common defense in cases of the character of that in which this appeal is presented, particularly when, as here appears, the prosecution relies most strongly upon the accomplice's testimony to establish a defendant's guilt. The following language from the decision in People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 473, 229 P. 40, 49, contains a correct statement of the rule applicable to the problem which is here presented: "It has been held that to corroborate an accomplice the evidence need not establish the actual commission of the offense, nor extend to every fact and detail covered by the statements of the accomplice, or to all the elements of the offense, nor prove that the accomplice has told the truth. The corroborative evidence must tend in some slight degree, at least, to implicate the defendant. While it need not be strong, more is required by way of corroboration than a mere suspicion. It is sufficient if the corroborating evidence tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, though if it stood alone it would be entitled to little weight. It is not necessary to corroborate the accomplice by direct evidence. If the connection of the accused with the alleged crime may be inferred from the corroborating evidence in the case, it is sufficient."

The record herein shows that the testimony of the accomplice was corroborated in many essential features by the testimony of other witnesses who appeared during the trial of the action. In particular, it was corroborated by the testimony of the witness Thomas F. Donaldson. This witness, who was the sheriff of Duncin county in the state of Missouri, arrested appellant near Malden, Mo., on October 9, 1932. During the course of his testimony he related a conversation which he had with appellant subsequent to the latter's arrest. During this conversation appellant made certain statements relative to the commission of the offense and in particular made the following statement: "It is just a case of one racket playing on another; if we had kidnapped a legitimate business man we should have deserved punishment. * * * The amount was demanded of him, he would make in a month." He also stated the name of the victim of the plot which was described in detail in the accomplice's testimony. The details of the kidnapping were related fully in the testimony of the witnesses E. L. Caress and Mrs. E. L. Caress and fully corroborated the testimony of the accomplice with regard to this feature of the case except that the last-named witnesses did not identify any of the persons who held them up and kept them prisoners for more than 24 hours. Another witness, C. A. Jenks, a police officer of the city of Long Beach, testified that he was present at a shooting affray which took place at Long Beach on the evening of December 21, 1930, between a number of men who were in a Dodge automobile and two police officers, and that appellant was one of the men who were in the rear seat of the automobile at that time. This latter testimony is corroborative of the testimony of the accomplice regarding the affray and of appellant's presence at the time of its occurrence.

Reference might be made to the testimony of other witnesses produced by the prosecution which in certain particulars corroborated the accomplice's testimony. We think that no useful purpose would be served by thus amplifying the opinion herein. From that portion of the testimony which is specifically noted it is obvious that there was sufficient corroboration of the accomplice's testimony to meet the requirements of the statute, and that the court's action in refusing to dismiss the accusation against appellant was amply justified. It follows likewise that the judgment may not be disturbed as being one based upon a verdict which lacks evidentiary support.

[3,4] In support of his contention that the trial court committed reversible error in admitting evidence of other offenses, appellant cites certain evidence which was admitted over his objection which tended to show the commission of other crimes by individuals other than appellant who had been jointly indicted with appellant for the commission of the crime of kidnapping. To support his contention that the admission of such evidence constituted reversible error, appellant relies on the well-established rule that evidence of the commission of other independent offenses by a defendant in a criminal action is not admissible to prove the commission of the particular crime of which he is accused and for which he is being tried. Subject to certain exceptions which it is not here necessary to discuss, the existence of the rule is conceded. The reasons which support the rule are that the commission of offenses other than that charged does not constitute a necessary link in the evidentiary chain; that it tends to divert the attention of the fact triers from the main issue in the case which is the defendant's guilt or innocence of the particular crime charged; that the admission of such evidence is highly prejudicial to the defendant. People v. Gibson, 107 Cal. App. 76, 289 P. 937; People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259, 261, 137 P. 1076.

It is apparent, however, that the rule is not here applicable. The evidence of which he complains was evidence which tended to prove that certain independent offenses were committed by certain of his codefendants. Our attention has not been called to any evidence which tended in any way to connect appellant with the commission of these independent crimes. The record herein indicates that appellant was tried separately from his codefendants. We are not therefore warranted in indulging in the violent assumption that appellant was in the least prejudiced by the admission of evidence tending to prove that certain individuals indicted jointly with him for the commission of a specified offense had committed other independent offenses.

[5, 6] Appellant's third specification of error is that the court improperly admitted evidence of other offenses which were committed and other transactions which occurred subsequent to the consummation of the object of the conspiracy. Reliance is placed upon the general rule that acts and declarations of a confederate which are admissible against a defendant in a criminal action may be only those which were performed and made during the pendency of the criminal enterprise and in furtherance of its objects, and that acts and declarations of a coconspirator done and made subsequent to the accomplishment of the object of the conspiracy are not to be regarded as contributing to the execution of the original common design. People v. Aleck, 61 Cal. 138.

The evidence which was admitted of which appellant here complains consists of the testimony of the accomplice Doolen which related to the burning by Doolen and Frank of the house in which the victims of the kidnapping were confined after their seizure, the attempted destruction of appellant's clothing by Doolen, and the repeated demands for money made by Doolen of Caress and the payment of certain sums of money by Caress to Doolen subsequent to the release of Caress and his wife by appellant and those who were jointly indicted with him. It is evidently appellant's view that, after the release of the victims from their enforced confinement, the object of the conspiracy was fully consummated, and that although, as here appears, no money or property had then been secured, no evidence relating to the performance of any act by any one of the conspirators which occurred subsequent to such release is admissible in evidence. This contention is carried to the point that it is urged that testimony relating to the collection by one of the conspirators of the identical sum of money which was originally offered by the victim as the price of the release of himself and his wife was inadmissible, and that its reception constituted reversible error. The statement of this naive contention carries its own refutation. Appellant and his confederates were charged with the crime of kidnapping for the purposes of extortion and robbery, an offense denounced by section 209 of the Penal Code. We take it to be self-evident that kidnapping in the general acceptance of the term is no childish pastime indulged in merely for the sake of the sport. The very language of the statute denounces kidnapping as a crime when it is practiced "for purposes of extortion or robbery." It is therefore evident that the object of kidnapping which is made an offense by the statute is not primarily the seizure and restraint of the victim, but the mulcting him or his relatives or friends of money or other property through coercion. The record herein shows that the attempted destruction of appellant's clothing by the accomplice Doolen took place prior to the payment to the accomplice of the final installment of money demanded of the victim Caress. The evidence relating to this fact was therefore, in our opinion, relevant and competent, and the trial court properly admitted it.

[7] It does appear from the record that the burning of the house occurred shortly after the payment of the final installment of money by Caress. The accomplice testified that he and a codefendant set fire to the house where the victims of the kidnapping were confined because it was feared that fingerprints of some of the persons engaged in the plot might be discovered about the premises. It nowhere appears in the record that appellant participated in the firing of the house or that he knew of it or was in any way connected with it. Frankness impels the declaration that, if this evidence had been excluded, the jury nevertheless could have entertained no reasonable doubt as to the commission of the offense charged or of appellant's active participation in its accomplishment. This being true, no substantial rights of appellant were affected by the admission of the evidence and, even if it be assumed that error was committed by its reception, the error was harmless and must be disregarded. Pen. Code, § 1258; People v. Stokes, 5 Cal. App. 205, 213, 89 P. 997; People v. Lorraine, 90 Cal. App. 317, 334, 265 P. 893.

The judgment and order from which this appeal has been taken are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; THOMPSON, J., dissenting.

Conley, Conley & Conley, of Fresno, for appellant.

F. M. Ostrander and C. Ray Robinson, both of Merced, for respondents.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action for damages for malpractice. The defendant is a dentist. A jury awarded the plaintiffs the sum of $12,000. On motion for a new trial, the court made its order that said motion would be denied on condition that the plaintiffs remit $4,500 of the judgment. The plaintiffs conformed to the condition, and the motion was thereupon denied.

This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment, and also from an order of the court denying his motion for a judgment in his favor, notwithstanding the verdict.

The first assignment of error is that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. Before examining the evidence, it is well to state a few of the settled principles of law, relative to this class of actions, which, in our opinion, control the question of the sufficiency of the evidence adduced on the trial to sustain the verdict and the judgment.

[1] Barham v. Widing, 210 Cal. 206-213, 291 P. 173, 176, is authority for the rule "that a dentist, like a physician, is required to have and use only the degree of learning and skill which is ordinarily possessed by dentists of good professional reputation in that locality. This is the rule with respect to physicians. Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654. Undoubtedly the same rule applies to dentists."

[2] In Roberts v. Parker, 121 Cal. App. 264-267, 8 P.(2d) 908, 909, after citing with approval the above rule, it is held that it is also well settled that neither physician nor dentist can be held to guarantee the results of his professional services. "However, it is equally well settled that in undertaking the treatment of a patient the practitioner impliedly contracts and represents not only that he possesses the reasonable degree of skill and learning possessed by others of his profession in the locality, but that he will use reasonable and ordinary care and skill in the application of such knowledge to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed; and that, if injury is caused by a want of such skill or care on his part, he is liable for the consequences which follow. Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 P. 128; Nelson v. Painless Parker, 104 Cal. App. 770, 286 P. 1078; Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642; Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654; Ley v. Bishopp, 88 Cal. App. 313, 263 P. 369; Patterson v. Marcus, 203 Cal. 550, 265 P. 222."

[3] A settled principle of law is stated in Barham v. Widing, supra, 210 Cal. 214, 291 P. 173, 176, as follows: "It is equally true that cases which depend upon knowledge of the scientific effect of medicine, or the result of surgery, must ordinarily be established by expert testimony of physicians and surgeons. Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642. This rule, however, applies only to such facts as are peculiarly within the knowledge of such professional experts, and not to facts which may be ascertained by the ordinary use of the senses of a nonexpert." The foregoing doctrine is also sustained in Roberts v. Parker, supra; Patterson v. Marcus, supra; Nelson v. Painless Parker, supra.

[4] We must also keep in mind the well-settled rule of law, that the appellate court cannot disturb a finding of the trial court or the verdict of a jury, for lack of evidentiary support, unless such finding or verdict is without substantial support in the evidence. 10 Cal. Jur. 1165, § 378; Jacobson v. N. W. P. R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 P. 3; Perera v. Panama-Pacific Int. Exp. Co., 179 Cal. 63, 175 P. 454.

In the light of these recognized principles of law, we will examine the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining whether the verdict is sustained by any substantial evidence.

[5] On the morning of March 5, 1920, the appellant, Dr. A. F. England, who was a duly licensed dentist, practicing his profession in the city of Merced, was performing certain dental work for the plaintiff, Mrs.

Mae G. Walter. (The latter's husband is joined herein as plaintiff because of the marital relation.) Preliminary to the extraction of two of Mrs. Walter's teeth, Dr. England selected a hypodermic needle and syringe for the purpose of giving a local anæsthetic of novocaine, and inserted the needle in the fibrous tissue of the gum on the right side of the lower jaw. The needle thus inserted broke, and about one inch of it remained in the internal pterygoid muscle of the patient's jaw. Although there have been operations to remove the needle, they have been unsuccessful, and, according to Mrs. Walter, the embedded needle causes her to suffer severe pain, headaches, and nervousness.

E. L. Walter accompanied his wife to the office of Dr. England, and was present when the needle was broken. He testified in substance that upon entering the office he said, "Good morning, Doctor; how are you feeling? Something to that effect"; to which the doctor said he felt like hell. "Well, he said he had been up to Stockton the night before at a dental meeting; that he felt terrible; that he had a very severe attack of hay fever; that particular morning it had been bothering him." The witness stated further that during the time the doctor was operating upon his wife he (the witness) was "standing right along * * * right beside the chair. * * *" "He worked on the tooth that he was going to extract. He took this needle or bone, or whatever they call it, and he injected it into her right jaw and when he did he let out an oath and said we were in an awful mess * * *. He said, 'Jesus Christ, we are in for a hell of a mess.' I said, 'What is the matter, doctor; what did you do?' 'Well,' he said, 'this needle is broke off; we've got to get it out in a hurry.'" In answer to a question as to the time that it took after he started to inject the needle, and such time as he made the statement, the witness said, "Well, I would say it was momentarily * * * well, he turned, he got this injection, this needle, and naturally opened her mouth, and I saw him making the injection, and he turned and made that remark."

"Q. How much time elapsed from the time that you saw him make the injection until he turned and made the remark, if you know? A. Oh, I don't imagine it was more than a second or two.

"Q. Now, then, after he had made this remark and stated that he had to get the needle out right away, then what did he do, if anything? A. Why, he put the * * * he brought the end of the thing down that he had in his hand, and proceeded to lance the gum; went in to try and get the needle out.

"Q. And during the time of that operation, did he say anything to you or show you anything in regard to the needle? A. Well, when he lanced it, he worked quite a little while probing, and so forth, and when he lanced clear in, I don't know what you would call it, but nevertheless, it was way in the back of the jaw. I was standing right there and he showed me; I would say there was a hole in the gum in the back where the two jaws come together; it appeared to be probably half an inch in diameter, or something of that sort, and I observed a—I called it a strap hinge, it was a little piece, it looked to me like a little pink strip of cartilage, and he took his probe and he said, 'Well, here's where the thing went in,' and he said, 'I made the mistake of not putting it on either side'; he said, 'I shoved it right through the center of it, and that is the cartilage and gristly and very tough,' and he says, 'that is what caused it to break.' Inasmuch as it is broken and closed over the needle, he couldn't cut that or she would lose the use of her jaw, so he stopped cutting at that time; didn't try to lance any further."

"Q. And when he showed you that point, and stated that he made a mistake, that he ought to go on either side, did he say anything in regard to what caused the needle to break? A. Yes, that shoving through that cartilage, that tough part.

"Q. Did he say anything else in reference to that, other than what you have related as to where the needle should have been placed? A. On either side of it."

The witness further testified that at another time he called at Dr. England's office and asked him if, when the doctor went to San Francisco, he would not call on his insurance company and tell them that he had made a mistake on a friend and reimburse him for the expense. At which request the doctor broke down and cried and said: "I will. It is very decent of you to come in here and take the attitude that you have taken," and he said, 'I'll go down to my insurance company when I am in San Francisco and will tell them that I have made a mistake, and I'll be back either tomorrow or the next day and will come in and let you know what the results have been.'" He further stated that the doctor did not come in to see him on his return from San Francisco, and he had not spoken to him since.

Plaintiff Mae E. Walter testified that she and her husband and Dr. and Mrs. England had been on terms of social intimacy and friendship over a long period of time; that on the morning of March 5, 1927, she and her husband visited Dr. England by appointment to have some dental work done for her. She said, "Hello, Doc, how are you?" and he said he felt like hell. She asked him the trouble and he said he was out till the wee hours of the morning, and had a terrible case of hay fever. She got into the dentist's chair and he looked over her teeth and did some cleaning and put some iodine in her mouth. He looked at the tooth that had been aching and said it had to come out, and also a wisdom tooth needed to be extracted. Then he started to inject the hypodermic needle. In answer to a question she said, "Well, it seemed to me that it went in all at one time—just went right straight in; it went in just very quickly."

"Q. Then, did Dr. England say anything to you in regard to the needle? A. Yes, he uttered an oath; said we were in for an awful mess."

The witness further testified in response to a question that from the time he first injected the needle, that is, from the time she first felt the point of it in contact with her gum, until he said they were in an awful mess, the time that elapsed was—"A. Well, just as quick as that, I don't know; a few seconds." (Mr. Ostrander: For the record, indicating by a snap of his fingers.)

"Q. Then, after the needle broke off, what did he do? A. Well, he showed Mr. Walter where it went in; he first began to carve and try and get the needle, because he could see, he said, where it was, and carved for quite some time before he took an X-ray; then he lost it and could not see it; he took X-rays.

"Q. And, do you remember what he said to Mr. Walter? A. Yes, he said that 'I have made a mistake—this is where I made my mistake,' he said, 'I should have—I put it through the cartilage and it should have been put on the side.'"

On January 3, 1930, the witness again visited Dr. England's office in company with a Mrs. Wayne, and the doctor took X-rays, and the witness testified she asked him if the needle had moved and he said, "Yes, possibly a quarter of an inch."

Mrs. L. A. Wayne, called as a witness, testified that she was present with Mrs. Walter in the office of Dr. England when an X-ray picture was taken, and, after the doctor had examined the pictures, heard him say the needle had moved a little.

Anne Johnson, who was the nurse in the office of Dr. England, and who was present at the time of the accident, testified that the length of time that elapsed from the time that Dr. England began the operation until the needle broke was from thirty to forty-five seconds.

Dr. England testified that he intended to pull the six year old molar and the wisdom tooth on the lower right jaw of the patient; that he was using a Cook's carpule syringe of the cartridge type; that the anæsthesia to be given was a block anæsthesia with novocaine, which, in the language of the witness, "It means that we inject back into the mandible, the ramus of the mandible, blocking the inferior dental nerve which supplies all the teeth of the lower jaw on that side." He further testified that the time that elapsed from the time he first inserted the needle in the tissue until it broke was fifteen, thirty, or forty-five seconds. He did not time himself in the injection. Dr. England further testified as to the entire course pursued by him in the treatment of the patient, which included calling in another dentist, consulting an oral surgeon living in Oakland, and various other steps, including the taking of X-ray pictures. Dr. England denied the statements which were attributed to him by the plaintiffs. After the testimony of defendant had been given, his counsel propounded to experts a hypothetical question based upon the testimony of the doctor, and, in answering the question, the experts stated that in their opinion the procedure followed by Dr. England, using the language of one of them, "would do justice to any community in the United States." Included in the question last adverted to was the following: "That the doctor placed the syringe in the right hand, resting his thumb on the plunger, and that prior to the injection, or the commencing of the injection of the anæsthetic, the doctor determined the internal oblique line by palpation with the left index finger, along the lower right jaw, and determined the point for the injection as approximately one centimeter above the occlusal surface of the plane of the lower molar teeth, the distance being measured with the eye; assuming that there was no inflammation visible about the area in which the injection was to be made, and that the doctor began the insertion of the needle at the point of selection, using the center of his left index fingernail as a guide, and gradually inserted the needle, commencing to inject the solution immediately after the entrance of the needle and continuing as the needle moved farther into the tissue; that the doctor did not change the angle of the needle after making the puncture of the tissue and felt no obstacle or resistance other than the normal resistance of the tissue; that the needle broke suddenly and without warning near the hub of the syringe, but the hub of the syringe did not touch the gum, it being about an eighth of an inch from the gum at the time the needle broke; that the broken end of the needle completely disappeared in the tissue * * and that the needle broke about thirty or forty-five seconds after the commencement of the injection of the novocaine."

The foregoing portion of the hypothetical question is consistent with the testimony of Dr. England, but it is inconsistent with the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Walter, wherein the latter witnesses testified that the length of time that elapsed from the time of the first insertion of the needle to the time it broke was not more than a second or two, and that, when he injected the needle into her jaw, he let out an oath and said, "We are in for a hell of a mess." It is inconsistent with the statements of Dr. England, made to Walter at the time, that he had made a mistake; that he shoved the needle right through the cartilage, which is gristly and very tough; that he should have put it on either side; and that is what caused it to break. This, coupled with his further statement to Mr. Walter, that he would tell the insurance company he had made a mistake, merely raised a conflict in the evidence. It is true that all of these statements were denied by the doctor, but, in spite of the fact that questions of method and procedure in cases of this kind can be passed upon only by experts, still the matters testified to by the plaintiffs are not technical matters, but purely questions which may be evidenced by non-expert witnesses. It is said in Barham v. Widing, supra, in speaking of the necessity of expert testimony to establish the result of surgery: "This rule, however, applies only to such facts as are peculiarly within the knowledge of such professional experts, and not to facts which may be ascertained by the ordinary use of the senses of a nonexpert."

In Nelson v. Painless Parker, 104 Cal. App. 770-774, 286 P. 1078, 1080, it is said: "Appellants' next contention is that in an action of this kind expert evidence is necessary to establish the negligence, and that there being none, the judgment should be reversed. We will agree with the first part of this proposition partially only, for reasons which will later be more particularly referred to. But as has been said heretofore, there was some testimony of experts relative to what should have been done by the operating dentist, and it was for the jury to determine the facts. They saw and heard the witnesses and saw the gestures which illustrated the proper thing to be done, and were in a better position to resolve the conflict than is an appellate court. It is true that the evidence of negligence in the instant case was slight, and its probative value may not be great, but we may not interfere with the finding of the jury on that account. As has been said by the Supreme Court in a recent case, 'Where the verdict of the jury and the judgment based thereon may be sustained on any reasonable theory, it will not be disturbed by an appellate court.' Rocha v. Garcia, 203 Cal. 167, 263 P. 238, 240."

Under these authorities we have in the record the evidence of Dr. England as to his procedure in the case at bar. We have the evidence of other experts that such procedure was proper, but we also have the evidence of the plaintiffs on the lay matters that he did not follow such procedure. As an example, instead of taking thirty to forty-five seconds to insert the needle and inject the novocaine, he did so in one or two seconds. Dr. England is certainly an expert, and, according to the testimony of the plaintiffs, he admitted that he shoved the needle into the cartilage, which was very tough, and which he said was the cause of the needle breaking, and he said that he should have injected it on either side. This evidence, if the jury believed it, was sufficient to sustain the verdict. As said in Roberts v. Parker, 121 Cal. App. 264-270, 8 P.(2d) 908, 910: "In other words, after the verdict of the jury has been fairly rendered, all the circumstances of the case, together with any reasonable inference which may be drawn therefrom, will be marshaled in support of the judgment. Barham v. Widing, supra. Measured by the foregoing rules, the circumstances of the present case are legally sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict." Dimock v. Miller, 202 Cal. 668, 262 P. 311, 312; Ley v. Bishopp, supra.

In Dimock v. Miller, supra, in speaking of the weight to be given to evidence, it is said: "If the rule of law is as contended for by defendant and appellant, and it is necessary to demonstrate conclusively and beyond the possibility of a doubt that the negligence resulted in the injury, it would never be possible to recover in a case of negligence in the practice of a profession which is not an exact science." We think the evidence in the present case is sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury.

[6] It is also contended that the statements claimed by Mr. and Mrs. Walter to have been made to them by the appellant, even if made, do not constitute evidence of fault or negligence on the part of Dr. England; that there is a broad distinction between an admission of negligence and an admission of mistake. Donahoo v. Lovas, 105 Cal. App. 705, 288 P. 698; Markart v. Zeimer, 67 Cal. App. 363, 227 P. 683; Patterson v. Marcus, 203 Cal. 550, 265 P. 222; Rising v. Veatch, 117 Cal. App. 404, 3 P.(2d) 1023, cited in support of appellant's claim, are all cases where in it was charged that the doctor had made a mistake, but it was a mistake in diagnosis. It is the law that a doctor is not responsible for such error. In other words, a doctor is not liable for an honest mistake of judgment in making a diagnosis of his patient's ailment, unless it was negligently made. Patterson v. Marcus, supra.

In the case of Phillips v. Powell, 210 Cal. 39, 290 P. 441, it was held that certain admissions made by the defendants were not admissions of negligence, and therefore an instruction that the standard of learning and skill could be determined by such admissions was prejudicial. However, in the instant case, we have the hypothetical question propounded by the defendant to experts, from which it appears that one of the necessary elements in giving an anæsthetic in a case such as this is that the needle requires from thirty to forty-five seconds from the commencement of the injection until finally completed, at least that is a fair inference to be drawn from such question and the answers thereto. The testimony of the plaintiffs is that the insertion took a second or two. As said in Barham v. Widing, supra, 210 Cal. 215, 291 P. 173, 177: "The jurors were entitled to accept the solution to which these circumstances led them in preference, even, to the positive statements of the defendant and his nurse to the contrary." See, also, Roberts v. Parker, 121 Cal. App. 264, 8 P.(2d) 908; Scott v. Sciaroni, 66 Cal. App. 577, 226 P. 827. We are satisfied that, as used by the defendant, the word "mistake" was synonymous with the word "negligence." The evidence also supports the verdict, in that the plaintiff, Mrs. Walter, suffered, and still suffers, from the effect of the broken needle in her jaw.

If we are right in our conclusions as aforesaid, the court was justified in denying defendant's motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

[7-9] It is further claimed that certain remarks of counsel for respondent, and certain testimony of the witness E. L. Walter, constituted such grievous error that the court should have granted appellant's motion for a mistrial; that such misconduct could not be cured by any admonition given by the court to the jury. During the progress of the trial, at the instance of his counsel, E. L. Walter testified that before the action was commenced he visited the office of the appellant and said to him: "Doctor, you and I and your wife and my wife have been friends and I don't want to do anything that is going to hurt you by any action on our part, because I know that if suit is brought it is going to hurt you," and I said, 'I came to see you knowing that you are going to San Francisco, and ask you if you won't be man enough to go down there and tell your insurance company, whom I know you are insured with, that you did make a mistake on a friend of yours and all that friend asks is to be reimbursed for the expense (that we couldn't afford in the first place) and to be taken care of afterwards, getting that needle out and the necessary expenses that must accrue.'" At this point counsel for appellant assigned the asking of the question as to the conversation as prejudicial misconduct, and the giving of the answer an attempt and a successful attempt, by improper methods, to draw into the case the question of insurance. Reserving a ruling on the motion, the trial court permitted the witness to finish his answer, as follows: "Well, Dr. England at that point broke down and tears came to his eyes and he said, 'I will. It is very decent of you to come in here and take that attitude that you have taken,' and he said, 'I'll do down to my insurance company when I am in San Francisco and will tell them that I have made a mistake and I'll be back either tomorrow or the next day and will come in and let you know what the results have been.” The court denied the motion and stated: “The court does, however, wish to instruct the jury that reference to the insurance companies in this class of cases is not proper, except as they appear incidentally, and they should and are instructed to disregard all such evidence.”

It is a general rule that in this class of cases reference to the fact that a defendant is indemnified by a policy of insurance is prejudicial error, and the evil effect upon the jury of such a reference cannot be cured by striking out the testimony, nor by an admonition to the jury not to consider it in any way. Rising v. Veatch, supra; Squires v. Riffe, 211 Cal. 370, 295 P. 517; Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 266 P. 954. This rule, however, does not prevent such evidence being proper where the conversation involves an admission of responsibility. King v. Wilson, 116 Cal. App. 191, 2 P.(2d) 833; Harju v. Market St. Ry. Co., 114 Cal. App. 138, 299 P. 788; McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 191 P. 23; Lahti v. McMenamin, 204 Cal. 415, 263 P. 644. In the case before us, the conversation amounted to an admission that the appellant had made a mistake. We have heretofore held that this admission, when considered with all the testimony in the case, is subject to interpretation as an admission of negligence, and the jury were the judges of its effect.

The evidence having been properly admitted, we find no prejudicial error in referring to it in the argument to the jury.

[10] Appellant also claims the court erred in not permitting him to cross-examine Mrs. Walter as to her social and club activities immediately following the accident, during which period she claimed to have been suffering severe pain from the effect of the embedded needle. The court in effect stated that counsel had fully examined the witness on that subject, to which counsel replied: “Well I think so, your Honor, but I don’t know what the jury will think about it.” An examination of the record discloses a very lengthy cross-examination. Under the circumstances, there was no error in limiting it. Section 2044, Code Civ. Proc.; People v. Tou Jue, 66 Cal. App. 235, 225 P. 759.

[11] It is further contended that the court permitted lay witnesses to testify concerning medical matters which could only be testified to by experts. The plaintiff E. L. Walter was permitted, over objection, to testify that after the accident he was awakened night after night by his wife lying in bed crying with pain in her jaw; that before the accident she was in good health physically and mentally. Objection is also taken to the evidence of other witnesses claimed to be in the same category. But none of this evidence is, in our opinion, subject to the objection. It is said in 10 California Jurisprudence, p. 978: “Under one of the exceptions to the general ruling excluding the opinion of nonexperts, the opinion of such a witness derived from observation may be received in connection with his statement of the facts upon which it is based. It is said that this exception applies to questions of * * * sickness and health.”

Complaint is made that the court erred in giving two instructions offered by the plaintiffs. One of these relates to evidence of negligence as a matter of common knowledge. The other, as to the necessity of following expert testimony in the absence of evidence of facts constituting common knowledge. Both instructions were approved in Nelson v. Painless Parker, 104 Cal. App. 770-775, 286 P. 1078, which, like the instant case, included both classes of evidence. They were properly given.

[12] The court refused to give the jury a number of instructions offered by the defendant. The principal complaint in this behalf rests upon the failure of the court to give an instruction “* * * that a licensed dentist is presumed to have that degree of skill and learning required by law, and to exercise that degree of care and judgment in his treatment of and attention to the case. This presumption of law may be refuted by testimony on behalf of the plaintiffs, and as I have instructed you, by the testimony of competent witnesses, that is, dentists, or physicians and surgeons. If this presumption has not been overcome or dispelled, it is your duty to bring in a verdict for the defendant.” It will be observed that this instruction requires that the presumption of skill and learning and their exercise must be overcome by the testimony of expert witnesses, thus ignoring the right of the jury to consider the testimony of lay witnesses on matters of common knowledge which the jury have a right to consider, and which are present in this case in determining the question of negligence of the defendant. Therefore, the refusal of the proposed instruction was warranted by the state of the record. Furthermore, an examination of all of the instructions contained in the transcript on appeal discloses that the jury were fully and fairly instructed upon all phases of the case, including the application of expert testimony. There is no error in refusing to give the instruction. We deem it unnecessary to discuss any other questions. The defendant was accorded a fair and impartial trial. The jury decided the case upon competent and sufficient evidence, and under well-settled principles of law we cannot disturb their verdict.

The order denying the motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict and the judgment are both affirmed.

Sept. 5, 1933.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 2,
1933.1. Contracts ⇨137(1).

When contract can be separated into illegal agreement and legal one, latter may be enforced, but, where indivisible, contract must stand or fall as entirety.

2. Contracts ⇨137(4).

Where partners were engaged in tourist brokerage business in California, and upon dissolution agreed that plaintiffs should retain entire business in Northern California in consideration of defendant's retaining entire business in Southern California, contract held indivisible as to territory and void as in restraint of trade (Civ. Code, §§ 1673-1675).

3. Contracts ⇨137(1).

If part of consideration for plaintiff's promise is unlawful and part of defendant's also, entire contract is void (Civ. Code, § 1608).

4. Contracts ⇨138(1).

Contract which is void as against public policy or against statute cannot be maintained in law or equity.

5. Contracts ⇨138(5).

Under contract void because it restrained trade, action could not be brought on theory of trust as to commissions obtained by defendant from business originating in territory allotted to plaintiffs (Civ. Code, §§ 1673-1675, 1608).

Action by Thomas Stanley Edwards and another, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Edwards & Vickery, against John Joseph Mullin, individually and as doing business under the firm name and style of Mullin Travel Service. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Gavin McNab, Schmulowitz, Wyman, Aikins & Brune, Nat. Schmulowitz, and George B. Harris, all of San Francisco, and Loyd Wright and Charles E. Millikan, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Finlayson, Bennett & Morrow and Henry L. Knoop, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant, entered after the sustaining of an objection of defendant to the introduction of any evidence under plaintiffs' second amended complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the contract upon which the action was based is contrary to sections 1673, 1674 and 1675 of the Civil Code, and therefore unlawful and void.

The agreement involved, dated April 15, 1927, recites: "That whereas the parties hereto for several years last past have been and still are copartners, engaged as such in the tourist brokerage business in the State of California" (italics ours); and, in substance, dissolves such partnership theretofore existing between plaintiffs and defendant under which they "conducted an office in the City and County of San Francisco, at No. 582 Market Street, and an office in the City of Los Angeles, at No. 756 South Broadway." It recites that the parties owned "certain agency rights or agreements in connection with the following firms, to-wit: Franco-Belgique Tours Company, Ltd.," and other similar concerns; that taking effect July 30, 1927, defendant, "as party of the second part," assigned and delivered to plaintiffs, as "parties of the first part," all his "right, title and interest in and to the aforesaid rights or agreements with Franco-Belgique Tours Company, Ltd.," and said other firms, "in and for that territory in the northern portion of the State of California generally designated as the San Francisco territory, commencing immediately north of Bakersfield, Kern County, California, and extending * * * to the northernmost border of said state," together with all business and good will of said copartnership "in the said above named territory," including the furnishings and equipment of said San Francisco office. Said first parties likewise assigned all their interest in said contracts "in all that territory in the southern part of the State of California designated as the Los Angeles territory," commencing at and including the city of Bakersfield and extending to the southernmost border of said state, together with all "business and good will of said copartnership in said Los Angeles territory" and the furnishings and equipment of the Los Angeles office. Having so divided the rights, business, and property of the copartnership, said first parties covenanted that neither of them would "directly or indirectly engage in any tourist brokerage business in said Los Angeles territory above described" in connection with said general agencies "for a period of twenty-five (25) years"; "nor shall the second party engage in any tourist brokerage business in the said San Francisco territory above described, either directly or indirectly," in connection with said agencies for the same period of time.

*For subsequent opinion see 30 P.2d 997.

The action was brought by plaintiffs to recover damages alleged to have been caused by defendant accepting business through said Franco-Belgique Tours Company, Ltd., originating in the city and county of San Francisco, contrary to his agreement not to do so.

Appellants urge that said agreement is neither illegal nor unlawful, as claimed by respondent, and that the court erred in sustaining the objection to evidence on that ground.

Section 1673 of the Civil Code provides that: "Every contract by which anyone is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind, otherwise than is provided by the next two sections, is to that extent void." Section 1675 of the same Code, which applies here in particular, provides: "Partners may, upon or in anticipation of a dissolution of the partnership, agree that none of them will carry on a similar business within the same city or town where the partnership business has been transacted, or within a specified part thereof." Appellants urge that under the cases cited by them the territory mentioned in the contract here involved is divisible, so that the writing would apply to the city and county of San Francisco, even though invalid as to the balance of Northern California. As authority, the case of Fleckenstein Bros. Co. v. Fleckenstein, 76 N. J. Law, 613, 71 A. 265, 266, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 913, is cited among others. There the defendant had agreed not to engage in the business sold to plaintiff "within five hundred miles from the city of Jersey City." The court there held in effect that under the contract the parties themselves, by a reasonable construction of the agreement, had divided the territory into two parcels, viz., "either in the city of Jersey City or within five hundred miles from that city," and that so reading it the territory embraced "not one whole area, but two areas disjunctively described," one valid and within the contemplation of the parties, the other within the contemplation of the parties but not valid; and so the contract was sustained.

[1, 2] We fail to see, however, how such reasoning can be applied to the contract here, much as we would like to. Under the plain reading of the instrument the partners for several years prior thereto were "engaged as such in the tourist brokerage business in the State of California." It is true they had offices in San Francisco and Los Angeles, but the entire state was the scene of their operations; and, while we may presume that a large part of their business may have originated in the two cities where the offices were maintained, it is equally true that some of the suburbs of such cities, being the residences, as they are, of many wealthy and travel loving people, might have furnished an almost equally lucrative business. It is clear from a reading of the contract that the parties were not dividing the business of the two large cities alone, but that of the entire state. The use of the words "San Francisco territory" and "Los Angeles territory" have reference only to the district embraced within the descriptions "the northern portion of the state of California" and the "southern part of the state of California," respectively, "commencing immediately north of Bakersfield, Kern county, Cal., and extending northerly to the northernmost border of said state" and "commencing at and including the city of Bakersfield, Kern County, California, and extending southerly to the southernmost border of said state," respectively. We are here forced to the same conclusion reached by the court in the case of Consumers' Oil Company v. Nunnemaker, 142 Ind. 560, 41 N. E. 1048, 1051, 51 Am. St. Rep. 193, as to the contract there involved, viz.: "It is a recognized principle that when a contract is or can be so separated in parts as to constitute two agreements, one illegal and the other legal, the latter may be enforced, and the transaction pro tanto sustained. But it is otherwise where the contract in its nature is not divisible. * * * The contract before us is not of this character, and does not come within the provisions of the rule stated, and it must either stand or fall as an entirety." The contract before us, being indivisible as to territory, in our opinion, and covering more territory than sections 1674 and 1675 of the Civil Code permit, comes within the prohibition of section 1673 thereof and is void so far as the covenant sought to be enforced here is concerned.

[3] Another very important distinction between the contract in the instant case and those involved in the cases cited by appellants is that the businesses were largely local in their nature in such cases, while here, judging from the contract and the careful division of the state therein made, it was statewide. In those cases, too, a party sold his business or interest in it to some third person, presumably for a valuable consideration. Here the only consideration was the mutual agreements of the parties. The assignment of appellants' rights in San Diego, Bakersfield, and many rich and populous suburbs of Los Angeles and their agreement not to do business therein was as much a part of the consideration moving to respondent as were his assignment of his rights in Fresno, Oakland, and the rich and populous suburban cities of San Francisco and his agreement not to do business therein; and, if part of the consideration for respondent's promise is unlawful and part of appellants' also, the entire contract is void. Section 1608, Civ. Code. See, also, Haas v.

Greenwald, 196 Cal. 236, 237 P. 38, 59 A. L. R. 1493, applying said section.

[4, 5] Appellants urge that the contract dividing the state of California, as it does, between the partners for business purposes is neither illegal nor unlawful, although it is declared unenforceable and void to the extent that it exceeds the permissive provisions of sections 1673 and 1675, supra. The Supreme Court says, in the case of Grogan v. Chaffee, 156 Cal. 611, 615, 105 P. 745, 747, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 395: "Section 1673 of the Civil Code makes void every contract by which one is restrained from 'exercising a lawful profession, trade or business,' except in certain instances." The contract before us, not being one of the instances excepted, is void as to its attempt to fix the rights of the parties to do business in California; and "a void contract, a contract against public policy or against the mandate of the statute, may not be made the foundation of any action, either in law or in equity." Morey v. Paladini, 187 Cal. 727, 733, 203 P. 760, 762. We fail, therefore, to see how plaintiffs' second cause of action, based on the theory of a trust as to the commissions obtained by defendant from business originating in San Francisco, the right to which he had assigned under a void contract, can be maintained.

Judgment affirmed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Appeal by defendants from a judgment against them for one-half of certain commissions and profits earned by them in effecting certain sales of real estate.

The amended complaint alleges substantially that on or about the 15th day of September, 1928, defendants as real estate brokers entered into an agreement with plaintiff to pay him one-half "of the gross commission, compensation or profits" which they might receive from sales made of properties then held by them or which might thereafter be held by them for sale to "anyone interested" by plaintiff therein or to whom plaintiff "would introduce" them. The pleading contains three counts. The first alleges the sale of the estate of "Frances Marion, widow of Fred Thomson, deceased," on or about April 2, 1929, to "a prospective purchaser" whom the plaintiff, "relying on his said agreement with defendants, had theretofore procured or caused to be introduced to the said defendants," on which sale the latter received a total commission of $38,000. The second count alleges a similar sale on April 20, 1929, of property held by defendants on an option procured from Frank Muller and Walter Muller on or about April 4, 1929, on which sale a profit of $15,000 was made. The third count alleges a third sale on or about August 1, 1929, of property known as the "Charles Ray" residence, upon which sale defendants earned as commission and profit $3,500. The jury returned a verdict for $24,082.50 in favor of plaintiff. Defendants' motion for a new trial was denied as to the first two counts, but granted as to the third, the judgment thereupon rendered being reduced by $1,750, the amount of the verdict on such count. The appeal is from the judgment as so modified.

The evidence shows that the sale involved in the first count was made by defendant Harley Moore to one L. S. Barnes, and in the second count by said defendant through said Barnes to the Elbe Oil Company, of which Mr. Barnes was secretary-treasurer and general manager. Plaintiff testified that he met Harley Moore in 1926 when said defendant and his mother inspected the Casa del Mar Club, which was then about completed and where plaintiff was working at the time; that shortly after such meeting Harley Moore and his mother invited plaintiff to visit them at their home, which he did; that thereafter plaintiff saw said defendant four or five times, until in 1928, when Harley Moore and his father, the defendant J. Earlton Moore, visited the "Times home" in Mira Mar Estates, where plaintiff was employed by the Mira Mar Sales Corporation, at which time he was introduced by Harley Moore to J. Earlton Moore and that he invited them to lunch. After that, according to plaintiff's testimony, he paid two or three visits to the offices of defendants in Beverly Hills, and that in the "forepart of September" on one of such visits Harley Moore asked "if I didn't have quite a lot of wealthy clients that would be interested in Beverly Hills property * * * and he said if I had anyone he would * * * give me 50 per cent of * * * his gross commission on any sales that might be consummated through their firm. * * * I didn't mention any of the names until we had agreed upon a plan of commission. The plan was that if I would make the introduction to Harley Moore, that they would agree to give me one-half of the gross commissions on all sales made. I agreed to the proposition after I had asked him if we could have a little memorandum * * * to that effect so that I would be protected by an agreement. He says, 'Well, we don't usually do that. * * * We would rather put your name right in the escrow along with ours in case anything is done, and you will be paid direct from escrow and the bank will handle the money and * * * you will be positively protected that way.'" He testified further that: "J. Earlton Moore, who was at his desk, turning, said, 'Yes, that is the best way to do it; that is the way we would prefer to do it.'"

Plaintiff then testified that he told the above-named defendants the next day of Alfred F. Smith, who was living at the Beverly Hills Hotel, and made an appointment to go with Harley Moore to the hotel to meet Mr. Smith that afternoon. There is quite a sharp conflict in the evidence, not only as to the agreement to share commissions, testified to by plaintiff, but also as to the purpose of the visit to Mr. and Mrs. Smith. According to plaintiff's testimony, the Smiths "were going to buy a place" and were shown a house by Harley Moore at the corner of Bedford drive and Sunset boulevard that defendants had for sale. Mr. Smith testified that he had just come to Beverly Hills and was temporarily residing at the Beverly Hills Hotel, and that plaintiff called on him with a Mr. Cottrell (another realtor); that he had never seen either of them before; that there was no discussion of the sale of a house to him, but that he wanted to rent a house; that plaintiff and Cottrell showed the Smiths several places for rent, as did other realtors; that plaintiff brought Harley Moore out and introduced him, and that they looked at the house at Bedford and Sunset as a rental proposition; that nothing was said about purchasing it—"We were not in the market to purchase." Mr. Smith's testimony is corroborated by that of Harley Moore. He further testified that he rented the Lita Gray Chaplin place from another realtor for one year and lived in it "for nearly a year and a half"; that he played golf with Harley Moore beginning in the spring of 1929, and that through the efforts of Mr. Moore he purchased the Charles Ray place, but that Mrs. Smith was the one who first spoke to Mr. Moore about buying the property, and "the first I knew of it she had looked at it before I had ever been there."

About a week after he introduced Harley Moore to Mr. Smith, plaintiff met the former in his office and "told him that I knew a family by the name of Barnes in Beverly Hills and asked him if he knew them. He said no, he did not; didn't know where they lived. I told him that I had known Gloria Barnes, the daughter, quite well, and had met Mr. and Mrs. Barnes on one occasion. Q. Was anything said with reference to whether they were looking for property? A. Yes there was. I told him that Gloria had told me during the summer that they bought an estate in Beverly Hills, that Mr. Barnes was a real estate buyer and was looking for investments and I should meet him. She said that anything that she and her mother would select would be satisfactory to Mr. Barnes. Gloria Barnes was quite a horsewoman and was looking for a place where they could have stables for their horses. * * * On that occasion I discussed Miss Roma Seger * * * an unmarried woman," who with her mother lived in Beverly Hills, and "I discussed Miss Rita SeEVERS" and "Miss LePelletier," who were afterwards introduced by plaintiff to Harley Moore. Plaintiff further testified that on that occasion he told Harley Moore, "I thought the best method of approach, meeting the family, would be through the door—they would go horseback riding. He agreed that would be the best plan;" that "the last part of September or probably the first part of October * * * 1928 * * * we [Harley Moore and plaintiff] had been out to the beach and upon arriving at his office in Beverly Hills he suggested that I get Miss Barnes on the telephone and arrange a meeting that evening at a picture show, or something, in order to get acquainted. I called her on the telephone. She was out of town at the time." The evidence shows that Harley Moore did call Miss Barnes on the telephone and met her about ten days after the conversation above mentioned with plaintiff; that he was introduced by the daughter to Mr. and Mrs. Barnes in October or November of 1928, leaving the house with the daughter immediately afterwards for a horseback ride; that after the death of Fred Thomson on "Christmas day, 1929," defendants obtained a listing of the estate; that Gloria Barnes, reading that the Thomson horses were to be sold, visited the place to see them and saw the stables; that her mother had been planning a home to be built on property which Mr. Barnes had purchased for that purpose some time before, and as Gloria thought the plan of the Thomson stables good, she went with her mother to visit them in February of 1929; that Harley Moore visited the Ambassador horse show with Miss Barnes during the week of February 16, and that she then told him that "they were going to build a new home across from Doheney's in Beverly Hills, and she was going to have stables there and keep her horses there; and she said she had been up [to the Frances Marion Thomson property] and inspected the stables, or bought a horse from Mrs. Frances Marion Thomson, and that they had fine stables up there; and I told her at that time that I had the place for sale." Harley Moore further testified that about a week after the horse show he asked Miss Barnes if she thought her father "would consider buying the Thomson property instead of building a home, and she said she was quite sure he would not; that they had their plans all drawn and her mother had been working on them for a couple of years, and she didn't think she would be interested." Moore evidently spoke to Mrs. Barnes the next time he saw her, and "Mrs. Barnes told me she had already seen the property but had never been inside of the house. * * * I told her we had it for sale and would she like to look through the house. She said yes, and I took Mrs. Barnes and Miss Gloria Barnes up and showed them through the house; * * * that was in March, 1929." The evidence shows that thereafter "either Mr. or Mrs. Barnes" phoned Harley Moore one Sunday morning and asked him to take them to see the Thomson house, which he did; that a few days later Mr. Barnes asked him to come and see him, and that when he did so Mr. Barnes made an offer for the Thomson property. This was refused by Mrs. Thomson, and Mr. Barnes made "a further offer of more money," which was taken to Mrs. Thomson, who accepted "after three or four days, * * * about the first of April, 1929."

With regard to the second sale, Harley Moore testified that two or three days after the deal for the Thomson property went into escrow "we were speaking about real estate in general, and I told him [Mr. Barnes] that I had an option on what I considered the finest corner in * * * the Beverly Hills section, and that I would very much like to show it to him, that he might be interested in its purchase," and that about two weeks later Mr. Barnes purchased said property.

It is apparent from the evidence that plaintiff was introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, but that such introduction did not register with them, as neither had any recollection of meeting plaintiff until after the Thomson property was purchased, when he came to inquire if they had bought it. Mr. Barnes testified, and he is corroborated by his wife and daughter, that neither of the latter said anything to him about purchasing the property, but that they told him about the riding rings and stable and "wanted I should see them so they could put something similar" on the property he had bought to build on; that he went with Mrs. Barnes to look the place over; that "about a week or ten days afterwards I got to thinking about it and I suggested to Mrs. Barnes that we might not build; that there was shrubbery on this other place and we might buy the place and sell the other"; that "there were two or three conversations about it, and I finally sent for Mr. Harley Moore and made an offer on the place, which was rejected. Some time later he told me that he thought that we could buy the place at a price that I was agreeable to pay."

Harley Moore testified that plaintiff told him about Mr. Smith desiring to rent a "large house with four or five master bedrooms" and asked if he had any that might please him, "and I told him that I had"; that plaintiff then said he would like to introduce Mr. Smith to him, and asked "if we were successful in renting Mr. Smith a house, would I split the commission with him, I told him I would"; that at no time did he ever tell plaintiff he would give him one-half of the gross commission, compensation, or profits that he might make from a sale of properties then held or which might thereafter be held by his firm to any one produced or introduced by plaintiff.

As to the episode related by plaintiff with respect to the Barnes family, said defendant testified: "That was on the day that Mr. King * * * was trying to sell me a lot in the Bel Air Club * * * and I went down to look at it with him. We came back to Beverly Hills and I took Mr. King to dinner * * * and went back to our office and sat down * * * about 8:30 in the evening. I asked Mr. King if he wanted to go out and play a little bridge somewhere, and he said, 'Well, let us get a couple of girls and go to a picture show.' I said, 'Well, we will have to get someone in Beverly Hills. It is about time for the second show.' He asked me if I knew any girls in Beverly Hills, and I told him I didn't know any that I could call up just at that hour; that most of my girl friends lived in Los Angeles or Hollywood; and he said he knew a young lady in Beverly Hills who had not lived there very long and was a neighbor of mine, and * * * he said her name was Miss Gloria Barnes, and she was a fine horse-woman, and that I rode horseback some, and that probably it would be a good thing if we were acquainted with each other; * * * I said 'all right, call her up.' And he called the Barnes home and Miss Barnes was not there; * * * Mr. King said to me that he would like to have me know Miss Barnes * * * and that he would give me his card with her name, phone number and address on it, and some time at my leisure I might call her up and say to her that I was a friend of his and that way I might meet her."

We have quoted at length from the testimony in order to show that there is really no conflict except on two vital questions, viz., Did the parties enter into the alleged agreement? and, Was L. S. Barnes introduced by plaintiff to defendants or any of them? It is clear the jury might fairly make either a negative or an affirmative answer to the first question from the evidence presented; and while there was no introduction made as that word is generally used, if they believed the testimony of plaintiff as to the alleged agreement and introduction, they might reasonably conclude that, while Barnes was not a client, in any sense, of plaintiff, he was a prospect known to him and not to defendants, and that the parties adopted the method of introduction through the medium of the daughter, who was known to plaintiff. The contrary conclusion, that the name of the daughter was mentioned in a purely social connection and that no business contact was thought of for months afterwards, when the death of Fred Thomson put his estate on the market and into the hands of defendants, which estate included stables and riding rings, shrubbery, etc., that appealed to the Barnes family, and that the sale grew out of fortuitous circumstances rather than any prearranged planning on the part of plaintiff and defendant Harley Moore, may also be drawn.

With the evidence in such condition the court overruled defendants' objections and permitted the Misses William Le Pelletier, Rita Seevers, and Roma Seger to testify that plaintiff introduced them to defendant Harley Moore "on a business transaction," viz., the sale of property belonging to their respective mothers or themselves. The introduction to Miss Le Pelletier was in the late summer of 1928, to Miss Seevers in December of 1928 or the early part of 1929, and to Miss Seger in September or October of 1928. No sales were made by defendants of the properties so listed, nor does any arrangement for division of commission with plaintiff seem to have been made. In the case of Miss Seever, however, an option in favor of plaintiff and Harley Moore was drawn up by the latter and presented by plaintiff for

Miss Seever's signature, but was never signed by her. The proposed option was permitted to be introduced in evidence, however, over the objection of defendants, counsel for plaintiff in making his offer saying that it was "for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of plaintiff as to his relations with the defendants in this action."

Respondent urges that the case of Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 P. 380, completely disposes of appellants' claim of error in the introduction of such evidence. In that case plaintiff had purchased seed wheat of defendant alleged to have been represented to be "White Australian," but which produced a crop of very inferior wheat. At the trial the testimony of two witnesses was introduced over plaintiff's objection to the effect that they each bought seed wheat from defendant the same season and from the same lot as that sold plaintiff, and with the same representations made. It will be observed that the acts so permitted to be testified to were, not only similar acts, but they were also the acts of the defendant. We fail to see how the fact that plaintiff in the instant case introduced these three young ladies to Harley Moore, and that the Moore firm listed their properties for sale, could by any stretch of the imagination be held to be competent evidence from which the jury might conclude that plaintiff's story that defendants agreed to cut commissions with him on any sale made by their firm to purchasers introduced to them was true. Such a rule would make it possible for a plaintiff to corroborate his disputed testimony by evidence, not disputed by a defendant, which he himself caused to exist—a dangerous and seemingly unwarranted extension of the rule that upon the trial of a fact other facts from which the facts in issue are logically inferable are competent evidence, as provided in section 1870 (15), Code of Civil Procedure. We are of the opinion that such evidence was erroneously admitted by the court and must have had a prejudicial effect on the jury, considering the condition of the evidence as a whole. A case like the present should not be confused in the minds of the jurors with collateral facts, undisputed, which are given the stamp of competency by their admission into evidence and which can only be used by the jury as tending to support the case of the party so presenting them, when as a matter of fact they have no bearing upon the question at issue.

The conclusion reached makes it unnecessary to discuss the remaining contentions of appellants.

McGILLICUDDY et al. v. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 8837.

Division 2, California.

Aug. 22, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 20,
1933.1. Municipal corporations ⚡218(2).

Positions of trackmen and car repairer for city street railway at which each employee had worked continuously for approximately one year or more before his removal held "permanent positions," entitling employees to civil service rights (St. 1931, p. 3061, § 142).

2. Municipal corporations ⚡217(2).

Where civil service appointees worked in permanent positions in excess of maximum probationary period, appointments were complete, notwithstanding attempt to keep appointees in temporary employment by successive reappointments to so-called "temporary" positions (St. 1931, p. 3061, § 142).

3. Municipal corporations ⚡217(2).

Civil service commission had no power to adopt rule whereby positions which were neither temporary in fact nor by law of their creation could be designated temporary, thereby preventing eligibles appointed thereto from acquiring permanent tenure after serving through probationary period (St. 1931, p. 3061, § 142).

SPENCE, Justice.

Six of the plaintiffs were trackmen and the seventh was a car repairer in the employ of the city and county of San Francisco. On April 8, 1932, plaintiffs were removed from their respective positions by defendants without cause and without an opportunity to be heard. Other persons were immediately employed to fill said positions. Claiming the benefits of the civil service regulations, plaintiffs brought this action for declaratory relief. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Section 142 of the new charter of the city and county of San Francisco (Stats. 1931, pp. 2973, 3061), which went into effect January 8, 1932, provides: "The civil service rights, acquired by persons under the provisions of the charter superseded by this charter, shall continue under this charter." Appellants concede that said section protects the rights, if any, which respondents may have acquired under the old charter, but appellants contend that respondents were "emergency employees," that "they had no standing as civil service employees," and "therefore had no civil service rights to be protected under the provisions of section 142" of the new charter.

We are therefore called upon to examine the facts and the provisions of the old charter in order to determine whether respondents had acquired any "civil service rights" under the old charter which were protected by the new. It is unnecessary, however, to set forth in full all of the sections of the old charter dealing with this subject, as said sections have been considered and are to be found in the opinions in several of the cases cited by the respective parties. Powers v. Board of Public Works, 216 Cal. 546, 15 P. (2d) 156, 158; Rodgers v. Board of Public Works, 208 Cal. 291, 281 P. 64; Gilbert v. Civil Service Commission, 61 Cal. App. 459, 215 P. 97; Rodrigue v. Rogers, 4 Cal. App. 257, 87 P. 563.

Section 10 of article XIII of the old charter provided: "The appointing officer shall notify the Commissioners of each position to be filled separately, and shall fill such place by the appointment of one of the persons certified to him by the Commissioners therefor. Such appointment shall be on probation for a period to be fixed by the rules of the Commissioners; but such rules shall not fix such period at exceeding six months. The Commissioners may strike off names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon more than two years. At or before the expiration of the period of probation, the head of the department or office in which a candidate is employed may, by and with the consent of the Commissioners, discharge him upon assigning in writing his reason therefor to the Commissioners. If he is not then discharged his appointment shall be deemed complete. To prevent the stoppage of public business, or to meet extraordinary exigencies, the head of any department or office may, with the approval of the Commissioners, make temporary appointments, to remain in force not exceeding sixty days, and only until regular appointments, under the provisions of this Article, can be made." It will thus be seen that the old charter contemplated but two types of appointments, to wit: First,

"regular appointments" made from the eligible list, which appointments were to be made on probation for not to exceed six months; and, second, "temporary appointments" to remain in force only until "regular appointments" could be made. It is quite obvious as conceded by counsel that it was intended that such "temporary appointments" should be made only in the event that there was no list of eligibles from which "regular appointments" could be made. In order to avoid confusion with the word "temporary" as herein-after used, we shall refer to "temporary appointments" mentioned in the old charter as "emergency appointments," as such appointments were to be made only "to prevent the stoppage of public business or to meet extraordinary exigencies," and were "to remain in force not exceeding sixty days and only until regular appointments" could be made.

Section 2 of said article XIII of the old charter read in part as follows: "No appointment shall be made to any such place, except in accordance with the provisions of this article and the rules adopted thereunder by the civil service commission." Section 3 thereof empowered the commission to "make rules to carry out the purposes of this article. * * *" Purporting to act under the authority of said last-mentioned section, the commission adopted rules, among which was rule 33, reading as follows: "All positions which are expected by the appointing power to exist for a period of six months or over shall be considered, for the purposes of the rules of this Commission, as permanent positions. All other positions shall be considered as temporary positions, and appointments to temporary positions shall automatically expire at the end of four months. The probable period of employment must be specified by the appointing power in its requisition. This rule shall govern only appointments made after July 15, 1912." By this rule the commission attempted to classify positions as "permanent positions" and "temporary positions," which classification, regardless of the nature of the position, was to be arbitrarily based on the expectation of the appointing power as stated in its requisition made to the commission.

Turning to the facts in the present case, we find that respondents' names appeared upon the eligible list, and that each was appointed therefrom after certification by the commission, and that each had been employed continuously in his position for a long period of time before his removal. Manley was employed from June 1, 1928, to April 8, 1932; McGillicuddy, McCarthy, and Dunleavy were employed from November 28, 1930, to April 8, 1932; Savage was employed from December 2, 1930, to April 8, 1932; and O'Connell and Scully were employed from February 18, 1931, to April 8, 1932. The positions which they held were not abolished at the time of their removal, and, as others were employed in their places, it is clear that the work continued and funds were available therefor.

The appointments of respondents were "regular appointments" in the sense that they were made after the commission had certified the names from the eligible list. In other words, they were not "emergency appointments" made only until "regular appointments" could be made. It is appellants' contention, however, that, despite the fact that each of the respondents served in his position in excess of the maximum probationary period of six months as provided in the charter, the appointment was not to be "deemed complete" under said section 10 of article XIII of the old charter, as each of the respondents was appointed to what appellants term a "temporary position" as defined in the above-mentioned rule 33. This contention is based upon the procedure adopted in making the appointments. In each case the probable period of employment was estimated by the appointing power as less than six months, and the employee was certified by the commission for "temporary employment," and each was appointed by the appointing power for "temporary employment." During the time respondents were employed, some, but not all, of them were put through the formality of certain successive reappointments to their so-called "temporary" positions. The requisition in each case of reappointment was in the following form: "This requisition is made to reestablish by new temporary appointment, the temporary position that will automatically expire on (date), under Civil Service Rule 33." It appears, however, that the last such appointment of McGillicuddy, McCarthy, Dunleavy, and Savage was made on April 16, 1931, that the last such appointment of Manley was made on November 17, 1930, and that the only appointment of O'Connell and Scully was made on February 18, 1931.

[1, 2] In our opinion, the trial court properly treated the positions to which respondents were appointed as "permanent positions." As was said in Powers v. Board of Public Works, supra: " * * * If the position of painter, or granite cutter, actually exists in practice with a reasonable degree of continuity and permanency, the courts are justified in treating the position as a permanent one within the meaning of the civil service provisions of the charter. * * *" The facts above stated show that each of the respondents had worked in his position continuously for approximately one year or more before his removal. Respondent Manley had worked continuously in his position for approximately four years, with the exception of a short period on leave of absence in 1929. These positions could not be said to be temporary or seasonal. As respondents had worked in such positions in excess of the maximum probationary period fixed by the charter, their appointments were to be "deemed complete" within the meaning of the old charter.

Appellants cite and rely upon Gilbert v. Civil Service Commission, supra, and Rodrigue v. Rogers, supra, but these cases are not in point. There the eligibles were classified as "ordinary clerks" from which "the extra clerks" mentioned in the charter were appointed for temporary or seasonal work in the various departments. A vital distinction is pointed out in Rodrigue v. Rogers, at page 261 of the opinion in 4 Cal. App., 87 P. 563, 564, where it is said: "A further examination of the charter discloses that various positions are provided for, which by the law of their creation are not continuous or permanent, but are intended by the law to be for limited periods." (Italics ours.) The court then proceeded to show that the positions designated as "extra clerks" were not permanent, but were of limited duration in contemplation of the charter creating them. In the present case the positions involved cannot be said to be temporary or seasonal "by the law of their creation." They were of the type of positions which ordinarily exist "with a reasonable degree of continuity and permanency," and the facts show that the particular positions involved did so exist.

[3] Appellants' position with respect to the rule promulgated by the commission is "that an appointment to and acceptance of a position designated as 'temporary,' gives to the appointee, under the rules of the civil service commission, a limited and qualified enjoyment of the same." We are of the opinion, however, that the commission had no power to adopt a rule whereby positions which were neither temporary in fact nor temporary by the law of their creation could be designated temporary, thereby preventing the eligibles appointed thereto from acquiring permanent tenure after serving through the probationary period. Such a rule would not serve to "carry out the purposes" of the civil service provisions of the old charter as contemplated by section 3 of article XIII above set forth, but would tend to defeat said purposes. Under such a rule as interpreted by the commission, the appointing power could absolutely prevent eligibles from acquiring a permanent status merely by following the procedure adopted in the present case. Regardless of the true nature of the position or the length of time the appointee had served, such appointee could be removed at will, according to appellants' theory, without cause and without a hearing merely because he had been appointed to a position designated under the rule as "temporary." There is no express authority found in the old charter for such rule, and, on the contrary, we believe that it is violative of the general provisions of the old charter relating to civil service just as the so-called "one-year rule" was held to be violative of the specific requirements thereof. Powers v. Board of Public Works, supra; Rodgers v. Board of Public Works, supra.

Each of respondents having been regularly appointed from the eligible list to a position which was neither temporary in fact nor temporary by the law of its creation, and having served therein for a period in excess of the maximum probationary period provided in the old charter, had in our opinion acquired civil service rights which were protected by section 142 of the new charter. Respondents were not merely "emergency employees" as contended by appellants, and the trial court correctly declared their rights accordingly.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨660(2).

Motion for diminution of record to include alleged omitted copies of exhibit and petition was denied, where counsel expressed desire to introduce certificates, and, after obtaining court's assent, proceeded with other testimony without having exhibit marked or filed, and alleged exhibit was not shown to be material to determination of merits.

Appellate court may not direct trial court to certify alleged exhibit not read in evidence or identified in any manner.

3. Appeal and error ⇨659(4).

Leaving of documents upon clerk's desk after hearing was concluded, and with statement that they were withdrawn, held not "filing" entitling appellant to have documents incorporated in clerk's record.

In the matter of the guardianship of the person and estate of Caesar Carniglia, an incompetent person. On motion by appellant J. M. Toner, as director of the Department of Institutions, for an order directing the trial court and the clerk thereof to prepare and certify a supplemental reporter's and clerk's transcript containing copies of an exhibit and a petition alleged to have been omitted from the original transcripts on file.

Motion denied.

SPENCE, Justice.

This is a motion by appellant, J. M. Toner, as director of the department of institutions, upon suggestion of diminution of the record, for an order of this court directing the trial court and the clerk thereof to prepare and certify a supplemental reporter's transcript and a supplemental clerk's transcript containing copies of an exhibit and a petition alleged to have been omitted from the original transcripts on file.

The trial court heard the petition for settlement of the guardian's first account and appellant's objections to the various items thereof. Said account showed that there was no money or property remaining after the payment of the obligations of the incompetent. During the course of the hearing counsel for appellant stated: "I would like to introduce some certificates from the County Clerk's Office of San Mateo County to the effect that there is nothing on file showing restoration to capacity after the original commitment in 1910, for that commitment." The court said, "Very well," and, after hearing the objection to counsel for the guardian, further said, "Objection overruled." The hearing then proceeded, but no such certificates or certificate were read in evidence, nor does it appear that any such certificates or certificate were presented for marking as exhibits. Later on counsel for appellant said, "I have prepared a petition for an order directing payment to the Department of Institutions for this man's keep under Section 2181 of the Political Code, and also a copy of an order—I presume it will be denied." The court then said, "Yes, there isn't anything left to pay." At the conclusion of the hearing, the court orally made its order settling the account, and thereafter a written order was filed overruling appellant's objections to the account and settling the same.

In support of his motion appellant calls attention to the above-mentioned portions of the record, and contends that "an exhibit" has been omitted from the reporter's transcript, and that "a petition" has been omitted from the clerk's transcript. In opposition to the motion counsel for the guardian has submitted numerous affidavits purporting to show that neither the alleged exhibit nor the alleged petition ever became part of the record in the trial court. These affidavits further relate to an occurrence on the day of the hearing, but after the hearing had been concluded. The trial court had ordered the account settled, and counsel for the guardian had left the courtroom. The reporter's transcript discloses that at said time counsel for appellant again addressed the court and said, "May I put these three documents in evidence (showing three documents)?" An attorney who had no connection with the proceeding pointed out to the court that counsel for the guardian was no longer present. Counsel for appellant then said: "If there is any objection I will take them out. They are withdrawn. (Referring to the three documents.)" Counsel for appellant has objected to the consideration by this court of the affidavits mentioned above, but it is only through these affidavits that it appears that any documents prepared by appellant ever came into possession of the clerk of the trial court. It appears from said affidavits that counsel for appellant, after stating the three documents were withdrawn, left them on the clerk's desk, but that said three documents were never filed or marked in any manner. It may be further noted that it is impossible to ascertain from the record or from any showing made on this motion whether the identical certificates and petition referred to on the hearing were among the documents left on the clerk's desk after the hearing had been concluded.

[1, 2] Without regard to the affidavits presented in opposition to the motion, we are of the opinion that appellant's motion must be denied. The record shows that counsel for appellant merely stated that he "would like to introduce some certificates," but after obtaining an expression of the trial court's assent thereto he proceeded with testimony along other lines without completing the introduction in evidence of the certificates or certificate to which he had referred. This court may not direct the trial court to certify an alleged exhibit which was not read in evidence nor identified in any manner. See Wulferdinger v. Pickwick Stages System, 105 Cal. App. 509, 288 P. 93. Furthermore, appellant has failed to make it appear that the alleged exhibit would be material in the determination of the merits of the appeal.

[3] The petition to which appellant refers was not filed prior to or during the hearing. In the trial court counsel for appellant merely stated that he had "prepared a petition," and that he presumed that it would be denied. The trial court indicated that such would be its ruling. A filing of a petition after the conclusion of the hearing would not be timely, but it does not appear that any petition was filed at any time. If said petition was among the documents which appellant offered "in evidence" after the hearing had been concluded, the mere leaving of said documents upon the clerk's desk with the statement that they were "withdrawn" would not constitute a filing so as to entitle the appellant to have them incorporated in the clerk's transcript.

The motion is denied.

I concur: DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

NOURSE, P. J. (concurring).

I concur in the order upon the last ground stated—that it does not appear that the proposed exhibits are material on this appeal. I do not approve the provincial tactics which took advantage of counsel's oversight in not insisting upon having the exhibits marked in the presence of the court while at the same time and under like circumstances an exhibit offered by local counsel was included in the record and certified as having been duly filed.

Action by John S. Gernhardt against I. Rancadore and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

CRAIG, Justice.

In an action for damages alleged to have been incurred through the negligent operation of an automobile, a trial before a jury resulted in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

[1] It is contended by the appellants that the record presents as a matter of law contributory negligence on the part of the respondent which would have constituted a bar to recovery, and requires a reversal of the judgment. The appellants premise their argument by conceding its limitation by the rule that "when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from those facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury," it ceases to be a question of fact for the determination of the jury. Upon the trial the plaintiff was shown to have alighted from a public vehicle on an easterly and westerly street, which thereafter proceeded in a westerly direction. He thereupon started across said thoroughfare toward the south, and had arrived at or below the center line of the street when he was thrown by the left rear door of the defendants' car, and was injured. It was dark, the street lights were burning, and the plaintiff had seen a number of automobiles approaching from the westerly direction as he attempted to cross. He raised his left arm, signaling with an umbrella, that he intended to cross. There were no street signals, nor were there lines on the pavement to mark a pedestrian zone. Witnesses differed as to the distance within which the defendants stopped after the impact being eight or ten feet or more than forty feet, and the speed of their car was estimated at eighteen miles per hour, and at twenty-five miles, and again as "very fast." It was testified that respondent stopped when he arrived at the center of the street, and that he was frightened, as he had previously seen the cars about three blocks distant and believed he had ample time to reach the south side of the street. He swore: "I didn't know whether to stop or go forward or backward; I was just stunned." "I held it up, the umbrella, to beg him to get him to stop the car, and of course that is all I know; just then I was hit." There was other evidence that the plaintiff was standing still, to await the passing of the cars. A passenger of the defendants testified: "I only saw this man standing there and he had some luggage in his hands and all of a sudden there was a crash and he came in through the window." The defendant Rancadore conceded that "he was standing still." It would seem that the respondent can be said to have done no less than was necessary to bring the case within the rule announced in a somewhat recent case wherein it was observed that the injured person "did at least look up and in the direction from which danger was to be expected. This action on his part would appear to be sufficient to relieve him of the disability of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and appellants were entitled to have the question submitted to the jury as a matter of fact." Rapp v. Southern Service Co., 116 Cal. App. 699, 4 P.(2d) 195, 196. It would be difficult to determine as a matter of law that the appellants' automobile was at a distance, or traveling at a rate of speed, which justified the respondent in crossing the street at said time, or that he did all that a reasonable and prudent man would be expected to do in standing at the center of the street at a time when the defendants were proceeding easterly.

[2-4] The question of contributory negligence must be determined without regard to negligence on the part of the driver. Hutson v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 89 P. 1093. He must be held responsible not only for the result of his willful acts, but also for an injury occasioned to the plaintiff by a want of ordinary care or skill in the management of his property, except so far as the plaintiff willfully or by want of ordinary care brought the injury upon himself. Civ. Code, § 1714. "If reasonable men might differ as to whether or not the plaintiff did what an ordinarily prudent person would have done in the same or similar circumstances, then the judge is not justified in drawing the conclusion that, because in his own mind the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, all other reasonable persons must think likewise. A determination by the trial judge to the effect that a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence must rest upon such a state of facts that not merely a bare majority of reasonable men will agree with his conclusion." Reinders v. Olsen, 60 Cal. App. 764, 214 P. 268, 269. It is only where no fact is left in doubt that contributory negligence is established. Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 241, 116 P. 513, 515. Conflicts in the evidence as to facts recited created such a doubt in numerous instances, and it cannot be said as a matter of law that it was error to present them to the jury nor for the jury to resolve them in favor of the respondent.

[5] It is next contended that while the plaintiff is assumed to have been in a crosswalk when injured, this did not relieve him from exercising due care and that the trial court erred in permitting witnesses to indicate and testify regarding imaginary lines of a crosswalk upon said street. However, section 131½ of the California Vehicle Act provided that the plaintiff should be given the right of way within any unmarked crosswalk at the end of a block; and that for the purposes of said section "a crosswalk shall mean that portion of a roadway ordinarily included within the prolongation or connection of curb lines and property lines at intersections, or any other portion of a roadway clearly indicated for pedestrian crossing by lines or other markings on the surface." California Vehicle Act, § 131½ (e), as added by St. 1931, p. 2127, § 47. Both parties testified as to the prolongation of curb lines, and the error, if any can be said to have existed, was neither misleading nor prejudicial.

[6] Finally, error is assigned to the overruling of objections to questions propounded to the plaintiff's wife as to how far she preceded him in crossing, after she had testified that her back was turned and that she did not see the accident. This she estimated at about three feet, or possibly less, but that she could not say positively. The same questions were fully answered by eyewitnesses from whose testimony the jury might compare her evidence and allot to it such, if any, weight as the same might warrant. The appellants do not indicate wherein it could have unfavorably influenced the jury, nor is its prejudicial effect apparent.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

Victoria P. de Magee, who died in 1886, left as a part of her estate a mountain ranch consisting of several hundred acres, only a part of which is tillable land. Her estate has never been closed, and Hugh Magee, as one of the executors, has been in personal charge of these lands since 1913. He is also the owner of a tract of several hundred acres of land immediately adjoining the estate lands on the west. There is an old adobe house on the estate lands, some 300 or 400 feet easterly from the private land of Hugh Magee, which was erected there some years before these lands were acquired by Victoria P. de Magee. Between 1911 and 1913 Hugh Magee built a barn on his own land near the west line of the estate land and a few hundred feet north-easterly of the adobe house, and in 1927 or 1928 he built a house near this barn.

In 1924 the plaintiff established a home on a portion of the Hugh Magee land referred to, under some arrangement with him, doing some clearing and irrigating, as well as erecting several buildings. At that time he entered by following a road over the estate lands past the adobe house to the Hugh Magee barn and thence over the Hugh Magee land in a southerly direction to the site of his home. In 1927, at the suggestion of Hugh Magee, the plaintiff improved a road westerly from his home site across the estate lands to a point on the road by which he had formerly entered which is somewhat southwesterly from the old adobe house. This short piece of road improved by the plaintiff will be hereinafter referred to as the "Gray" road. In July, 1928, Hugh Magee conveyed by deed to the plaintiff

25 acres of his private land, upon a part of which the plaintiff had established his home, and during the same year one of the executors and some of the heirs of the Magee estate took measures to prevent the plaintiff from using the Gray road. The plaintiff then brought an action, one purpose of which was to establish the location of the Gray road as a public road. On appeal this court affirmed a decree to the effect that the Gray road was not a public road and prohibiting the plaintiff from using the same. Gray v. Magee, 108 Cal. App. 570, 292 P. 157. The present action was started in November, 1930, after the decree in the case referred to became final.

[1, 2] In this action the plaintiff is seeking to establish a way of necessity over the lands of his grantor, Hugh Magee, to connect with what is claimed to be a public road at a point near the barn above referred to. As a part of his case the plaintiff also seeks to establish that a public road exists at the point near this barn, being the westerly end of the way of necessity, and for that purpose the executors of the estate and other individuals were joined as defendants, since the road relied upon as a public road runs across their respective lands. At the trial little, if any, defense was made as to the way of necessity across the lands of Hugh Magee in itself, and the entire controversy centers upon whether this way of necessity reaches a public road; in other words, whether there is a public road across the Magee estate lands which meets the way of necessity at Hugh Magee's barn. The trial court found in all respects for the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

The main contention of the appellants is that the evidence does not support the findings to the effect that a public road exists across the estate lands and touches the way of necessity at the barn. More than a hundred witnesses were examined, and the transcript contains more than 2,000 pages, including two large volumes of exhibits. The printed briefs contain more than 1,000 pages, the greater portion thereof being devoted to quoting, summarizing, and marshaling portions of the evidence in accordance with the points of view of respective counsel. It would serve no useful purpose, and would require an unwarranted amount of time and space, to analyze this evidence in detail, and we shall make only the most general references thereto. No more appears than a conflict in the evidence, the great preponderance whereof, in our opinion, sustains the findings and judgment. In general, the appellants' contentions as to the evidence may be thus summarized: That the roads shown to have long existed over the estate lands were private roads for the use and benefit of the estate; that any use of such roads by outsiders was casual and permissive only; that certain changes in the location of portions of the road were made by the executors solely for the benefit of the estate; and that no public road has ever extended to any part of the private land of Hugh Magee.

There is overwhelming evidence that a road has existed across the estate lands since many years before the same were acquired by Victoria P. de Magee, and that until about 1875 this was the only road between Pala, to the south of these lands, and Temecula and Pechanga to the north. While after that date another more direct road between Pala and Temecula was established some miles to the west, this road across these lands has remained the only road to Pechanga. There is evidence that this road was used by the Indians as early as 1846 for the purpose of hauling lime from Pechanga to Pala, and direct testimony of its use for hauling and general traffic during nearly every year from 1862 to 1875, and during practically every year from 1875 to 1930, when this action was brought. Nearly a hundred witnesses testified to such use, some limiting their testimony to one or two years while others covered many years, and these same witnesses testified to having seen literally hundreds of other people use the road over a period of many years. The appellants take exception to the testimony of some of these witnesses, claiming that the same does not establish adverse use of the road. While it is true that certain items of evidence may not be sufficient, standing alone, all of the evidence must be taken together, and each part has its place in the composite whole. A number of maps were introduced in evidence, including one prepared by the surveyor general of California in 1875; one by the surveyor general of California in 1880; one by the surveyor general in 1886; a land office plat published in 1892; a United States topographical map of the quadrangle in which this land is situated, prepared from surveys made in 1891 and 1898; a land office map prepared in 1913 from a resurvey; and a map of San Diego county published in 1931. All of these maps indicate a road running from Pala across these estate lands and in the direction of Pechanga and Temecula. The respondent introduced in evidence copies of government records showing original homestead entries and final proofs in a dozen cases relating to lands in the immediate vicinity of the lands here in question. In some cases there is evidence that these homesteads were occupied by several successive homesteaders or vendees. A natural inference is to be drawn that these parties, while living upon and proving up on their homesteads, used some road to get to the outside world. Other evidence in the record plainly indicates that the only road they could have used is the one in question across these estate lands, and there is some direct testimony to that effect. In addition, the trial judge visited the lands in question and went over the points in controversy on two occasions during the trial. What he there observed is to be considered as evidence in the case. People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 P. 833; Hatton v. Gregg, 4 Cal. App. 537, 88 P. 592; Wright v. Locomobile Co., 33 Cal. App. 694, 167 P. 407; Vaughan v. County of Tulare, 56 Cal. App. 261, 205 P. 21; MacPherson v. West Coast Transit Co., 94 Cal. App. 463, 271 P. 509. It was thoroughly established by the evidence that a road continuously existed across these estate lands from a date long prior to the time they were acquired by Mrs. de Magee to the time of the trial, and that throughout a period of some seventy years the same was used by the general public having occasion to use such a road without objection from any one.

Coming to the more specific question as to the location of this road as it crossed the estate lands during various periods of time, it fully appears that before these lands were acquired by Victoria P. de Magee, and during most of the time she occupied the same, this road crossed what is known as "Milkhouse" canyon, and passed over what was called the "Colorado Mesa," about 3,600 feet westerly from the Hugh Magee land, and some 3,000 feet west of the old adobe house. It appears that this crossing through the canyon was washed out and rendered impassable in 1884, and that in that year or the next, and either one or two years before Victoria P. de Magee died, the location of this part of the road across the estate lands was changed by making a new crossing over the canyon at a point considerably nearer what is now Hugh Magee's land, and connecting the same with the other road at a point some 400 feet northwesterly from the old adobe house. It further appears that the last-mentioned crossing over the canyon was washed out by floods in 1916, and that Hugh Magee, who was living on his land and caring for the estate lands, then put in a new crossing at a point still nearer his land, running this part of the road a few hundred feet easterly to his barn, then a few hundred feet southwesterly to the old adobe house, and connecting with the old road a few hundred feet farther on. There is an abundance of evidence that from 1916 until the time of the trial this road ran past the old adobe house on up through Hugh Magee's barnyard and then northwesterly across the canyon and on toward Pechanga. It is undisputed that Hugh Magee's barn was upon his own land, although it was near the line between his and the estate land. In 1927 or 1928, the Southern Sierra Power Company used the road here in question in connection with some work it was doing farther up in the mountains, and, in order to avoid some sharper turns, constructed a new cut-off from a point a little northwest of the old adobe house to a point a few feet westerly from Hugh Magee's barn. The appellants strenuously maintain that this cut-off was in fact the road used by the public, and that the slightly longer road, by the old house and the barn, was used only by the family. However, there is abundant evidence that this cut-off was not opened until 1927 or 1928, and that prior thereto all traffic went over the road by the adobe house and the barn, and there is some testimony that, after that short piece of road was constructed, a part of the public continued to go over the portion of the road leading by the adobe house and directly to the barn. A number of witnesses testified that between 1916 and 1928 the road from Pala went past the adobe house and on to the barn and then out toward Temecula. Several of these witnesses testified that this was the only road. Not only is there ample evidence that from 1916 to 1928 this road ran past the adobe house and Hugh Magee's barn, but this fact appears from much of the appellants' own evidence and particularly from the testimony of Hugh Magee. He testified that in coming from Pala he had turned to the right toward the old adobe house for more than forty years; that his barn was built in 1911 and rebuilt in 1913; that the road between the house and the barn has not been changed since 1913; and that a certain party used to come from lands considerably to the north of the estate lands to his house over the same road that runs from his house to Temecula. He admitted that the road from Pala came up to his barn and had since 1916, and that, when they went out to Temecula, they went on from the barn. He testified that from 1913 to the time he built his new house the only way to get to the homestead and the barnyard was from the old adobe house up to the barn, that he hauled cream from there to Pala, and that he also went out from there north toward Pechanga. While this witness maintained that that portion of this road crossing the estate lands was and always had been a private road used only in connection with working the ranch, the court was justified in drawing an entirely different inference from the facts testified to by him, especially when the same is taken in connection with other portions of the evidence. Without reviewing the evidence in any greater detail, it is sufficient to say that it fully supports the findings.

[3] While the appellants rely upon certain conflicting evidence and upon the claim that much of the evidence is unworthy of belief, such matters are for a forum other than this. While there is some evidence that at certain times during these many years gates were found across this road, sometimes not even being closed, there is no evidence that any locked gate was ever found until some time in 1930, after the prior case referred to

was affirmed on appeal, and then only near the northerly limits of the estate lands and above the point where the way of necessity connects with the road. There is evidence that the road across the estate lands was a part of a general road some 12 miles in length, and that no objection was made to its use by the public for nearly eighty years. The slight evidence of the presence of unlocked and sometimes open gates at a few scattered times throughout these years on a mountain ranch in a cattle country could not be held sufficient to defeat the rights of the public in and through a road shown to have been used by the public long years before the estate or the deceased acquired the land, and continuously thereafter.

[4, 5] Some thirty assignments of error in ruling upon the admission of evidence are presented by the appellants. Most of these relate to immaterial matters of trifling moment, and call for no special attention, especially in view of the liberal cross-examination permitted by the court. The remaining assignments fall into two groups which will be briefly considered. It is contended that the court committed prejudicial error in admitting a number of maps, nearly all of them government maps, all of which were objected to as immaterial and hearsay. It is not only argued that these were inadmissible, but that they could not and did not show any use of the road in question after the year 1916. We think these maps were admissible under section 1936 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and certainly no one piece of evidence is inadmissible merely because it does not prove the entire case of the party offering the same. Complaint is also made of the receipt in evidence of certified copies of government records showing various homestead entries and final proofs in connection therewith. These documents were offered and admitted, not as proof of the facts contained therein, but for the purpose of showing that other lands around and above the land here in question had been occupied and settled, and as justifying the inference that such settlers must have used some road in getting to the outside world. The testimony of other witnesses sufficiently indicated that the road here in question was the only one that could have been thus used. We think that this evidence was admissible for the limited purpose for which it was received. Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 P. 380; Lobree v. L. E. White Lumber Co., 53 Cal. App. 85, 199 P. 821; Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 99 P. 172. We find no error with respect to the admission of evidence of sufficient importance to justify a reversal.

[6-8] It is further contended that the executors of the Magee estate could not make a dedication of the estate lands to the use of the public, and that any use of the road shown was both casual and by permission, and not sufficient to give to the public an easement over the estate lands. Without doubt, an executor may not make an express dedication as to estate lands, but an easement may arise as to estate lands through implied dedication or prescription. Patchett v. Pacific Railway Co., 100 Cal. 505, 35 P. 73. Where a road has been in existence over certain lands since long before the same were acquired by a decedent and has continued thereon for a long period of years, greatly in excess of the statutory period, and where the course of such a road over the lands of an estate is re-routed because of washouts and for the greater convenience of the occupants of the land, the mere fact of such a re-routing cannot break the continuity of such a long-established route and cannot be held to prevent the possibility of any right accruing to the public over the relocated portions of the road merely because of the failure to close the estate during a period of nearly fifty years. We may add that, under the circumstances here shown, the burden was upon the appellants to show that the use by the public of the changed routing of the road over a period of many years was not one under a claim of right and adverse to the owners of the land. Yuba Cons. Goldfields v. Hilton, 16 Cal. App. 228, 116 P. 712, 715; Costello v. Sharp, 65 Cal. App. 152, 223 P. 567; Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Crockett, 70 Cal. App. 283, 233 P. 370; Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 87 P. 908. The matters of casual use and claimed permission were questions of fact which have been resolved against the appellants upon sufficient evidence.

[9, 10] It is urged that the court erred in overruling general and special demurrers to the complaint. It is first contended that the complaint does not sufficiently describe the road claimed to exist across the estate lands. The complaint alleges that there is a public road extending from the home of Hugh Magee in a northwesterly direction toward Temecula and in a southerly direction towards Pala, describing the property allegedly owned by the defendants over which the road passes by section, township, and range. It is also alleged that this forms one continuous road from Pala to Temecula via Smith Mountain, and that it is impossible for the plaintiff to accurately describe its course upon the ground without a survey. During the trial of the case, proof was made that in another action the plaintiff had been restrained from going upon the property owned by the Magees. We think the complaint sufficiently apprised the defendants of the location of the public road which was claimed to exist. A second contention is that the complaint is fatally defective because of a mis-joinder of parties and actions. In this connection it is claimed that an action against Hugh Magee for a way of necessity over his land is improperly joined with an action against the other defendants to establish the existence of a public road over their lands. In order to establish a way of necessity over the lands of Hugh Magee, it was necessary for the plaintiff to establish that such a way would give him access to a public road. He could do this only by alleging and proving that a public road existed over the estate lands which came to the line of Hugh Magee's land. Only one cause of action is alleged, and all defendants were proper parties. In our opinion, the demurrers were properly overruled.

[11] It is contended that the respondent's action is barred by the decision in the former case referred to, Gray v. Magee, supra. In that action, this respondent sought to establish the existence of a public road running in a westerly direction from his land across a part of the estate lands to a point on the Pala-Temecula road, some distance southerly from the old adobe house. We are unable to see how a decision holding that such a road was not in fact a public road can be a bar to the present action to establish a way of necessity running northerly from the respondent's land, through the lands of his grantor, to a point on the Pala-Temecula road a short distance northerly from the adobe house. It is further argued that, in any event, the issues of the present action could have been litigated in the former action, and that the respondent should not be permitted to harass the appellants with a multiplicity of suits or to saddle the expense thereof "upon the breaking back of the isolated Magee mountain ranch." The sympathy we might otherwise feel is somewhat tempered by the evident fact that the expense of this litigation, apparently out of all proportion to the material values involved, could easily have been avoided by a course of conduct governed less by bitterness and more by equitable considerations. While this respondent did not prevail in the former action, the record in that case discloses that his claim that the more direct road was a public one possessed considerable merit. If it may be assumed that he could with propriety have sought at the same time to establish both that he had an outlet and that he was entitled to a way of necessity because he had none, it certainly cannot be held that he foreclosed himself from all relief by first attempting to secure the more direct and better route to the outside world.

The judgment is affirmed.

COOPER et al. v. GIBSON, County Treasurer (RIVER FARMS CO. OF CALIFOR-NIA et al., Interveners).
 Civ. 4952.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
 California.

July 31, 1933.

1. Mandamus ⇨176.

It is right and duty of Court of Appeals to order distribution of portion of reclamation district's bond fund in county treasurer's possession in mandamus proceeding.

2. Drains ⇨88.

Payment of portion of reclamation district assessments, unpaid when last of district's bonds and interest coupons, for payment of which assessments were made, fall due, may be enforced to pay unpaid portion of principal of or interest on bonds, and supplemental assessment in amount still unpaid after full payment of assessments must be made (Pol. Code, § 3459, and § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

3. Drains ⇨88.

Reclamation district bond interest coupons, falling due on certain date, and county treasurer's call for payment of installments on assessments made to pay them, are independent of previous and subsequent calls and one call cannot be tacked to prior call (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

4. Drains ⇨88.

County treasurer must estimate amount necessary to meet interest, due at certain date, on reclamation district's bonds, call portion of assessment necessary to make payment thereof, and, if amount realized exceeds necessary sum, include money in bond fund in estimate (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

5. Drains ⇨88.

Money received by county treasurer on account of call for payment of assessment installments to pay reclamation district bond interest coupons, due on certain date, must be applied to payment of such coupons only (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

6. Drains ⇨88.

Moneys received from leasing or operation of lands, titles to which have vested in reclamation district by sale for delinquent assessment installments, called for to pay district bond interest coupons, should be first applied to payment of such coupons (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

7. Drains ⇨88.

Calls for payment of assessment installments to pay reclamation district bond interest coupons held proper, notwithstanding delinquency in payment of prior installments, where records showed no divestiture of assessed corporation's title to land because of delinquency sales (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

8. Drains ⇨89.

"Certificate of sale" of land for nonpayment of reclamation district assessment installment is not conveyance of title, but only evidence of purchaser's right to receive property free from former owner's claim, if latter fails to pay installment and penalty within year after sale (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Certificate of Sale," see Words & Phrases.]

9. Drains ⇨89.

Title to land, sold for nonpayment of reclamation district assessment installments, remains in owner until county treasurer executes deed to individual purchaser or district (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

10. Drains ⇨89.

County treasurer's deed of land to purchaser at sale for delinquent reclamation district assessment installment or to district does not relieve land from assessment lien, which continues until full payment of assessment (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

11. Drains ⇨89.

While deed, executed by county treasurer because of landowner's failure to redeem from sale for delinquent reclamation district assessment installment, destroys right of purchaser at prior sale to receive deed and takes precedence over prior deed, assessment lien is neither diminished nor discharged thereby (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

12. Drains ⇨84.

Lien for unpaid portion of reclamation district assessment installment, so far as owners of land assessed, purchasers at delinquency sales, and purchasers from district of lands sold and conveyed to latter are concerned, continues even after conveyance of land to district and latter's subsequent sale thereof (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

13. Drains ⇨89.

Reclamation district and county treasurer had legal right to sell land for nonpayment of assessment installment, notwithstanding prior sales thereof to treasurer for district's benefit on delinquencies in payment of previous installments and owner's redemption of land from first sale (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

14. Taxation ⇨786.

Tax deed latest in time is prior in right.

15. Drains ⇨89.

Owner of land, sold for nonpayment of assessment installment, called to pay reclamation district bond interest coupons, must ratify sale before claiming any portion of surplus proceeds (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

16. Drains ⇨89.

Statutory requirement that county treasurer pay moneys collected on assessments for payment of reclamation district bonds, including moneys derived from sales of land for delinquent installments, into main county treasury, does not enlarge district's right to receive moneys, nor purposes for which treasurer may sell lands, but refers exclusively to moneys, right to which is unquestioned (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

17. Drains ⇨89.

Landowner not ratifying reclamation district's sale of land, purchased for it by county treasurer at sale for nonpayment of assessment installment, cannot claim any portion of proceeds above amount due district (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

18. Drains ⇨89.

Reclamation district, in which title to land has vested unconditionally by a conveyance thereto as purchaser at sale for nonpayment of assessment installment, may sell it for highest sum obtainable and appropriate entire proceeds to its own uses (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

19. Drains ⇨89.

Only purpose of power, vested in county treasurer, to sell land for reclamation district's benefit after purchasing it at sale for nonpayment of assessment installment, is to realize sum sufficient to pay amount due district (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

20. Drains ⇨89.

Rights of landowner, not redeeming property, title to which has passed to reclamation district as purchaser at sale for nonpayment of assessment installment, are forever foreclosed (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

21. Drains ⇨89.

Sale of tract for nonpayment of reclamation district assessment installment must be made only for amount chargeable against such tract (Pol. Code, § 3480, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6).

22. Mandamus ⇨15.

Mandamus will not generally issue, where rights of third persons not parties would be injuriously affected, and may be refused in exercise of sound judicial discretion, where questions of grave importance concerning rights of persons, given no opportunity to be heard, are involved.

Proceeding by Frederick F. Cooper and others, as members of the Bondholders' Protective Committee of Reclamation District No. 108, for a writ of mandate to California Gibson, as Treasurer of Colusa County, in which the River Farms Company of California, a corporation, and the receiver thereof, intervened.

Writ granted.

Athearn, Chandler & Farmer and Frank R. Devlin, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Ralph W. Rutledge, of Colusa, for respondent.

Devlin, Devlin & Diepenbrock, of San Francisco, for interveners.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

Reclamation district No. 108, hereinafter referred to as reclamation district, is now, and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned, a reclamation district organized and existing under and pursuant to the laws of the state of California, situate in the counties of Colusa and Yolo, the greater portion of which is situate in the county of Colusa. The respondent, California Gibson, is, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned, was, the duly elected, qualified, and acting treasurer of the county of Colusa, and, as such, custodian of the bond fund of reclamation district No. 108; that subsequent to the organization of said reclamation district, to wit, on or about 1925, said reclamation district duly authorized, issued, and sold bonds in the aggregate par value of $3,142,000, all dated the 1st day of January, 1925, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year during the term of said bonds; that said bonds and the whole thereof were sold and issued by said reclamation district; that the principal of said bonds mature serially from January 1, 1935, to and including the 1st day of January, 1943, said bonds having attached thereto interest coupons payable on the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July during said term; that of the bonds so issued there have been surrendered and canceled bonds of the par value of $9,025.

The petitioners in this action constitute what is called a bondholders' protective committee, organized and existing for the purpose of protecting the interest of owners of bonds issued by said district; said committee having under its control bonds of said district in the par value of $695,000, together with all interest coupons on said bonds maturing July 1, 1932, and of all subsequent interest-maturing dates subsequent thereto. The agreement under which said committee is organized authorizes and empowers the committee to take any and all actions and institute all proceedings that may be considered proper, etc., in order to procure the payment of the principal and interest on said bonds. The petition in this action schedules the number of all of the bonds so held and controlled by the committee specifying that each bond is of the par value of $1,000, and that the interest coupons attached thereto are all in the sum of $30 each, specifying that the county treasurer of Colusa county will pay to the holder thereof, out of the funds of said reclamation district, the sum of $30 at and on the respective dates mentioned in said interest coupons.

The petition further sets forth that on the 2d day of May, 1933, there were outstanding unpaid coupons due on July 1, 1932, to the number of 2,092, each in the sum of $30, and on January 1, 1933, there were likewise outstanding and unpaid additional interest coupons to the number of 2,128, each in the sum of $30.

The petition then sets forth the number of coupons held by the committee, and the face value thereof, which became due and payable on July 1, 1932, and also of the coupons held by said committee, which became due and payable on January 1, 1933, and which coupons are still outstanding and unpaid.

The record shows that the respondent, as treasurer of Colusa county and custodian of the bond fund of said reclamation district, has in her possession the sum of $33,616.18, of which sum $14,588.07 was realized as the result of a call duly and regularly made by said treasurer of an installment due upon the reclamation assessment theretofore levied upon the lands of said district, which installment was called for the purpose of paying the coupons of said district maturing on July 1, 1932; that of said $33,616.18, the sum of $18,478.11 was realized as the result of an installment called by the respondent with which to make payment of the coupons maturing January 1, 1933.

It further appears that, of said last-mentioned sum of $18,478.11, $8,000 thereof was derived from the delinquent sale of certain lands belonging to the intervener River Farms Company of California for failure to pay an installment called for the purpose of paying interest coupons maturing on January 1, 1933.

The proceeding leading up to the receipt of said $8,000 appears to have been as follows: On or about the 1st day of October, 1932, the respondent, pursuant to the provisions of section 3480 of the Political Code, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6, made a call for the payment of an installment on the assessment theretofore levied upon the lands belonging to the River Farms Company of California, as intervenor (which for convenience will be called River Farms Company, which designation will also include John D. McGilvray, the receiver of said company), in the sum of $1,833.81; that said intervenor did not, nor did any owner of the property, or any one interested in the property belonging to the intervenor, pay, or offer to pay, said installment, and that upon the expiration of the time mentioned in said section of the Political Code, said call became delinquent, and the respondent, on the 22d day of December, 1932, at the hour of 2 p. m., after having given notice thereof as required by law, offered the property belonging to the intervenor, known as parcel No. 54-B for sale, and at such sale one Zumwalt became the purchaser thereof for the sum of $8,000; that thereupon the respondent in this action received said sum from said Zumwalt and issued to him a certificate of sale for said parcel of land known as 54-B.

The record further shows that prior to the sale just mentioned, to wit, on October 1, 1931, an installment in the sum of $1,593.75 was called, and the assessment of parcel No. 54-B, which subsequently became delinquent, and that on or about the 29th day of December, 1931, after regular proceedings had been taken and had therefor, said parcel was sold on account of the failure of the owner of said parcel of land, or any one interested therein, to pay said installment, at which sale the treasurer of said county bought in said parcel for the benefit of said reclamation district.

The record further shows that on April 1, 1932, a call for the payment of an installment of the assessment levied upon said parcel No. 54-B in the sum of $1,813.68, was made. This installment not having been paid, said parcel No. 54-B was, on or about the 29th day of June, 1932, again sold and bid in by the respondent for the benefit of said district.

It further appears from the record that the intervenor, River Farms Company, has redeemed said parcel of land known as No. 54-B, from the sale thereof made on or about the 29th day of December, 1931, on account of delinquency in the payment of the call made on or about the 1st day of October, 1931. So far as the record before us appears, there is nothing to indicate that any redemption has been made from the sale of said parcel No. 54-B, made on or about the 29th day of June, 1932, on account of delinquency in payment of the installment called on the 1st day of April, 1932.

Upon this proceeding we have first to consider whether the moneys received upon the respective calls to which we have referred are earmarked and appropriated to a specific purpose, to wit, to the payment of the interest coupons falling due on July 1, 1932, and the interest coupons falling due on January 1, 1933, and should be applied only to the payment of coupons falling due following the interest date for which the respective calls were made; that is, that the money received on account of an installment called to pay interest coupons falling due on July 1, 1932, should be applied only to the payment of such coupons, and that the money received for and on account of the installment call to make payment upon the interest coupons falling due January 1, 1933, should be applied only to the payment of such coupons.

The contested questions relate to the validity of the third sale made of said parcel No. 54-B, at which sale one Zumwalt paid therefor the sum of $8,000, and received from the respondent a certificate of sale; the disposition of the $8,000 received on account of said sale; whether it should be added to the bond fund of reclamation district and made available for payment to holders of interest coupons; whether the intervenors are entitled to the surplus remaining of said $8,000, after the payment of the amount of the third call herein referred to in the sum of $1,832.91, after adding thereto interest and penalties as provided by law.

These questions involve the further issue of whether the court should, upon a mandamus proceeding, pass upon the rights and titles of persons who are not parties to this proceeding; and likewise whether the court in a mandamus proceeding should order the distribution of a fund, the right to the retention of which, by the respondent, is a matter of dispute.

[1] The right and duty of the court in this proceeding to order distribution of that portion of the fund in the possession of the respondent as custodian of the bond fund of the reclamation district is fully answered by the opinion of this court in the case of Rohwer v. Gibson, 126 Cal. App. 707, 14 P.(2d) 1051, and need not be restated herein.

[2] Section 3480, supra, contains no provision for supplementing the call for an installment to pay interest coupons falling due upon the date specified in the call in the event that the amount of money realized on account of said call proves insufficient to meet the amount of interest coupons so falling due. The only provision in the section which can possibly be construed as relating thereto is the one providing as follows: "The lien of any unpaid assessment upon which bonds shall have been issued shall continue until all

Said bonds, and any refunding bonds which may be issued, shall have been paid in full, and if for any reason any part of such principal or interest of said bonds, or of refunding bonds shall remain unpaid after enforcement of said assessment as in this article provided, the board of supervisors of the main county shall order an additional or supplemental assessment to be made as provided in section 3459, sufficient to pay such unpaid principal and interest; which additional or supplemental assessment shall be enforced and collected in the same manner as the original assessment." This portion of the section presupposes a lapse of time coincident with the falling due of the last of the serial bonds and the interest coupons thereon. The reasonable construction of this language would be that, if any portion of the assessment remains unpaid at said date, and any portion of the principal of the bonds, or of the interest that may have accrued during the series of years that the bonds have been outstanding, then and in that case the unpaid portion of the assessment might be enforced for the making of such payment, and, if the assessment has been fully paid by the respective landowners, recourse must be had to a supplemental assessment covering the amount of principal and interest on the bonds left unpaid by the previous proceeding taken and had to enforce payment. Applied to the situation here presented, there is no other provision for making payment for any balance that may remain unpaid of the interest coupons falling due on a certain date after the moneys received for making payment thereof, pursuant to the call, has been applied toward such payment.

[3] That the interest coupons falling due upon a certain date and the call made for their payment stand alone and are independent of both previous and subsequent calls, and that there can be no tacking of a subsequent call to a prior call, and that such was the intent of the Legislature appears from the following paragraph contained in section 3480, supra, to wit: "At least ninety days before any interest date of the bonds, including refunding bonds, the county treasurer of the main county shall estimate the amount of money necessary to pay interest and principal maturing on such interest date, after crediting thereon the funds in the treasury applicable to the payment thereof, and shall add thereto 15 per cent. of such aggregate sum to cover possible delinquencies, and said county treasurer shall thereupon cause to be published two times, to-wit, once a week for two weeks in some newspaper of general circulation published in each county in which any of the district may be situate, a notice substantially as follows:" (Here follows the form of the call.)

[4] The inference to be drawn from this paragraph of the section is that the county treasurer shall estimate the amount necessary to meet the interest falling due at a certain date, and shall call such portion of the assessment as may be necessary to make payment thereof. If the amount realized is over and above the sum necessary to meet an interest payment, then and in that event the money in the bond fund shall be included by the county treasurer in making his estimate of the amount necessary to make payment of the interest coupons for which the installment is called.

[5] There is no provision in the paragraph which we have quoted, nor in any other paragraph, save and except as hereinbefore stated, covering the subject of a deficiency to meet interest payments. That this is the correct interpretation of the intent of the Legislature appears from the fact that the subject and provisions of section 3480, supra, set up the necessary machinery and procedure for enforcing each installment call, and contain no provision for enforcing collective installment calls.

We conclude, therefore, that the money received on account of each call is so far earmarked that, if ordered distributed, it should be ordered distributed so as to apply the money received on account of the call intended to make payment of the interest coupons falling due on July 1, 1932, to the payment of such interest coupons only, and that the moneys received on account of an installment call intended to raise money for the payment of interest coupons falling due on January 1, 1933, should be applied to the payment of such interest coupons only.

No procedure being set forth in the statutes for calling assessments to pay any deficiency in the amount realized to meet the semiannual interest payments, it may be that a court of equity would have jurisdiction of an action instituted for the purpose of requiring the treasurer to make an additional or supplemental installment call for the purpose of covering such deficiency.

[6] As to the appropriation of the moneys received from the leasing or operation of lands, the titles to which have become vested in the district, it would appear that the money so received should be first applied to the payment of the interest due coincident with the period when the installment intended for the payment of such interest became delinquent. This would seem to be the intention of the Legislature by the language used in section 3480, supra, wherein the treasurer, in making his estimate of the amount necessary to pay interest and principal maturing on any date, is directed to credit such funds in the treasury to the payment of such interest and principal. In other words, the amount on hand so received is to be applied to the payment of the interest and principal falling due, to pay which the installment call is made and becomes a part of the fund available for such purpose.

[7] Was the respondent, as treasurer of reclamation district, without legal authority to make sale of parcel No. 54-B, on the 22d day of December, 1932, by reason of the delinquency in making payment of the installment called on the 1st day of October, 1932? So far as the record is before us, it discloses title to said parcel of land as vested in the River Farms Company on the 1st day of October, 1931, at the date of the first call mentioned herein. It likewise discloses the title vested in the River Farms Company on the 1st day of April, 1932, the date of the second installment call considered herein, and also that the title to said parcel No. 54-B was vested in the River Farms Company on the 1st day of October, 1932, the date of the third installment presented for our consideration. Likewise it appears from the record that on the 22d day of December, 1932, title was still vested to parcel No. 54-B in the River Farms Company.

Redemption is alleged to have been made by the intervener as to the first installment mentioned herein called on the 1st day of October, 1931. The record is silent as to any redemption following the second installment call made the 1st day of April, 1932. It is likewise silent as to any deed having been made transferring title to said property from the River Farms Company to the reclamation district. The record showing no divestiture of title by reason of any delinquent sales, it follows that the several installment calls were properly made, irrespective of the fact that a prior delinquency had been suffered by the River Farms Company.

[8-11] The form of the notice required to be given by the treasurer is directed to "all assessed landowners of said district," and, at the date of the respective calls and the several notices given in pursuance thereof, the lands involved in this action were owned by the River Farms Company. A certificate of sale only had been issued by the treasurer on account of sales made following each delinquency, but a certificate of sale is not a conveyance of title and is only an evidence that the person named therein is entitled to receive the property free from any claims of the former owner in the event that the owner does not avail himself, or itself, of the privilege given by the statutes of paying the amount of the installment, together with certain specified penalties, within one year from the date of sale. The right given under the Code provisions, to the treasurer as trustee for the district, is simply a power of sale for a particular purpose, to wit, raising money to cover the amount of the installment, interest, and penalties mentioned. This procedure follows each delinquency suffered subsequent to an installment call, and the title remains in the owner until a deed of conveyance is made by the county treasurer, either to an individual purchaser or to the district, by reason of failure of individual purchasers to bid for the lands burdened with the delinquency. Even this deed does not relieve the lands from the lien of the assessment. Under the provisions of the Code, the lien of the assessment continues until it is fully paid. Thus, while a deed executed and delivered by reason of failure of the owner to redeem, following a subsequent sale, cuts off or destroys the right of a purchaser at a prior sale to receive a deed to the premises, and also takes precedence of a prior deed, the lien of the assessment is neither diminished nor discharged. This seems to us clear from the following language found in one of the paragraphs of section 3480, supra, to wit: "Which deed shall convey to the grantee therein named the said land free and clear of all encumbrances, except state, county and municipal taxes, and any taxes or assessments of irrigation, conservation or water storage districts, and except any portion of any reclamation assessment remaining unpaid at the date of said sale."

[12] The only exemption as to the calling of installments is made when the property has been conveyed to the county treasurer as trustee of the district. Even after the land has been conveyed to the county treasurer as trustee of the district, and by the district subsequently sold, the lien of the assessment immediately comes into full force and effect with the same operative power against the lands, although no sale had been made. The deed can only be made subject to the payment "of the amount for which the parcel of land was bid in by the treasurer at the delinquent sale, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, compounded yearly from the date of said delinquent sale, and also the amount of all subsequent installments then delinquent with accrued interest and penalties thereon." It is then provided "that the deed to such purchaser upon such sale conveys said property free of incumbrance, except state, county and municipal taxes, and the unpaid balance of said assessment."

Under the various provisions of the Code which we have cited, the lien of the assessment, so far as the owners of the land assessed are concerned, so far as purchasers at delinquent sales may be affected, and also including purchasers from the district of the lands which have been sold and conveyed to the district, the lien of the assessment for the unpaid portion thereof still exists. Any other construction of the Code provisions would permit an owner, by suffering an installment call to go delinquent, to escape payment of a portion of the assessment levied upon his lands. The levy is made upon the lands of the respective owners according to the benefits conferred, and each landowner owes it to every other landowner in the district to make payment of his proportionate share, and the construction of the Code provisions which we have given carries out, we think, the intention of the Legislature that no tract of land shall be relieved of the burden so imposed upon it save and except by making full payment.

[13] We conclude from this résumé of the Code provisions that the district, and respondent as the county treasurer of the county of Colusa, had a legal right to make sale of parcel No. 54-B on the 22d day of December, 1932.

[14] That a tax deed, latest in time, is prior in right, is the law of this state, as set forth in the opinion in the case of Anderson v. Rider, 46 Cal. 134, 135. Other cases might be cited from other jurisdictions, supporting what we have just stated, but, as the California case has never been modified, it is unnecessary to make further citations.

Our conclusion that the respondent, as trustee for reclamation district, had the legal right to exercise the power of sale vested in him on December 22, 1932, is not intended to express any views of the court as to whether the River Farms Company might or might not, in an action brought for that purpose, have said sale set aside as voidable. In such a proceeding, however, equity being claimed by the River Farms Company, equitable action on its part would also be required of making payment of the amount of the delinquent installment for which the land was sold, and the costs and penalties legally attaching thereto, thus leaving in the funds of the district the amount of the installment, together with the penalties, whether such moneys were moneys paid by the purchaser Zumwalt or moneys paid by the River Farms Company in complying with equitable principles upon its part.

[15] This leaves undisposed of $6,167.19 of the $8,000 bid by Zumwalt for parcel No. 54-B. The petitioners claim that the writ of mandate prayed for herein, if issued, should direct that this sum be distributed in payment upon the interest coupons due as heretofore stated in this opinion. A portion of the River Farms Company contention is to the effect that the sale is absolutely void, and another portion of its contention is that the company is entitled to the surplus.

Section 3466 of the Political Code, as it read in 1920, having to do with sales on account of delinquent installments called on assessments where no bonds have been issued, or were outstanding, required surplus moneys to be paid to the owner. As amended in 1931 (St. 1931, p. 759, § 5), that provision now reads: "Out of the proceeds of said sale the County Treasurer shall place the amount due on said property, as shown in said notice in the proper funds of said District and shall pay to the owner of said property any surplus remaining." No such provision is found in section 3480, supra. There is, however, a principle of law involved which we think controlling here: That the landowner must first ratify the sale before it can claim any portion of the surplus. If the sale of parcel No. 54-B to Zumwalt should be set aside upon proceedings taken by the River Farms Company for that purpose, it is evident that the surplus would not belong to the River Farms Company. Whether it would belong to Zumwalt or to the district is a question, which we cannot definitely decide here, for the reason that Zumwalt is not a party to this action and will not be included in the order, for reasons hereinafter stated.

The principles which we are stating are succinctly set forth in 61 C. J., p. 1213, § 1641, showing when the owner is entitled to the surplus, and where his accepting any portion of the surplus presupposes and is based upon a ratification of the sale. A number of cases are cited in the footnotes to section 1641, supra, including Cooley on Taxation, vol. 3 (4th Ed.) p. 2443, § 1436. Also the case of Shattuck v. Smith, 6 N. D. 56, 69 N. W. 5, is called to our attention by counsel both for the petitioners and for the River Farms Company.

[16] The following language, to wit: "All moneys collected by any county treasurer upon any assessment upon which bonds shall have been issued, including all moneys derived from sale of land for delinquent installments, or from redemption thereof, or from sale of lands bought by the treasurer at any such sale, shall be by such treasurer forthwith paid into the main county treasury," etc.—contained in section 3480, supra, is not an enlargement of the right of the reclamation district to receive any moneys to which it would otherwise not be entitled, nor does it confer upon the reclamation district any additional title to moneys so paid into the bond fund, nor is it an enlargement of the purposes for which the county treasurer may exercise the powers of sale elsewhere conferred upon him by the section from which we have quoted. A direction to pay over money and a further provision for its use cannot be construed as a transmutation of title. The only rational interpretation to be given to the language which we have just quoted is that it refers exclusively to moneys where the right thereto and the ownership thereof are unquestioned.

[17, 18] Without elaborating further upon this point, there appears to us no ratification of the sale made of parcel No. 54-B on the 22d day of December, 1932, and the River Farms Company is not in a position to claim any portion of the surplus. There seems to us a clear line of demarkation between the right of the district upon lands sold on account of a delinquent assessment and lands sold by the district after it has acquired a title thereto. When the lands have been sold and conveyed to the district, and title thus vested unconditionally in the district, it seems to us clear that the district has a right to sell the land for the highest possible sum that it can obtain for the same, and appropriate to its own uses and purposes every dollar received from such sale.

[19] This view is upheld in the case of Furrey v. Lautz, 162 Cal. 397, 122 P. 1073, an instance where the title was vested. That was an instance where the taxing power had obtained an indefeasible title and made sale of its own property. As we have stated, the power of sale vested in the county treasurer by section 3480, supra, for the benefit of the district, has for its purpose one object, just as the power of sale in a trust deed or mortgage, to wit, the realizing of a sum sufficient to pay the amount of money then due, including penalties and costs; that is, the money to which the district is entitled. Any other conclusion would lead to the imposition upon the landowner of a more onerous burden than contemplated when the assessment was levied upon his land, to wit, that he should pay for the benefits conferred upon his property.

[20] The redemption clause in section 3480 is general in its terms, reading as follows: "Any person interested in the said property may redeem the same at any time within one year after the date of sale, by paying to the county treasurer for such purchaser a sum equal to the purchase price stated in the certificate, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum from the date of sale to such redemption." This leads us back to the price for which the county treasurer, representing the district, is entitled to obtain by the exercise of the power of sale. This does not trench upon the rights of any of the bondholders. All the bondholders are entitled to is to have the assessment upon each particular tract of land fully paid; that is the lien provided for by the Codes and the security to which each bondholder is entitled to look. In the event that the redemption is not made and the county treasurer becomes the holder of the legal title for the benefit of the district, then and in that event the district, for the benefit of the bondholders, is entitled to sell the land for any sum that it may obtain, as such sale does not place any additional burden upon the landholder. Not having exercised the right of redemption and allowing the title to pass into the district, his rights, of course, are forever foreclosed.

In determining the right of the district to moneys realized upon sales, the distinction must be clearly kept in mind between sales made following delinquent installments and sales made after title has become vested in the district or in the county treasurer as trustee for the district. In the one instance the district is entitled to have sale made for a specific purpose; in the other, to have sale made to obtain all the money possible.

[21] The Legislature has fixed the penalties and costs that must be paid by a redemptioner after allowing an installment to go delinquent, and we are not aware of any rule of law or principle of equity that would permit penalties and costs fixed by the Legislature to be increased by any action of the county treasurer. Nor do we know of any rule of law or principle of equity which would permit bondholders to increase the value of their security at the expense of the landowner seeking to redeem his property from a delinquent sale. The principle of law applicable to the sale of lands for delinquent taxes in the state of California, we think, in the absence of any specific statute, should be applied to the sale of lands in reclamation districts. In sales of land made by other tax-collecting officials in the state of California, it is a prerequisite that the sale of the smallest parcel of land must be made that will discharge the delinquent tax penalties and costs. Applied to a sale of a reclamation district where the whole tract is burdened with an assessment, it would require the sale to be made only for the amount chargeable against the tract. Otherwise, any landowner in a reclamation district whose financial condition prevented his meeting the installment calls until after a sale had been made might be required to pay two or three times the amount of the installment call or lose his land entirely. The cases having to do with the fixing of penalties by Legislatures do not lay a basis for the enhancement of a penalty by a county treasurer making sale, or by persons bidding for the land upon an installment sale. If the land had been sold and conveyed to the county treasurer, as trustee for the district, then, as we have stated, the sale may be made for the highest obtainable price.

As the case is presented to us, we do not deem it necessary to go further into the constitutional questions presented, nor to cite the various decisions affecting the constitutionality of the different provisions of section 3480, supra.

[22] Finally, should the writ of mandate issue herein to the full extent prayed for by the petitioners? This question is answered in the negative by the rule stated in 38 C. J. p. 558, § 30, where the text reads: "Mandamus will not as a general rule issue, where the rights of third persons not parties would be injuriously affected. Where questions of grave importance concerning rights of persons who have had no opportunity to be heard are involved in mandamus proceedings, the court, in the exercise of its sound judicial discretion, may refuse the writ, although it is an appropriate remedy." This precise question was passed upon by this court in the case of Spurrier v. Neumiller, 37 Cal. App. 683, 174 P. 338, 340, where it is said: "Mandamus will not lie where its effect would be inequitable or unjust as to third persons or will introduce confusion or will not promote substantial justice." To the same effect is the case of Board of Education v. San Diego, 128 Cal. 369, 60 P. 976. See, also, 16 California Jurisprudence, p. 780, § 14.

It follows, therefore, from what we have said, that, in the calculation of the fund to be distributed in payment of the interest coupons alleged to be due, there should be deducted therefrom the sum of $6,167.19.

Following this deduction, it is ordered that the writ prayed for be issued, directing the respondent as custodian of the funds of reclamation district to make distribution of the remaining funds in her hands, in accordance with the opinion of this court.

By reason of the conclusions at which we have arrived, the amount of money available for payment set forth in the petition on file herein must be revised.

It is therefore ordered that counsel for petitioners prepare the form of an order to be made by this court, specifically directing the amount of payments to be made and the percentage to be paid upon each interest coupon.

We concur: PULLEN, P. J.; R. L. THOMPSON, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Suit by Emanuel Cohen against the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank and others, wherein the defendant Joseph Pollard filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff and the other defendants. From the judgment rendered, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed in part and reversed in part, with directions, and case remanded.

Patterson, Bailey & Montgomery, E. S. Patterson, Frederick I. Richman, and William S. Scully, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Freston & Files, of Los Angeles, for respondents Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, Bank of America of California, and Merchants' National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles.

Tanner, Odell & Taft and Garratt B. Sargent, all of Los Angeles, for respondents Jenkins and Pollard.

CASHIN, Justice.

Plaintiff brought suit against defendants above named, seeking the termination of a trust, the reconveyance of certain real property which was the subject of the trust, and an accounting. Joseph Pollard appeared in the action and with his answer filed a cross-complaint. He alleged that he was originally the owner of the land subject to the trust; that he entered into an agreement with John

J. Jenkins and Irving H. Hellman whereby, in consideration of their promise to pay him $100 a month for his natural life, he conveyed the land to Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, as trustee; that it was agreed that said payments were to be a charge thereon, and further that he was to retain during his lifetime possession of a portion thereof; that according to certain escrow instructions given by him to the bank at the time of the conveyance the latter agreement was to have been made a part of the trust agreement executed by the bank; that without his knowledge the same was omitted therefrom; that the bank and plaintiff as well as Jenkins and Hellman had full knowledge of the agreement when their interests in the property were acquired. He asked that it be decreed that the bank's successor holds the title subject to said agreement and in trust for the payment of said monthly sums, and that as security therefor he has a vendor's lien thereon.

The trial court found that on February 21, 1924, a declaration of trust was executed by the bank, reciting that the real property mentioned, which was situated in San Bernardino county, had been conveyed to the bank by J. J. Jenkins to be held in trust as security for the payment of a note for $10,000 executed by Jenkins to the bank; that the bank was given power to sell, lease, or exchange the property and apply the proceeds in payment of the debt, advancements, and expenses; that the bank agreed to reconvey to Jenkins or his assigns before a sale of the property upon the payment of the indebtedness; that prior to the date of the declaration Joseph Pollard was the owner of the property and in November, 1922, while such owner, the same was purchased from him by Jenkins and defendant Hellman, a director and vice president of the bank, who as part of the purchase price agreed in writing to pay him $100 per month during his natural life; that this agreement should be a charge upon the property, and that it was further agreed in writing that he should have the possession during his life of such portion thereof as should be thereafter agreed upon by himself and Jenkins; that it was further agreed that the property be conveyed to said bank as security for the sum of $10,000 to be borrowed by Jenkins and which was to be used to pay off certain liens upon the property aggregating $4,200, and the settlement of pending litigation respecting an undivided half interest therein; that the bank should also hold the property in trust subject to Pollard's rights therein and to secure the monthly payments agreed to be made to him. The court further found that without Pollard's knowledge or consent the provisions agreed upon for the protection of his rights in the property were omitted from the trust agreement, although it was agreed between him and the bank and Jenkins, acting for himself and Hellman, that his conveyance should be subject to his rights above stated and that the bank should hold the property in trust for the additional purposes agreed upon; further, that at the time of the execution of the above declaration Jenkins and Hellman as part of the same transaction entered into the writing setting forth their agreement with Pollard as above stated, and that this was also delivered to the bank, which retains the same; that Pollard has at all times mentioned actually resided on a portion of the property described in the findings and upon which are situated his house and necessary out-buildings; that it was agreed by Jenkins and Hellman immediately after the making of the contract in November, 1922, that this should constitute the portion in which Pollard should retain a life interest; that in April, 1924, Hellman sold to plaintiff one-half of Hellman's interest in the property and beneficial interest in the trust, all subject to the obligations to Pollard and the latter's interest in the property; that prior thereto plaintiff, who was also a vice president and director of the bank mentioned, had full knowledge of the agreements with Pollard and took his interest subject thereto; that thereafter plaintiff paid from time to time his proportionate share of the monthly payments agreed to be made to Pollard and recognized the obligations due the latter. The court also found that the trustee sold portions of the property on contract and by deed; that the debt secured had not been paid from the proceeds, however, but partially by Jenkins and Hellman, and that the trust agreement was still in force and effect; that defendant Bank of America had succeeded the original trustee as such, and under the terms of the trust holds the funds, contracts, and trusts originally held by the bank first mentioned; further, that no payments contrary to the trust agreement had been made as alleged by plaintiff; that the trustee had fully accounted to the beneficiaries for all moneys received and paid out, and as a conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment terminating the trust, or an accounting, or an injunction which was sought restraining payments by the trustee, or other relief.

The court concluded that Pollard was entitled to a decree adjudging that the present trustee holds the property in trust to secure the monthly payments mentioned and subject to his right of possession during his life of a portion of the property, which was described in the decision and upon which Pollard resided. A judgment was entered accordingly. This judgment also provided that upon Pollard's death the property remaining should be held by the trustee subject to the trust for the benefit of plaintiff, the said Hellman, and Hazel S. Jenkins, the executrix of the estate of J. J. Jenkins, now deceased, until the purpose of the trust had terminated. No decree was made with respect to the alleged vendor's lien.

Plaintiff, who has appealed, contends that the finding that he had notice of the agreement with Pollard and that the trustee had not breached its duties are unsupported; further, that Pollard had no place in the suit; that the court was without jurisdiction to enter a decree with respect to his interest in the property; and that the finding as to the particular portion thereof in which Pollard has a life interest is also without support.

[1] As to the first finding the evidence, both direct and indirect, clearly shows that plaintiff had actual knowledge of the facts when he purchased from Hellman; moreover, Pollard was at all times in possession, and this was a relevant fact on the question of notice. 25 Cal. Jur., Vendor and Purchaser, § 282, p. 834. Under the trust agreement the trustee was authorized to lease, sell, or exchange the property and to make advancements for its care, protection, and benefit. It appears that defendant Hazel S. Jenkins, the surviving wife of J. J. Jenkins, by consent of the trustee, cared for the property and negotiated sales of portions thereof. For all her services she was paid the equivalent of a commission on such sales, and the trustee also paid sums for equipment and certain of the amounts due monthly to Pollard. The testimony shows sufficiently that the sums received by Mrs. Jenkins were not, properly speaking, commissions upon the sale of real estate, as urged by plaintiff, but were payments for her services generally, and that these sums as well as those paid for equipment were reasonably necessary for the care and protection of the property. The trustee appears to have recognized the Pollard claims and made certain of the monthly payments on the assumption that such was its duty under the trust. In view of the conclusions of the trial court, this was proper, and we are satisfied that there was no breach of duty by the trustee in any of the respects alleged by plaintiff.

Several defendants, whose names were obviously fictitious, were joined in plaintiff's complaint. Pollard was not served with summons, but nevertheless appeared, alleging that he was sued as one of these defendants, and filed an answer and cross-complaint. Plaintiff raised no objection at the time, but answered the cross-complaint, and later answered an amendment thereto. His objection was made for the first time at the trial. Plaintiff claims that he had the right to choose the parties he wished to sue, and that the court was without jurisdiction to entertain the Pollard pleadings.

[2-5] As a general rule a plaintiff has the right to select the persons whom he desires to make defendants in the action. Mercantile Trust Co. v. Stockton, etc., Co., 44 Cal. App. 558, 186 P. 1049. This, however, is subject to the right to intervene in a proper case and the power of the court to bring in parties necessary or proper to a complete determination of the controversy; and in actions of this character, where the evidence shows that a third person has an interest as a beneficiary in the subject-matter of the suit, the court may order him to be made a party. O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 P. 236; Alison v. Goldtree, 117 Cal. 545, 49 P. 571. The suit was one in which Pollard might properly have been allowed to intervene (Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 488, 24 P. 930; Code Civ. Proc. § 387); and, in view of the evidence, the court did not err in permitting him to continue as a party thereto.

[6-8] The property subject to the trust is, as stated, situated in San Bernardino county, and the suit was brought in the county of Los Angeles. The banks make the claim that for this reason the court was without jurisdiction to entertain the same.

Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution provides that " * * * all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, * * * is situated." In such cases, if the suit is brought in the wrong county the court is without jurisdiction, and the action must be dismissed; but the constitutional provision, being a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the court, is to be strictly construed, and its application is confined to those instances in which the complaint without reference to any pleadings by defendant states a case coming within the actions enumerated. Waters v. Pool, 130 Cal. 136, 62 P. 385; 25 Cal. Jur., Venue, § 9, p. 861; Wood v. Thompson, 5 Cal. App. 247, 90 P. 38; Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., 140 Cal. 132, 73 P. 836, which case in this respect overruled Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 57 P. 1012. Plaintiff's action was not to recover the possession of the property or to quiet the title thereto, and no lien was sought to be enforced.

Based upon his allegations that the debt to the trustee had been paid, and that consequently the purpose for which the trust had been created had ceased, he sought a reconveyance of the property to those alleged to be the beneficiaries. In addition, upon the allegation that the trustee had misapplied funds received, he asked for an accounting of and judgment for his proportionate share of these funds.

[9, 10] As stated, the trustee had agreed to reconvey when the purposes of the trust should be fulfilled, and the action was one to enforce the trust and for an accounting; part of the relief sought being the performance of the trustee's promise to reconvey. When the purpose for which an express trust was created ceases, the estate of the trustee also ceases (Civ. Code, § 871), and a bill in equity may be maintained by those beneficially interested to extinguish it. Tyler v. Currier, 147 Cal. 31, 81 P. 319; Fletcher v. Los Angeles Trust, etc., Bank, 182 Cal. 177, 187 P. 425; Ringrose v. Gleadall, 17 Cal. App. 664, 121 P. 407. It has been held that a trust created to secure a debt is but little more than a mortgage with power to convey, and that upon payment the property reverts in the trustor without reconveyance (Nilson v. Sarment, 153 Cal. 524, 530, 96 P. 315, 126 Am. St. Rep. 91), and also that the only purpose of requiring the execution of a deed of reconveyance is to make the record title clear. Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379, 53 P. 813; Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 P. 442, 64 P. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70; Montgomery v. Meyerstein, 186 Cal. 459, 199 P. 800.

A suit for specific performance and to compel a reconveyance is an action in personam (53 Cor. Jur., Reformation of Instruments, § 148, p. 992) and is not within the constitutional provision. Grocers' Fruit, etc., Co. v. Kern County Land Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 P. 120. Nor is an action to declare a trust in real property one to quiet title. Donohoe v. Rogers, 168 Cal. 700, 144 P. 958. These provisions have no application to an action for the settlement of a trust, nor where the action is one to compel a trustee to perform his duties and close the trust. LeBreton v. Superior Ct., 66 Cal. 27, 4 P. 777; Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 P. 1161.

[11, 12] Under subdivision 1 of section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure, actions for the recovery of real property or of an estate or an interest therein, or for a determination in any form of such right or interest, or for injuries to real property, must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as provided by the Code; and the following cases cited by counsel were actions within the above Code provision: Baker v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 73 Cal. 182, 14 P. 686; Sloss v. De Toro, 77 Cal. 129, 19 P. 233; Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 P. 356; Booker v. Aitken, 140 Cal. 471, 74 P. 11; Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., 140 Cal. 132, 73 P. 836; McFarland v. Martin, 144 Cal. 771, 78 P. 239; Franklin v. Dutton, 79 Cal. 605, 21 P. 964; Donohoe v. Rogers, supra; Smalley v. Peckham, 175 Cal. 146, 165 P. 438; Grocers' Fruit, etc., Co. v. Kern County Land Co., supra; Hannah v. Canty, 1 Cal. App. 225, 81 P. 1035; Bartley v. Fraser, 16 Cal. App. 560, 117 P. 683;

Reid v. Kerr, 64 Cal. App. 118, 220 P. 688; Kopke v. Carlson, 98 Cal. App. 155, 276 P. 606; Stanley v. Barney, 123 Cal. App. 139, 10 P.(2d) 1022. In a few instances the opinions in these cases contain the statement that the action was commenced as required by the constitutional provision, but an examination shows that this was not necessary to the decision, the Code section alone being applicable.

The subdivision of the Code section does not affect the jurisdiction of the court; and if the county in which the action is commenced is not under its provisions the proper place for the trial, the only remedy is a demand for a change of venue; otherwise the objection is waived. Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 65 P. 139; Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., supra; Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern County Land Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 P. 120; Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 59, 73, 99 P. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391. Here no objection to the venue was made; and plaintiff's action, if within the provisions of the said subdivision of the Code section, was nevertheless within the jurisdiction of the trial court, and we are satisfied from the above decisions that there was no constitutional objection to the commencement or trial of his action in Los Angeles county.

[13, 14] As respects the cross-complaint, in addition to the claim that a vendor's lien should be decreed—and which in effect the court denied—the gist of the action was the reformation of the trust agreement in order to make it express the real understanding which the court found was known to all the parties to the suit. While no formal decree of reformation was made, this result was reached by the findings mentioned and by adjudging that the trustee hold the property subject to Pollard's rights as therein determined.

As a rule a proceeding to reform a writing is in personam and not in rem. 23 R. C. L., Reformation of Instruments, § 52, p. 354. Nevertheless, where the writing involves the title to real property and the action would determine in some form a right or interest therein, the case is within the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Franklin v. Dutton, supra; Stanley v. Barney, supra); but as held in the cases hereinbefore cited, the requirement that such actions be tried in the county in which the land is situated—as also the objection when brought in the wrong county—may be and is waived if there is no demand for a change of venue.

Pollard did not seek to quiet the title or to recover the possession of the land; and although he claimed a vendor's lien thereon his suit was not to foreclose such lien but for a decree declaring its existence and that the trustee hold the property subject to the original agreement. For these reasons his action was not within the constitutional provision mentioned, and no demand for a change of venue having been made the superior court of Los Angeles county had jurisdiction.

The terms of the original agreement were in writing, and knowledge thereof by all concerned was shown. It is clear that some of these terms were omitted from the trust agreement by mistake. Pollard, who was an aged man, appears to have entrusted the whole matter to Jenkins, Hellman, and the bank, and, so far as shown, he received no independent advice as to the sufficiency of the bank's declaration of trust to cover the original agreement.

With respect to the portion of the property in which Pollard claimed a life estate it is contended that there was no evidence supporting the finding as to its legal description.

Pollard alleged that he made his home upon a portion of the property, and that it was agreed by the parties that he should retain possession of this portion. Plaintiff denied these allegations. The former testified that he had lived upon the property since 1905, and that the improvements thereon consisted of a house, barn, and other out-buildings; but there was no testimony or other evidence sufficient to identify or show the legal description of the portion in which he was to retain a life interest, and the plaintiff's objection to the findings and decree in this respect must be sustained. With this exception the findings and judgment are fully supported. It will be necessary therefore to remand the case in order that this portion be identified and its legal description ascertained.

That portion of the judgment which decrees that said Joseph Pollard has a life estate in that portion of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 15, township 2 north, range 6 west, S. B. B. & M., beginning at a point which is south 34 degrees 12 minutes west 43.22 feet from the northwest corner of lot 10, block 16, of tract 1905, J. J. Jenkins subdivision of Happy Jack ranch, as recorded in book 27, page 36 of Records of San Bernardino County; thence north 14 degrees 46 minutes east 75.41 feet; thence north 83 degrees 34 minutes west 117.50 feet; thence south 19 degrees 34 minutes west 53.7 feet; thence south 72 degrees 55 minutes west 120.85 feet to the point of beginning, is reversed, with directions that the identity and legal description of the portion of the property of which it was agreed that Pollard should retain possession during his life be determined. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

PEOPLE v. FERGUSON.

Cr. 2180.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Aug. 25, 1933.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 22,
1933.

1. False pretenses ⇨11.

In prosecution for grand theft based on sales of trust shares, certificates sold entitling holder to share in any profits resulting from venture of others in real estate were "personal property."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Personal Property," see Words & Phrases.]

2. Criminal law ⇨308, 560.

Criminal conviction cannot be based on mere suspicion, there being presumption of innocence.

3. False pretenses ⇨41.

In prosecution for grand theft by false pretenses in sale of trust interests, testimony as to profits and how they were arrived at held material.

Such testimony was material because of showing that defendant's trusts were intentionally made attractive by fraudulent method of declaring large returns on some of the trusts in order to induce the sale of interests in others.

4. False pretenses ⇨49(3).

Conviction of grand theft by false pretenses in sale of trust interests held sustained, as against contention that purchases of trust interests were made through reliance on promises of future profits.

5. False pretenses ⇨49(1).

Larceny ⇨62(2).

Evidence held to support conviction for grand theft by false pretenses or larceny by trick and device in sale of trust interests.

Evidence showed that defendant's trusts had been fraudulently manipulated to show very large returns, and that they had not paid except fraudulently. Defendant argued that case of false pretenses was not made because buying and selling of beneficial interests by, into, and out of the several trusts was not disclosed to the complaining witnesses, but false pretense was that defendant's trusts had made great profits and others would do the same.

6. False pretenses ⇨49(3).

Conviction of grand theft by false pretenses in sale of trust interests held sustained as against contention there was lack of corroboration.

Evidence showed purchases were made because of belief in great profits in defendant's trusts. These profits were induced by fraud amounting to false pretenses. All of this was corroborated by evidence establishing the whole structure of the scheme.

7. False pretenses ⇨49(4).

Conviction of grand theft by false pretenses in sale of trust interests held sustained as against contention that, if misrepresentations were made, defendant did not authorize them.

The evidence showed that defendant knew of misrepresentations generally and intended that they should be made for purpose of inducing sales, but, even if evidence did not directly connect defendant therewith, the circumstances were such as to make such inference as dependable as the direct testimony could itself do.

8. False pretenses ⇨49(1).

Conviction of grand theft by false pretenses in sale of trust interests held sustained, as against contention conviction could not be upheld with respect to sales to salesmen.

The point made was that such conviction could not be sustained because representations were not made to induce the complaining witness to buy, but to teach him to sell; he being one of crew of salesmen.

9. False pretenses ⇨49(1).

In prosecution for grand theft by false pretenses in sale of trust interests, evidence held insufficient to support conviction as to certain trust.

Under such count the testimony regarding the inducing representations as to payment of a dividend referred to certain trust, and the investment of money in that trust, but later witness said he invested in another trust but made no correction as to the inducing representation.

10. Licenses ⇨18½.

Interests of holders in trust organized to deal in real estate, whereby holders acquired merely right of participation in profits from sale of lots in real estate purchased, held "securities" requiring permit of corporation commissioner for their sales (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Security," see Words & Phrases.]

11. Licenses ⇨42(4).

In prosecution for violating Corporate Securities Act in sale of trust interests, exclusion of testimony that officials of state corporation department had advised defendant that he need not get license to sell such interests held error (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended).

2. Criminal law ☞32.

Advice of counsel or ignorance of law will not excuse offense.

13. Licenses ☞40.

General rule that unlawful act knowingly and willfully done imports intent to violate law is inapplicable in case of violating Corporate Securities Act by selling securities without license (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. Rey Schauer, Judge.

Harold G. Ferguson was convicted of grand theft and of violating the Corporate Securities Act, and he appeals.

Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court. THOMPSON, J., deeming himself disqualified, took no part in the consideration of the petition.

Frank P. Doherty and Bourke Jones, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STEPHENS, Justice.

The court, sitting without a jury found the appellant, Harold G. Ferguson, guilty of grand theft in counts 2 to 6, inclusive, 11, 12, 17, 18, 19, 22 to 25, inclusive, 29 and 30, and guilty of violating the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, as amended), in counts 34 to 43, inclusive, excepting count 41, all charged in a grand jury indictment. (For convenience we use Arabic instead of Roman numerals as used in the indictment and as sometimes used in the briefs.) The issues of this appeal will be better understood after the reading of the following quoted portion of the trial court's able narrative as unfolded by the evidence:

"In the year 1927 the defendant Ferguson was engaged in the real estate business in the City and County of Los Angeles and, having handled various realty transactions through the medium of syndicate trusts, conceived the idea of a revolving trust, by means of which comparatively small investments of a relatively large number of persons would be combined in a trust organization with a banking institution acting as trustee, and Mr. Ferguson, through his alter ego, the Harold G. Ferguson Corporation, acting as trust manager. Pursuant to this plan conceived by Mr. Ferguson, a trust was organized naming the Pacific National Bank as trustee and the Ferguson Corporation as trust manager, which trust, capitalized for $250,000.00, became known as P.T. (Private Trust) No. 27. This was in the month of February. The interests of the subscribers to such trust were evidenced by documents called certificates of beneficial interest, and it is around the sale of these certificates of beneficial interest in P.T. 27 and in other revolving trusts, which were thereafter organized, that most of the charges in this case arise. The sale of such beneficial interests in P.T. 27 proceeded slowly at first.

"Mr. Ferguson has been a resident of Los Angeles for some 38 years, was educated in this state and admitted to the bar, and practiced law here, [and] occupied various official and civic positions. * * * He served with distinction during the World War and thereafter achieved an enviable and outstanding position in the community both commercially and socially. [In 1927] Mr. Ferguson acquired a controlling interest in the Wimsett System Corporation, and Mr. Luckey (a co-defendant) and one Lloyd Bergman became owners in equal shares of the minority interest. Mr. Luckey acquired no interest in the Ferguson Corporation, and at no time was employed by it, although he was sometimes referred to as the manager of the finance or securities department thereof. Mr. Ferguson was made president and manager, and Mr. Bergman secretary and treasurer of the Wimsett System Corporation, and such organization began to build up a sales force for the purpose of marketing the certificates of beneficial interest in revolving trusts to be created by Mr. Ferguson. Thereafter, in October, 1927, a $1,000,000 trust, known as P.T. 50 was organized, and the following year Trust 33, a $5,000,000 trust, and Trusts 999 and 1013 were organized. Trusts 27, 50 and 33 were advertised as being organized for the purpose of buying and selling real estate in California; Trust 999 was authorized to deal in both real and personal property, and 1013 confined its activities to one particular tract of land known as a portion of the Rancho Malibu La Costa. These five trusts, which have been described, are the only ones with the sale of whose interests to the public we are directly concerned, but some of them dealt somewhat extensively in interests in certain other trusts, which it will be necessary for us to mention. Chief among the latter are S-6638, frequently referred to as the Canoga, No. 3070, known as the Palm Ranch, and Nos. 5710 and 5411. Of these * * * the Canoga, S-6638, will occupy the most prominent part in our discussion. It comprised some thirty-six hundred acres of land, situated in Los Angeles County * * * [T]he shares therein were offered and sold to the public at the rate of one thousand dollars per .08 interest, the declaration of trust, however, requiring the payment of only five hundred dollars per .08 interest to the trustee. This declaration of trust, by its own terms, declared that the interests of beneficiaries thereunder were purely personal in character and that the holders thereof acquired no interest in the lands or estates held in fee title by the trustee.

"Commencing in December, 1927, and continuing throughout practically the entire lives of Trusts 27, 50 and 33, such latter trusts were caused by the defendant, Ferguson, to purchase and sell, among other things, interests in said Canoga Trust. From its inception in 1927 until a time subsequent to March 1, 1929, the dealings of 27, so far as earning profits was concerned, were exclusively in interests in Canoga and, dealings in such interests, contributed either conclusively or substantially to dividends paid by 50 and 33. In the latter part of the year 1930 all of the revolving trusts mentioned and also 1013 apparently came into sore financial straits and in the year 1931 went into receivership.

"In connection with the sale of certificates of beneficial interest in all the revolving trusts and in 1013, representations were made that Trusts 27, 50 and 33 were organized for the purpose and object of dealing in real estate and that the form of organization and methods employed in handling the business of all of said trusts provided a high degree of safety, and much publicity was given to the dividends paid by 27 and 50 which, although paid quarterly, averaged 1 per cent per month for more than a year and a half."

There is very little, if any, important item of fact disputed in the case. The evidence demonstrates that Ferguson, the master in actual charge of the several trusts, ordered the purchase and sale of interests from one to another without regard to their market value and with regard only to the payment of unearned profits. We here set out four letters all signed in the same way, as examples of the manner in which the manipulations took place:

To Pacific National Bank under date of December 28, 1927:

"Gentlemen:

"Please be advised that Harold G. Ferguson Corporation as managing director of your Trust P.T. 27 has authorized you to purchase certain certificates of beneficial interest Trust No. S-6638, Title Insurance and Trust Company of Los Angeles, being a subdivision held by that title company.

"The purchases of such units amount to the sum of $2,300.00, representing six units of 1/800th interest in the above mentioned trust. These units were purchased in the following manner:

2 units, 1/800th interest at $1,000....	$2,000
4 units, 1/800th interest at 75....	300
Total	2,300

"Yours very truly,

"Harold G. Ferguson Corporation,
"by Harold G. Ferguson,
"J. Murray Morgan."

Under the same date a similar letter referring to trust 50 was sent to the trustee. We quote the essential part:

"The purchase of said units amounts to the sum of $20,700.00 representing certain 34 units of 1/800's interest in the above mentioned trust. These units were purchased in the following manner.

"Twenty units of 1/800's interest at $1000.00, $20,000.00; fourteen units 1/800's interest at $50.00, $700.00, total $20,700.00."

The following letter, under date of February 29, 1928, was sent to the trustee:

"Enclosed herewith find six checks payable to yourselves totaling $2250.00 covering three sales by Wimsett System Corporation of beneficial interests in Trust S-6638, Title Insurance and Trust Company of Los Angeles, said money to be credited as follows:

"R. R. Chappell, 1/800th; Original purchase price 1/800th interest, $75.00; Net profit on sale 1/100th interest S-6638, credit profit account P.T. 27, $675.00.

"R. C. A. MacPhail, 1/800th; Original purchase price 1/800th interest, $75.00; Net profit on sale 1/800th interest S-6638, credit profit account P.T. 27, $675.00.

"Howard F. Murchie, 1/800th; Original purchase price 1/800th interest $75.00; Net profit on sale 1/800th interest S-6638, credit profit account P.T. 27, $675.00.

"Six checks enclosed as above enumerated totaling $2250.00."

Under date of June 9, 1928, the following letter was sent to the trustee:

"Under date of May 29th this corporation handed you checks for $750.00 to cover sale of beneficial interests in Title Insurance & Trust Company, Trust S-6638, to Harold G. Ferguson. Assignment form properly signed by Mr. Ferguson has also been handed you.

"You are hereby authorized and directed to make the assignment of beneficial interest in Title Insurance & Trust Co. Trust S-6638 to Harold G. Ferguson in the amount of 1/800th interest."

It would seem significant that the interests entered upon the trust books as purchased at a very low price were sold at great profit while those few purchased at par rating have never been sold.

The trial court's conclusion that this manipulation was done for no other purpose than to rate Ferguson trusts "interests" high in the markets is not only a reasonable one, but it would seem the only possible one. Of course, the false and forced high rate of return for money invested in them no more truly represented their value as investments than the assay of "salted" ore represented the value of a gold mine in other days. Counsel for appellant point out that their client forbade deception by the sales crew, but the evidence discloses that he personally appeared before the sales crew and delivered addresses on the subject of the business and stated to salesmen, and his lieutenants habitually did the same, that the money accumulated in the trusts from the sale of "interests" was and would be invested by the purchase of choice real estate.

[1] Appellant argues in his brief that the manipulated "interests" above referred to were interests in real estate trusts and were in fact real estate. The evidence is undisputed that the units thus purchased were in no sense titles to real estate. They were mere certificates that the holder would share pro rata in any profits resulting from the venture of others. We think these certificates are personal property. Title Ins. & Trust Company v. Duffill, 191 Cal. 629, at pages 642, 647, 649, 218 P. 14; Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 506, 24 P. 930; Craven v. Dominguez Est. Co., 72 Cal. App. 717, 237 P. 821. However, we do not deem the point of decisive importance. Even were it conceded that the purchased units were real estate or were it conceded that appellant, in all good faith so regarded them, the real point remains. The transfers were not honest commercial acts. They were intentionally made to and did create an apparent but false and fraudulent income value upon Ferguson trust investments.

We cannot follow appellant's argument that the fraud cannot be imputed to him for the reason that he did not personally tell his salesmen to boost sales in one trust by representing what another trust had paid. A corps of salesmen were employed for no other purpose than to sell these "interests." Appellant's lieutenants and he himself lectured them at meetings. These lieutenants testified that they were not informed of the sale of properties. They knew of past dividends and of dividends contemplated in the future and they told these things to the sales force, who in turn told them to prospects. The witness Luckey testified as follows: "Always before a dividend period—I mean, before the trust was to pay a dividend a great many inquiries would come in as to when they were going to pay and how much they were going to pay; and those inquiries usually came into my office, both by the salesmen, the sales managers, and a great many of the clients would call in; and I never could give them any information until Mr. Ferguson had told me; and they would vary; sometimes it would be a week before a dividend was going to be paid, and sometimes the day before; and these salesmen, particularly, and a great many clients were inquiring, and I would ask Mr. Ferguson, from time to time, after those inquiries were coming in, if the trusts are going to pay a dividend and how much; that I was getting a great many inquiries in; and when the time would reach back to the time when it was going to be, Mr. Ferguson would say: 'Trust 50,' or 'Trust 27' or 'Trust 33' or whatever the trust might be, 'is going to pay a certain dividend.' The conversation led up to the time at which he announced it; and all he would say at the time was: 'Well, you can tell your salesmen, or your clients, or sales managers, that it is going to pay so much.' " (Italics ours.) Tom Dalton, a sales manager, testified much the same as Luckey on this point.

[2] Presumption of innocence is a precious right; criminal convictions cannot be based upon mere suspicion; but society's arm to curb crime is weak indeed if logical inference which would seem next to demonstration itself in any other civilized endeavor cannot be indulged in the detection of crime. The evidence is conclusive that the purchases alleged in all of the counts upon which conviction was had, with the exception of count 3, resulted from the fact that certain Ferguson trusts had been fraudulently manipulated to show very large returns. In truth and in fact they had not paid except fraudulently and the showing made had no relation to the future possibilities of any of the Ferguson trusts. Every such sale was fraudulent. Every conviction based thereon must be sustained unless certain points raised by appellant are to be resolved in his favor. We proceed to consider them.

[3, 4] As a result of the booming of returns on 27, 50, and 33 and of the payment of heavy returns being communicated to them by salesmen, complaining witnesses in counts charging grand theft purchased interest in other Ferguson trusts. Appellant contends that these trusts were each independent of the other and that the testimony as to profits and how they were arrived at are collateral matters of no materiality in the counts of the indictment. We have already made it clear that we think the evidence supports our conclusion that Ferguson trusts were intentionally made attractive by the fraudulent method of declaring large returns on some of the trusts in order to induce the sale of interests in others. Appellant cannot be sustained on this point. People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 36 P. 952, and People v. Weir, 120 Cal. 279, 52 P. 656.

Appellant makes the point that the conviction of grand theft by false pretenses cannot be sustained because the purchases of interests in trusts other than 27, 33, and 50 were made through reliance upon promises of future profit. This, we think, is conclusively answered by the preceding paragraph herein. People v. Wasservogle, 77 Cal. 173, 19 P. 270.

[5] Appellant argues that the case of false pretenses is not made out for the reason that the buying and selling of the beneficial interests by, into and out of the several trusts was not disclosed to the complaining witnesses and amounts to nondisclosure if anything, and therefore does not support the offense of false pretenses. The false pretense was that Ferguson trusts purchasing real estate had made great profits and others would do the same. The whole inducing argument was this false pretense. In our opinion the evidence is sufficient to support conviction of grand theft by false pretenses.

[6] Appellant contends there is lack of corroboration, but the facts do not support him. The evidence establishes that the purchases were made because of the belief of great profits in Ferguson trusts. These profits were induced by fraud, amounting to false pretenses, or, if you will, by means of trick and device. All of this is corroborated by the evidence establishing the whole structure of the scheme; the orders of Ferguson to transfer the interests; the publicity of the large returns on certain trusts; Luckey's testimony of the representations as to profit by the salesmen and Ferguson's own statements to his sales managers and crew. People v. Harrington, 92 Cal. App. 245, 267 P. 942, and cases there cited; People v. Hennessey, 201 Cal. 568, 258 P. 49.

[7] Appellant argues in his brief that even if misrepresentations were made, he did not authorize them. Whether appellant specifically authorized the representations or not is not the whole question. In People v. Epstein, 118 Cal. App. 7, 10, 4 P.(2d) 555, 556, it is said: "The general rule is that where the crime charged involves guilty knowledge or criminal intent, it is essential to the criminal liability of an officer of the corporation that he actually and personally do the acts which constitute the offense, or that they be done by his direction or permission." State v. Thomas, 123 Wash. 299, 33 A. L. R. 781, 212 P. 253, 254, citing cases." The evidence permits of no other conclusion than that appellant knew of the misrepresentations generally and intended that they should be made for the purpose of inducing sales. But even if the evidence does not directly connect appellant therewith the circumstances are such as to make such inference as dependable as the direct testimony could itself do.

[8] The point is made that conviction under count 12 cannot be sustained because the representations were not made to induce the complaining witness to buy but to teach him to sell. He was one of the crew of salesmen. The representations were as a seine spread to catch all who heard and believed. That one so closely associated should be deceived shows how convincing the representations were. The evidence is sufficient to show that the purchaser of interests as alleged in each count made the purchase upon representations to him by a salesman or sales manager of Ferguson interests of the large profits made on 27, 50, and 33, and that the same or similar results would follow in the other trusts formed and handled under Ferguson management for the same kind of business.

We think the evidence amply supports the convictions upon either the theory of false pretenses or larceny by trick and device. People v. Hennessey, supra.

[9] As to count 3, the testimony regarding the inducing representation as to payment of a dividend refers to trust 50, and the investment of $1,000 in that trust. Later the witness said he invested in trust 33 instead of 50, but made no correction as to the inducing representation. It would seem clear that the testimony does not support the judgment of conviction.

The Counts of the Indictment under the Corporate Securities Act.

[10-13] As to counts 34 to 43, inclusive, charging violation of the corporate securities act, it is the position of appellant that the sale of interests in trust 1013 (Malibu) did not legally require the consent of the corporation commissioner and that even if it did technically, that appellant could not be guilty because he was advised by the commissioner that it was not legally necessary to secure permits.

The land was to be acquired by the investment of money through the medium of proportional "interests." The money received from the sale of interests was to be paid to a trust company and be used by it in conjunction with the purchase of the land, its improvement, and for certain expenses. The title to the real estate was not in the interest holders and, indeed, those investing in interests acquired little or no other right than the right of participation in profits from the sale of lots in the real estate purchased. We think the "interests" were securities under the reasoning in People v. Oliver, 102 Cal. App. 29, 282 P. 813, 817, and authorities cited therein; also under Agnew v. Daugherty, 189 Cal. 446, 209 P. 34, and People v. Leach, 106 Cal. App. 442, 290 P. 131. The "interest" in the instant case responds in every way to the definition of a "security" which we quote from the Oliver Case: "If the instrument of sale creates a present right to a present or a future participation in either the income, profits, or assets of a business carried on for profit, it is a 'security,' as defined in the Corporate Securities Act."

Upon the point that appellant was not guilty of violating the Corporate Securities Act because he had been advised in other similar cases by corporation commission deputies and by the corporation commissioner directly in this instance that no permit was necessary, counsel for appellant made an offer of proof as follows: "Mr. Doherty: We offer to prove by this witness that, beginning with the year about 1922, while he was a trust officer of the California Trust Company and thereafter in and about his business in handling and dealing in real estate and trusts, that he, as such trust officer, and as an officer of the Harold G. Ferguson Corporation, and as an individual, had occasion to use and did use trusts, declarations of trust similar in provisions and legal effect to the terms of 1013; and that during that period he, at various times, talked with officials of the corporation department of the state of California for the purpose of determining from them whether or not it was a trust which could be classified as a security or as real estate; and that he was advised by the deputy corporation commissioners and by the assistant commissioner that their construction of the act was that it was not a security, and that he need not get from the department a permit or license to sell the stock or interests, or beneficial certificates; and that as late as 1929, the then corporation commissioner, Mr. Atherton, had stated that when the particular trust 1013 was executed, he had stated that his department had investigated that trust, had personally examined it, and that it was his opinion that under the act as he construed it a permit was not necessary. That is our offer of proof."

The district attorney submitted his objection that the proposed proof was immaterial and irrelevant and the objection was sustained. We think this was error. It is no doubt true that advice of counsel will not excuse the offense. It is true that "ignorance of the law excuses no man," although we are not prepared to say that this old maxim stands undefiled by exception. It is true generally that where the act is knowingly and willfully done the act imports the intent. People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 P. 45, which case we had recent occasion to consider; see People v. A. L. Ferguson (Cal. App.) 18 P. (2d) 741.

However, it occurs to us that a different situation is here presented. The regulation which has not been complied with is malum prohibitum and not malum in se. It covers one of the most complicated phases of modern commercial life. The statute can be read strictly or liberally, according to the type of mind applied to it. It is under the administration of the commissioner and his decisions in most cases are final. If the appellant early in his real estate career found himself in honest doubt, notwithstanding his high education and legal accomplishments, went to the fountain head itself for information and was there advised that such organizations were not under the department's jurisdiction, and if after he had this identical organization ready to launch, he went to the corporation commissioner himself and was advised in the same manner, we cannot believe the law so inexorable as to require the brand of felon upon him for following the advice obtained. The mere statement of the facts demonstrate that such strict construction would be unconscionable and more calculated to engulf the innocent law-abiding business man than to punish the guilty or to protect the security buyer. By the very attitude of the corporation commissioner's office, assuming, of course, that the proof would have been as strong as the offer of proof, appellant was forced to sell the securities in question without a permit or not to sell them at all. Such a state of affairs is not imaginable, for, as we have seen, the sale of such securities is not malum in se.

The evidence outlined in the offer was neither immaterial nor irrelevant and should have been received. In connection with this point the fact that appellant had much business with the corporation commissioner and secured permits to sell securities in the several other trusts would seem to open the way for an explanation of why none was obtained for this particular one. After all, neither the law nor its application can be reduced to thumb rule and the application of rules should ordinarily cease where the reason back of them fails. The illegal manner in which appellant sold the securities in some of the trusts herein referred to should not be confused with the wholly legal organization of such trusts. His guilt in the one incident must not deter us from declaring his complete innocence in the other.

The case of changing a public record, as in the O'Brien Case or of the possession of metal knuckles as in the A. L. Ferguson Case, were instances of knowingly doing that which the law prohibits. In such instances the act imputes the intent. In the instant circumstance the act does not impute intent. The principle which we are here considering is variously expressed under different circumstances in the following cases: State v. Freeland, 318 Mo. 560, 300 S. W. 675; U. S. v. Jackson, 280 U. S. 183, 50 S. Ct. 143, 74 L. Ed. 361; State v. Cutter, 36 N. J. Law, 125; State v. Gardner, 5 Nev. 377; and State v.

It is not, we think, out of place to commend the manner in which this appeal has been handled. The points have been presented for appellant in a clear and orderly manner and have been met by the state in the same way. The case is a complicated one, with testimony extending through 4,799 typewritten pages and the able presentation here commended has been of great assistance to us.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed as to counts 3 and 34 to 40, inclusive, and 42 and 43, and affirmed as to all of the other counts upon which conviction was obtained.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

WESTERN OIL & REFINING CO. v. VEN-AGO OIL CORPORATION et al.
L. A. 12404.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 30, 1933.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1933.

1. Mines and minerals ⇨74.

Where lessee of oil and gas lease by unit instruments conveyed stated percentages of gross oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances "produced, saved and sold under lease," lessee's assignee with notice held bound to recognize such instruments as outstanding interests in oil produced by assignee under lease.

2. Mines and minerals ⇨74.

Assignee of oil and gas lease held charged under evidence with full notice of issuance of royalty interests for percentages of oil and gas by lessee.

Evidence disclosed that lessee, his son, and a third person were incorporators and first directors and officers of the assignee corporation; that party acted as attorney for lessee and prepared an application to the commissioner of corporations, reciting the prior issuance of royalty interests sold by lessee; that, when lessee and his associates resigned, the attorney became a director, officer, and general manager of the assignee corporation.

3. Assignments ⇨90.

Transfer of right, title, and interest vests in transferee only what transferor could claim, and is subject to all defects and equities which could be asserted against transferor.

4. Mines and minerals ⇨73.

Lessee under oil and gas lease acquires no title to oil and gas in place as part of realty, but only right to enter upon land, drill well, and reduce oil and gas to possession.

5. Mines and minerals ⇨73.

Oil and gas under oil and gas lease are "personal property" only when reduced to possession, and only then does absolute title vest in lessee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Personal Property," see Words & Phrases.]

6. Mines and minerals ⇨73.

Lessee who acquires right by contract to enter upon land and prospect for oil and gas has potential possession of all oil and gas which may be produced during continuance of lease, notwithstanding lease may be forfeited if well is not drilled or oil discovered within designated time.

7. Mines and minerals ⇨74.

Lessee of oil and gas lease who assigned percentages of oil and gas to be produced under his lease could not defeat assignment by transferring to another his right of entry to prospect for oil.

8. Mines and minerals ⇨74.

Where lessee conveyed percentage royalties, and then assigned his lease to another, title to undivided interest in oil produced held to vest in holders of royalties as though oil were produced by original lessee.

9. Mines and minerals ⇨54½.

Mortgagee who took percentage royalty of gas and oil to be produced as security for cash and pipes used in drilling well had title in undivided interest of oil and gas produced by lessee's assignee; doctrine of potential possession being applicable to mortgages as well as to sales (Civ. Code, §§ 2955, 2973).

10. Courts ⇨97(1).

Federal court's holding regarding rights under oil and gas lease held not binding upon California courts.

11. Licenses ⇨39.

Holders of percentage royalties held not precluded from claiming interest in oil and gas produced by lessee's assignee with notice, though issuer of royalties did not secure permit as required by statute (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3814).

12. Licenses ⇨39.

Buyer of securities illegally issued is not in pari delicto, unless there is conspiracy or intent to defraud and evade act or terms of permit actually issued or other reasons making it inequitable to grant relief (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3814).

13. Licenses ⇨39.

Buyers of securities issued in violation of Corporate Securities Act will be denied relief only where they are equally culpable with parties against whom relief is sought (Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3814).

14. Mines and minerals ⇨79(7).

Accounting of proceeds of oil sold by lessee's assignee in favor of holders of percentage royalties should be taken by judge who tried action.

SEAWELL, Justice.

Plaintiff Western Oil & Refining Company brought this action in interpleader to determine conflicting claims to money due and owing from it for crude oil purchased from defendant and respondent Venago Oil Corporation. Defendant Standard Pipe & Supply Company and the defendants referred to herein as Campbell and associates have filed separate appeals from the judgment, which decreed that Venago Oil Corporation was entitled to the entire sum of $44,563.42 then due, and that appellants had no interest therein, or in any amounts which might thereafter become due from plaintiff in interpleader for future deliveries of crude oil under its existing contract with Venago Oil Corporation. Both appeals involve the same issues and may be disposed of in a single opinion.

The facts necessary to a decision of the appeals herein are in the main undisputed. In November, 1928, one F. M. Miller, by assignment, became the owner of an oil and gas lease covering property in the Signal Hill district, county of Los Angeles. In the months of December, 1928, and January and February, 1929, he sold for cash and materials percentage units, commonly designated royalty interests, in the oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances to be "produced, saved and sold" under his lease. The appellants referred to herein as Campbell and associates are either purchasers of said units, or assignees of purchasers thereof. The funds derived from the sale of units were used by Miller in drilling a well on the property. Appellant Standard Pipe & Supply Company furnished pipe used by Miller in developing said well, under a contract dated February 1, 1929, by which said company leased pipe to Miller for a specific term in consideration of a cash rental and in further consideration of the assignment to the supply company of 2 per cent. of all oil, gas, and other substances to be produced under Miller's lease. As security for payment of the cash rental, Miller assigned to the company 10 per cent. of the gas, oil, and other substances to be produced. He had not procured a permit from the commissioner of corporations for the issue of royalty interests.

By March, 1929, the well had been drilled to a depth of over 4,500 feet, but had not produced oil, and Miller was having difficulty in financing further drilling operations. On March 13, 1929, Miller, his son, and a third person organized the Venago Oil Corporation under the laws of this state, and each subscribed to one qualifying share of stock. On March 22, 1929, Miller transferred the oil lease to a third party, who was acting as a dummy in the transaction, and it was subsequently transferred to the Venago Oil Corporation. Sixteen days after formation of the corporation Miller and the other two incorporators resigned as officers and directors, and assigned their qualifying shares to three other persons, who have since continued to be officers and directors. No other shares of corporate stock have ever been issued.

The conclusion is inescapable that said three persons represent and are acting on behalf of the Du Cal Company, Inc., to which Miller was indebted for money loaned, and that it had been agreed at least as early as March 22, if not prior to organization of the Venago Oil Corporation, that control should pass from Miller to the Du Cal Company. Miller, however, continued in charge as superintendent of the well. The Venago Corporation paid bills previously incurred by Miller. On August 15, 1929, the well was brought into production at 7,289 feet, and deliveries of crude oil were made to Western Oil & Refining Company under a contract of August 12, 1929, for purchase of the entire crude oil production from Venago Oil Corporation for a period of five years. The trial court by the judgment appealed from has decreed that appellants, as holders of royalty interests issued by Miller, have no interest in the proceeds of oil produced by Venago Oil Corporation after Miller had assigned his lease to said corporation.

[1] Postponing our consideration of the effect of Miller's failure to procure a permit for issuance of royalty interests, and assuming that the units as issued by him were valid, we are of the view that respondent Venago Oil Corporation was bound to recognize them as outstanding interests in the oil produced by it. We cannot accede to the trial court's view that the instruments were merely personal undertakings of Miller to pay appellants percentages of the proceeds of oil produced by him individually. By the terms of the unit instruments Miller "assigns, transfers and conveys" stated percentages of all gross oil, gas and other hydrocarbon substances "produced, saved and sold under the terms of a certain lease," describing the lease held by him. The oil was produced under said lease, notwithstanding Miller assigned it to the Venago Oil Corporation.

[2, 3] The Venago Oil Corporation is charged with full notice of the issuance of said royalty interests. Miller, his son, and a third person were the incorporators and first directors and officers of the corporation. Mark F. Jones acted as attorney for Miller and prepared an application to the commissioner of corporations, reciting the prior issuance of royalty interests sold by Miller. Jones was vice president of the Du Cal Company, Inc. As Miller and his associates resigned, Jones became a director, officer, and general manager of the Venago Oil Corporation, and has continued in office at all times since. Furthermore, the instruments through which Venago Oil Corporation succeeded to the oil lease and the oil to be produced were all transfers of the assignor's right, title, and interest. A transfer of right, title, and interest vests in the purchaser only what the transferor could claim, and is subject to all defects and equities which could have been asserted against the transferor. O'Sullivan v. Griffith, 153 Cal. 502, 505, 95 P. 873, 96 P. 323; Lombardi v. Sinanides, 71 Cal. App. 276, 277, 235 P. 455.

[4, 5] It is settled law that the lessee under an oil and gas lease acquires no title to the oil and gas in place as part of the realty, but only a right to enter upon the land, drill wells, and reduce the oil and gas to possession. When reduced to possession, the oil and gas are personal property, and only then can absolute title vest in the lessee. Black v. Solano Co., 114 Cal. App. 170, 299 P. 843; Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County, 155 Cal. 140, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211; Brookshire Oil Co. v. Casmalia, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 211, 103 P. 927; Taylor v. Hamilton, 194 Cal. 768, 230 P. 656; Richfield Oil Co. v. Hercules Gasoline Co., 112 Cal. App. 431, 297 P. 73. Appellants invoke the doctrine of potential possession of personal property as applied to sales and mortgages of future crops and unborn young of animals, which they contend is by analogy applicable to sales and mortgages of oil and gas to be produced under an existing lease. Under this doctrine the seller or mortgagor who holds an interest in land is deemed to have potential possession of unplanted and future crops to be grown thereon, and the owner of animals to have potential possession of unborn young, which it is held may be the subject of a present sale or mortgage as distinguished from an executory contract to sell or mortgage. Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718; Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272, 53 P. 801; Hall v. Glass, 123 Cal. 500, 56 P. 336, 69 Am. St. Rep. 77; Sun-Maid Raisin Growers v. Jones, 96 Cal. App. 650, 274 P. 557; Merriman v. Martin, 113 Cal. App. 167, 298 P. 95. In the so-called present sale or mortgage of future goods such as crops, title to, or a lien on, the crop as personal property vests in the purchaser or mortgagee eo instante upon the crop being harvested and severed from the realty. Such title is paramount to the rights of those who claim an interest therein acquired between the date of the sale and the harvest, or thereafter.

[6-8] The doctrine of potential possession has been recognized by the courts of this state as applicable to sales of oil and gas to be produced under an existing lease. Black v. Solano Co., 114 Cal. App. 170, 299 P. 843; Jones v. Pier, 124 Cal. App. 444, 12 P. (2d) 646; Merrill v. California Petroleum Corporation, 105 Cal. App. 737, 288 P. 721. The operating lessee who has acquired the right by contract to enter upon land and prospect for oil and gas has potential possession of all oil and gas which may be produced during the continuance of the lease, and this is so notwithstanding the oil lease may provide for forfeiture in the event the lessee shall fail to drill a well within a designated time, or fail to discover oil. Leases of farm lands commonly provide for forfeiture for nonpayment of rent or other breaches of the lease, yet such provisions have never been thought to render the doctrine of potential possession inapplicable to crops grown while the lease is in full force and effect, and has not been forfeited or terminated. It follows that when, as in the instant case, the operating lessee has assigned percentages of the oil, gas, and other substances to be produced, saved, and sold under his lease, he cannot defeat the assignment by voluntary transfer to another of his right of entry to prospect for and recover oil. Title to an undivided interest in the oil produced will vest in the holders of percentage interests in like manner as if the oil had been produced by the original lessee.

[9] The doctrine of potential possession is applied to mortgages as well as to sales. Arques v. Wasson, supra; Lemon v. Wolff, supra; Hall v. Glass, supra. Appellant Standard Pipe & Supply Company holds an assignment of 10 per cent. of the gas and oil to be produced as security for cash rental for pipe supplied to Miller. Although section 2955, Civil Code, does not expressly authorize a mortgage on oil to be produced, it is provided in section 2973, Civil Code, that a mortgage of personal property other than that mentioned in section 2955, Civil Code, is valid between the parties and those who take with notice.

Royalty interests are very generally created by instruments similar in form to those we are here considering. Although persons purchasing royalty interests in oil may be making a highly speculative investment, it is certainly not within their contemplation that they are paying over their funds in return for a mere personal and conditional covenant of the lessee, which he may render absolutely worthless as to purchasers of royalty interests by a voluntary assignment of his lease. Respondent Venago Oil Corporation contends that Miller was faced with the necessity of abandoning the well for want of further funds, and that the well was deepened and brought into production with funds furnished after control had passed from Miller. Miller had drilled the well to a depth of over 4,500 feet, and the funds of appellants had been used in this development. The well was brought into production at 7,289 feet. The funds of appellants, or of their assignors where the units have been assigned, and the pipe supplied by appellant Standard Pipe & Supply Company contributed to the completed development of the well. The persons who acquired control of the Venago Oil Corporation had notice of the royalty interests issued by Miller. That they were not misled as to the rights of the Miller unit holders is indicated by the fact that Mark F. Jones, an attorney and one of the three persons who succeeded Miller in control of the corporation, had prepared an application to the commissioner of corporations on March 22, 1929, for leave to issue units of the corporation to the persons to whom Miller had issued units. This application was withdrawn, as Jones and his associates assumed control on March 29.

Respondent Venago Oil Corporation relies on the recent decision of the federal Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of In re Lathrap, 61 F.(2d) 37, which arose in California. That case involved the rights of creditors represented by the trustee in bankruptcy of the operating lessee of an oil well. The court was of the view that persons purchasing royalty interest are coadventurers and coinvestors in a business enterprise, in a similar position to the purchasers of stock in a corporate enterprise, whose chance of gain involves a corresponding risk of loss, and that accordingly their rights in the proceeds of oil produced should be subordinated to the rights of creditors of the enterprise represented by the trustee in bankruptcy of the operating lessee. Considering the nature of royalty interests, it may well be that this court would also reach the conclusion that by necessary implication it is an incident of the contract and status of unit holders that in a proper case their rights must be subordinated to those of general creditors. This question we do not decide in the case herein. The Venago Oil Corporation does not appear as a creditor of an operating lessee claiming the right to reach the proceeds of oil produced by him to an extent necessary to satisfy a debt. Rather, it claims the entire output of the well as assignee of the operating lessee, on the theory that the royalty interests issued by Miller created no rights in oil not produced by him personally.

[10] The decisions of the courts of this state cited by the federal court in the Lathrap Case sustain that court's conclusion that neither the owner of oil lands nor the lessee thereof has an absolute title to oil and gas in place as part of the realty, but only a right to prospect for oil and reduce it to possession as personal property. People v. Associated Oil Co., 211 Cal. 93, 294 P. 717; Bandini Petroleum Co. v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. App. 123, 293 P. 899. But we do not find that the recent decisions of the courts of this state repudiate the doctrine of potential possession as applied to sales of royalty interests in oil and gas to be produced. The holding of the federal court, although entitled to respect and careful consideration, is not binding or conclusive on the courts of this state. Bank of Italy Nat. Trust & Sav. Ass'n v. Bentley (Cal. Sup.) 20 P.(2d) 940.

In Black v. Solano Co., 114 Cal. App. 170, 299 P. 843, 845, the appellate court, in considering the nature of the interest of purchasers of percentage units of oil "produced, saved and sold," said: "The oil was, however, potential personal property and so the subject of a sale (as distinguished from an executory contract to sell). 'In such case, the sale is absolute and perfect when made, vesting the property in the purchaser the moment it comes into existence.' [Citing cases.]

"In view of these principles, it is necessary to conclude that there was nothing more than a present sale of potential personal property accomplished by the transfer on which plaintiff relies."

In the recent decision in Jones v. Pier, 124 Cal. App. 444, 12 P.(2d) 646, 648, is the following statement:

"By the terms of his assignment of April 3, 1923, the plaintiff acquired an undivided 1 per cent. interest * * * in all oil, gas, or other hydrocarbon substances produced from the land therein described, for the term of twenty years from the date of the original lease regardless of who produced the same. The lease created a vested right in property even though it was not accompanied by actual physical possession of the subterranean deposit of gas or oil. * * *

"The plaintiff is therefore entitled to have quieted in him his undivided 1 per cent. of all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances which may be developed or produced from the property during the term prescribed in the original lease or until that instrument is lawfully terminated." (Italics supplied.)

In Merrill v. California Petroleum Corporation, 105 Cal. App. 737, 288 P. 721, 723, is the following statement:

"While the oil in its natural deposit was a part of the land, it was in actual existence as part of the land, and was potentially personal property under the terms of the lease, and actually became personal property to the extent of the amount thereof involved in this action when the lessee exercised his right to extract it. * * *

"By the sale to the plaintiff [purchaser of royalty interest], he and Lake [operating lessee] became tenants in common in the oil produced."

The decision in Richfield Oil Co. v. Hercules Gasoline Co., 112 Cal. App. 431, 297 P. 73, is not in conflict with our conclusion herein. In that case the plaintiff was not an investor who had purchased a percentage royalty of gas and oil to be produced, saved, and sold, but an oil company engaged in the business of refining and distributing oil, which had contracted for actual delivery of the crude oil production of the operating lessee under an executory contract of sale.

There remains to be considered the effect of Miller's failure to procure a permit from the commissioner of corporations for sale of royalty interests. Appellants contend that those provisions of the Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3814) which require a permit for the sale of rights to share in undeveloped oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances, are unconstitutional, in so far as they purport to require an individual to procure a permit for the sale of fractional interests in oil and gas to be produced from an oil lease owned by him, citing People v. Pace, 73 Cal. App. 548, 238 P. 1089.

Appellants further contend that, if the pertinent provisions of the act are constitutional as applied to sales by an individual under such circumstances, nevertheless the purchasers of such securities are not in pari delicto with the individual issuing them, by virtue of which the issuer of the securities cannot raise the defense that they were issued without a permit. In support of this contention, appellants rely on our recent decision in Eberhard v. Pacific Southwest L. & M. Corp., 215 Cal. 226, 9 P.(2d) 302, 303.

The question as to the constitutionality of the provisions of the act which require an individual to obtain a permit for the issuance and sale of instruments evidencing the right to participate in oil and gas, or the proceeds thereof, to be produced under a lease owned by him, is pending before this court in the case of People v. Craven, Crim. No. 3660. Said case is before us upon order of transfer after decision of the Appellate Court, Second District, Division One, 21 P.(2d) 459, sustaining the right to sell without procuring a permit. For the purpose of the appeals herein we need not determine this issue, since under our decision in the Eberhard Case, supra, even if a permit should have been obtained, this defense is not available to Miller and his assignee with notice, Venago Oil Corporation.

In the Eberhard Case an action was brought to foreclose a mortgage securing a note held by plaintiff, which was one of a series of notes secured by mortgage and issued by the mortgagor. In defense of the foreclosure action the corporation mortgagor alleged that the notes and mortgages composing the series were all securities within the language of the Corporate Securities Act, and having been issued and sold without the permit of the corporation commissioner were void, wherefore defendant prayed judgment against plaintiffs, declaring that plaintiffs take nothing, and that said note and mortgage be declared null and void. In sustaining the judgment of the trial court ordering foreclosure of the mortgage, this court said:

"If, however, for the purposes of this opinion, the necessity for a permit be conceded, there is nothing whatsoever to show that plaintiffs are anything more than the innocent victims of appellant, which now seeks to profit by its own deliberate wrong.

"The inhibitions of the Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, Supp. 1927, 1929, p. 3237, Act 3814) against sales of securities to the public without permits are meant to protect the public from imposition and deception—not primarily to benefit the seller. The seller and the purchaser are therefore in no sense in pari delicto where this provision is violated. The fact that the transaction may be void at the behest of the purchaser, is not to allow a premium for real wrong done by the seller. The fundamental maxim that 'no one can take advantage of his own wrong' (section 3517, Civ. Code), and other kindred principles, immediately recur to the mind. The above is but a recast of the doctrine abundantly supported by authority and applied in cases involving this very act done under similar circumstances. [Citing cases.]"

The decision in the Eberhard Case was followed in Braunstein v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 216 Cal. 780, 17 P.(2d) 104, where in the securities were not sold without a permit, but in violation of the terms of the permit.

Respondent Venago Oil Corporation contends that the Eberhard Case is distinguishable from the instant case. It has uniformly been held that the purchaser, not being in pari delicto with the seller, may recover the consideration paid for the securities, and where judgment is allowed on a promissory note, this is the extent of the recovery, respondent states. The cases cannot be so distinguished. In the Eberhard Case the action was brought to foreclose the mortgage securing the note, and not solely to obtain a money judgment for the amount advanced. The action was based, and the judgment awarded, on the terms of the instruments, which it was contended had been issued in violation of the act, rather than on a rescission and disaffirmance of said instruments.

[11] The Corporate Securities Act was designed to protect purchasers from worthless securities. In the case herein the units proved to be valuable, notwithstanding they were issued without a permit. If the issuer of securities, or the assignee of his lease with notice, were permitted to defeat the sale of fractional interests of oil and gas to be produced, the anomalous situation would exist that the issuer of fractional interests in oil and gas to be produced who violated the law by failing to procure a permit would be in a better position than the individual who complied with the law. The owner who sold units without a permit would be enabled to retain the entire production of the well and reap a large profit, and this, although the act was enacted for the benefit of purchasers.

Respondent Venago Oil Corporation contends that the rule of the Eberhard Case does not protect appellant Standard Pipe & Supply Co., for the reason that it appears to be in pari delicto with Miller, who issued the securities. This contention cannot be sustained in the light of recent decisions. The terms of the contract for rental of the pipe to Miller were agreed on and the pipe delivered to him and immediately put to use the latter part of January, or the early part of February, 1929. Said contract was reduced to written form by said appellant about February 1. Two instruments dated February 1 evidencing the 2 per cent. assignment and the 10 per cent. assignment as security were delivered to Miller about that date. They bear Miller's acknowledgment dated March 7, and he claims that he did not sign them until that date, and between February 1 and March 7 informed appellant several times that he was unwilling to sign because he had not obtained a permit. The appellant was of the view that no permit was required for the transaction. Miller admits that appellant was not informed of the absence of a permit until after the pipe had been delivered.

[12, 13] Recent decisions indicate that the purchaser will not be held to be in pari delicto unless there is a conspiracy or intent to fraud and evade the act, or the terms of a permit actually issued, in which the purchaser participates, or other reasons making it inequitable to grant relief. In Walker v. Harbor R. & Dev. Corp., 214 Cal. 46, 3 P.(2d) 557, the purchaser was held entitled to recover, although she was an incorporator and director of the corporation issuing stock and had attended directors' meetings. In Olds v. Simmons, 123 Cal. App. 275, 11 P.(2d) 36, the appellate court, relying on our decision in the Walker Case, granted relief, although plaintiff's assignor to whom the stock was issued was employed to promote formation of the corporation and assist in selling stock. In our recent decision in Randall v. California Land Buyers' Syndicate, 20 P.(2d) 331, 332, we stated the rule as follows: "Although the parties seeking affirmative relief, i. e., the buyers of such stocks, may be in some degree guilty with the parties against whom the relief is sought, they will be denied relief only where the record shows that they are equally culpable (Campbell v. Julian Merger Mines, 111 Cal. App. 649, 295 P. 1040); and, considering the object and purpose of the Corporate Securities Act, mere knowledge of the terms of the permit, or of the fact that no permit has been issued, may not alone be sufficient to raise the guilt of the purchaser or subscriber to that degree"—citing In re Builders' Finance Ass'n (D. C.) 26 F.(2d) 123; Walker v. Harbor R. & Dev. Corp., supra; Olds v. Simmons, supra.

The federal court in Cecil B. De Mille Productions, Inc., v. Woolery (C. C. A.) 61 F.(2d) 45, which arose in California, reached a conclusion contrary to that we here state as to the rights of purchasers of royalty interests where the permit of the commissioner of corporations has not been obtained. The federal court relied on decisions of the courts of this state decided prior to our final decision in Eberhard v. Pacific Southwest L. & M. Corp., supra. In so far as said decisions are in conflict with the Eberhard Case they have been overruled.

[14] The appellants prayed for an accounting to determine the amounts which they were respectively entitled to receive of the proceeds from the sale of oil by Venago Oil Corporation to Western Oil & Refining Company, plaintiff in interpleader. In view of the trial court's conclusion that appellants had no interest in the sums due or to become due from Western Oil & Refining Company, no computations were made by said court as to the amounts to which said appellants would severally be entitled had the validity of their interests been upheld. As a result of our conclusion upholding said units as a matter of law, an accounting is necessary. Certain of the royalty interests were subject to deduction to share in the operating costs of the well, and there are numerous other computations required to be made before the exact amount to which the appellants are severally entitled can be determined. Therefore, the judgment is reversed as to the appealing defendants, with directions to the court below to proceed to take an accounting, to be based upon the evidence taken upon the trial herein, and to take additional evidence, if upon the accounting it appears that further evidence is needed to accurately calculate the share of each appellant. Said accounting should be taken by the judge who tried the action herein. Hughes v. DeMund, 96 Cal. App. 365, 274 P. 405; DeMund v. Superior Court, 213 Cal. 502, 2 P.(2d) 985.

Husband is liable for necessities furnished wife living apart under separation agreement, where husband fails to comply with covenant therein to make payments to wife for her support (Civ. Code, § 175, as amended).

2. Statutes Ⓒ212.

It is presumed that amendment to statute is made with cognizance of previous adjudication on subject-matter.

Appeal from Municipal Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Bay District Claim Service, Limited, against Henry M. Jones and wife. From an adverse judgment, named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Manson & Allan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leon A. Blum, of San Francisco, for respondent.

JOHNSON, Presiding Judge.

The plaintiff instituted the action as the assignee of Raphael Weill & Co., a corporation operating the department store known as the White House in San Francisco. The defendants, Henry M. Jones and Anna (otherwise known as Zona C.) Jones, are husband and wife, who have been living apart under a separation agreement dated June 16, 1915. In the agreement Mr. Jones agreed to pay his wife for her maintenance and support the sum of $200 a month.

In September, 1931, Mrs. Jones bought a fur coat at the White House for $372.50 on which she paid $104, leaving unpaid at the time of suit $268.50. At about the same time certain other articles of clothing were purchased on credit for which there was owing $37.50. The goods purchased were all charged to Mrs. Jones personally.

In the year 1931, and particularly at the time of the purchases, Mr. Jones was not fully complying with the agreement to pay his wife $200 a month; and in December, 1931, Mrs. Jones instituted an action against her husband to recover the amount of $2,975 in arrears, together with accrued interest, and obtained a judgment by default for $3,460.03. On March 29, 1932, after that judgment was entered, Mr. and Mrs. Jones made a new or supplemental agreement modifying their original agreement, and among other things providing for satisfaction of said judgment. This later agreement was, however, almost immediately repudiated by Mrs. Jones, and nothing was received by her under it. Her judgment also remained unpaid.

In the present action the trial court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Henry M. Jones for $306, the full amount of the claim, and said defendant has appealed from that judgment.

[1] The question presented is whether a husband is liable for necessities furnished to his wife, when the two are living apart under a separation agreement, wherein the husband covenants to make stipulated payments to the wife for her support, but fails of compliance with his stipulation.

Section 175 of the Civil Code provides: "Nor is he liable for her support when she is living separate from him, by agreement, unless such support is stipulated in the agreement."

The appellant contends that when such an agreement exists between husband and wife, then, irrespective of whether the stipulated payments are made or not, a person supplying necessities to the wife on credit may not recover therefor from the husband, but the remedy is an action by the wife herself to enforce the delinquent payments under the separation agreement.

The question is a new one in this state, but in our research we have found a few precedents in other jurisdictions. The earliest reported case dealing with a similar situation is Nurse v. Craig, 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 148, decided in 1806. In that case various decisions are cited wherein it had been held that if the separate maintenance was regularly paid the husband was exempt from liability for the wife's debts. Such would certainly be the effect of the language of section 175 of our Civil Code; but if the husband defaults in his payments, then the ground for the exemption fails. In the case cited, Justice Heath reasons as follows (pp. 156-158): "As to the principle, it is the duty of the husband to provide necessities for the wife. The question is, whether he discharges that duty merely by entering into a covenant with a trustee for payment of an allowance? If he refuse to perform the covenant, the wife may be starved before redress can be obtained. The common law does not relieve any man from an obligation on the mere ground of an agreement to do something else in its place, unless that agreement be performed. Accord without satisfaction is no plea. * * * The agreement could have no operation in destroying the husband's liability by transferring the credit to the wife, unless accompanied by payment; she cannot be in a worse condition than if she cohabited with her husband. * * * But if such a covenant as this, without payment, be sufficient to exempt the husband from his liability, it would have the same effect as a general prohibition. At common law the wife may have resource to any friend for necessities if the husband refuse her, and the husband is bound to pay for them; for when the law imposes a duty, it raises a promise on the part of the person upon whom it is imposed to discharge it. * * * To suppose that a woman who is parted from her husband under an agreement for a separate maintenance is not by law entitled to charge her husband with payment of her necessities, when he withholds the stipulated allowance, shocks my humanity and revolts my reason."

On the authority of Nurse v. Craig, supra, it was held in 1829 in Hunt v. De Blaquiere, 5 Bing. 550, that where husband and wife were separated by a divorce a mensa et thoro for the husband's fault, with an order for alimony in favor of the wife, the husband was liable for necessities furnished to the wife in case the alimony were not paid. As was there said, "It is not the decree or the deed that discharges the husband, but the observance of it."

And in Johnston v. Sumner, 3 H. & N. 261, 268, Pollock, Chief Baron, in 1858, said that where the husband did not pay the allowance, "it was not unreasonable to imply that he meant, if he did not pay it, his wife might pledge his credit."

See, also, Beale v. Arabin, 36 L. T. (N. S.) 249, decided in 1877.

The question first arose in this country for consideration in 1811 in New York in Baker v. Barney, 8 Johns. 72, 5 Am. Dec. 326, where the husband and wife had parted by consent, with a promise on the part of the husband to provide money for the wife's maintenance. There being no proof that the allowance was punctually paid, the court, following the rule applied in Nurse v. Craig, supra, held the husband liable for necessities supplied to the wife after the separation, saying, "If the husband was from that time to be discharged from responsibility for necessities, the wife might have been left to subsist on charity."

So in Fredd v. Eves, 4 Har. 385, 387, the rule was laid down in Delaware in 1846 in these words: "Where husband and wife separate by their mutual agreement, and live apart by mutual consent, the husband is still liable for necessities supplied to the wife, unless he has provided for her, an allowance for necessities, suitable to his pecuniary means and condition in life, and regularly pays such allowance. If he has not provided such allowance, or does not pay it regularly, he is not discharged from the liability which the law imposes upon him of supporting his wife."

See, also, Kemp v. Downham, 5 Har. (Del.) 417, 418.

And at about the same time, in Brown v. Brown, 5 Gill (Md.) 249, the court, speaking of a separation deed and citing Nurse v. Craig and Baker v. Barney, supra, said (page 255): "This deed, so long as the terms of it are complied with on the part of the husband, exonerates him from the obligation to support his wife, and is a protection against any claim which can be made upon him for supplying her even with necessities."

The latest case which we find is McKinney

v. Guhman, 38 Mo. App. 344, decided in 1889, where the rule is very clearly enunciated in the following language (page 347): "Where there has been a mutual separation between husband and wife, two things are necessary to relieve the husband from the payment of debts contracted by the wife for necessities: First. The husband must make an allowance to the wife for her support, and the amount so allowed must be reasonably sufficient to furnish the wife with necessities. The word 'necessaries' would include board, washing, suitable clothing and medical attendance. Second. The allowance must be regularly paid. The mere agreement of the husband to pay the allowance does not relieve him of his legal obligations; nothing short of actual performance will suffice."

[2] When section 175 of the Civil Code was amended in 1874 (Code Amdts. 1873-74, p. 193), by the addition of the clause relieving the husband of obligation to support the wife, if living apart from him by agreement, unless such support is stipulated in the agreement, it is to be presumed that the amendment was made with cognizance of the previous adjudications on the subject, and with no intention of exempting the husband from liability for the wife's necessities by a mere promise without fulfillment. As was said by Justice Heath in Nurse v. Craig, supra: "The law does not relieve a man from obligation on the mere ground of the agreement to do something else in its place, unless that agreement be performed." The husband's stipulation may legally be interpreted, therefore, as carrying with it his implied consent that the wife may supply her needs at his expense, if his money is not forthcoming to her as agreed.

Some question is raised by the appellant as to the sufficiency of proof that the station in life of the parties justified the purchase of the fur coat in question. Both the original and the supplemental agreement between Mr. and Mrs. Jones were introduced in evidence; and from the terms of the later document dated March 29, 1932, even if the original agreement is left out of consideration, we think the trial court could readily draw the inference that, as fashions go nowadays, Mr. Jones' means and condition in life were such as to justify his wife in providing herself with a fur coat of the character purchased. The judgment is affirmed.
